It is by no means charged that all who took part in the rebellion participate or approve the many outrages and acts of violence which are perpetrated in Texas without punishment. A large majority disapprove and deplore this state of affairs; few of them, however, give any active aid in the enforcement of the criminal laws.

All good citizens feel and acknowledge that there is but little security for life in Texas beyond what each man's personal character gives him. Many loyal citizens have expressed the opinion that it would have a good effect upon the community if some of the perpetrators of aggravated crimes like that in Uvalde County, where the difficulty of keeping the prisoners in confinement rendered it highly probable that they would escape and where the sparseness of population made it so difficult to procure a jury, that it was considered almost certain that the parties would never be tried by the civil courts, should be brought before a military commission. In this opinion I fully concur, and it was for this reason that I made the recommendation.

The condition of affairs here was much worse before the establishment of the present military government than it has been since. The fear of arrest by the military authorities and a trial by a military commission has had some effect in deterring lawless men from the commission of crime, but I am constrained to say that since the publication of General Order No. 40, of 29th November, 1867, from headquarters fifth military district, there has been a perceptible increase of crime and manifestations of hostile feelings toward the Government and its supporters.

It is an unpleasant duty to give such a recital of the condition of the country. But the reports and correspondence on file in the offices of the Freedmen's Bureau and of the military commanders in Texas since the close of the rebellion will prove the truth of what is stated here.

In my communications with the previous commanders of the fifth military district, orally and in writing, I have frequently given them my views in regard to the powers of the present civil provisional government of Texas, and also in regard to the condition of affairs here, and the great difficulty and sometimes impossibility of executing the laws for prevention and punishment of crime and the preservation of the public peace.

If all these matters had been known to the commanding general fifth military district, his surprise might not have been excited that a civil magistrate of Texas, who is desirous to preserve peace and good order, and to give security to person and life, should have applied to him as the chief officer to whom the government of Texas is intrusted by the laws of the United States to do by military authority what experience had proved can not be effectually done by the officers of Texas, with the limited means and authority with which they are invested by law.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

E. M. PEASE.

Bvt. Lieut. Col. WM. G. MITCHELL,
Secretary of Civil Affairs.

Official:

R. CHANDLER,
Captain Thirteenth Infantry.

To which General Hancock replied:

HEADQUARTERS FIFTH MILITARY DISTRICT.
New Orleans, La., March 9, 1868.

SIR: Your communication of the 17th of January last was received in due course of time (the 27th of January), but not until it had been widely circulated by the newspaper press. To such a letter, written and published for manifest purposes, it has been my intention to reply as soon as leisure from more important business would permit.

Your statement that the act of Congress "to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States" declares that whatever government existed in Texas was provisional; that peace and order should be enforced; that Texas should be part of the fifth military district and subject to military power; that the President should appoint an officer to command in said district, and detail a force to protect the rights of person and property, suppress insurrection and violence, and punish offenders, either by military commission or through the action of local civil tribunals, as in his judgment might seem best, will not be disputed. One need only read the act to perceive it contains such provisions. But how all this is supposed to have made it my duty to order the military commission requested you have entirely failed to show. The power to do a thing if shown, and the propriety of doing it, are often very different matters. You observe you are at a loss to understand how a government without a representation in Congress or a militia force and subject to military power can be said to be in the full exercise of all its proper powers. You do not reflect that this government, created or permitted by Congress, has all the powers which the act intends, and may fully exercise them accordingly. If you think it ought to have more powers, should be allowed to send members to Congress, wield a militia force, and possess yet other powers, your complaint is not to be preferred against me, but against Congress, who made it what it is.

As respects the issue between us, any question as to what Congress ought to have done has no pertinence. You admit the act of Congress authorizes me to try an offender by military commission, or allow the local civil tribunals to try, as I shall deem best; and you can not deny the act expressly recognizes such local civil tribunals as legal authorities for the purpose specified. When you contend there are no legal local tribunals for any purpose in Texas, you must either deny the plain reading of the act of Congress or the power of Congress to pass the act.

You next remark that you dissent from my declaration "that the country (Texas) is in a state of profound peace," and proceed to state the grounds of your dissent. They appear to me not a little extraordinary. I quote your words: "It is true there no longer exists here (Texas) any organized resistance to the authority of the United States. But a large majority of the white population who participated in the late rebellion are embittered against the Government and yield it an unwilling obedience." Nevertheless, you concede they do yield it obedience. You proceed:

"None of this class have any affection for the Government, and very few any respect for it. They regard the legislation of Congress on the subject of reconstruction as unconstitutional and hostile to their interests, and consider the government now existing here under authority of the United States as an usurpation of their rights. They look on the emancipation of their late slaves and the disfranchisement of a portion of their own class as an act of insult and oppression."

And this is all you have to present for proof that war and not peace prevails in Texas; and hence it becomes my duty—so you suppose—to set aside the local civil tribunals, and enforce the penal code against citizens by means of military commissions.

My dear sir, I am not a lawyer, nor has it been my business, as it may have been yours, to study the philosophy of statecraft and politics. But I may lay claim, after an experience of more than half a lifetime, to some poor knowledge of men, and some appreciation of what is necessary to social order and happiness. And for the future of our common country, I could devoutly wish that no greater number of our people have yet fallen in with the views you appear to entertain. Woe be to us whenever it shall come to pass that the power of the magistrate—civil or military—is permitted to deal with the mere opinions and feelings of the people.

I have been accustomed to believe that sentiments of respect or disrespect, and feelings of affection, love, or hatred, so long as not developed into acts in violation of law, were matters wholly beyond the punitory power of human tribunals.

I will maintain that the entire freedom of thought and speech, however acrimoniously indulged, is consistent with the noblest aspirations of man and the happiest condition of his race.

When a boy, I remember to have read a speech of Lord Chatham, delivered in Parliament. It was during our Revolutionary war, and related to the policy of employing the savages on the side of Britain. You may be more familiar with the speech than I am. If I am not greatly mistaken, his lordship denounced the British Government—his Government—in terms of unmeasured bitterness. He characterized its policy as revolting to every sentiment of humanity and religion; proclaimed it covered with disgrace, and vented his eternal abhorrence of it and its measures. It may, I think, be safely asserted that a majority of the British nation concurred in the views of Lord Chatham. But whoever supposed that profound peace was not existing in that kingdom, or that government had any authority to question the absolute right of the opposition to express their objections to the propriety of the king's measures in any words, or to any extent they pleased? It would be difficult to show that the opponents in the days of the elder Adams, or Jefferson, or Jackson, exhibited for it either "affection" or "respect." You are conversant with the history of our past parties and the political struggles touching legislation on alienage, sedition, the embargo, national banks, our wars with England and Mexico, and can not be ignorant of the fact that for one party to assert that a law or system of legislation is unconstitutional, oppressive, and usurpative is not a new thing in the United States. That the people of Texas consider acts of Congress unconstitutional, oppressive, or insulting to them is of no consequence to the matter in hand. The President of the United States has announced his opinion that these acts of Congress are unconstitutional. The Supreme Court, as you are aware, not long ago decided unanimously that a certain military commission was unconstitutional. Our people everywhere, in every State, without reference to the side they took during the rebellion, differ as to the constitutionality of these acts of Congress. How the matter really is, neither you nor I may dogmatically affirm.

If you deem them constitutional laws, and beneficial to the country, you not only have the right to publish your opinions, but it might be your bounden duty as a citizen to do so. Not less is it the privilege and duty of any and every citizen, wherever residing, to publish his opinion freely and fearlessly on this and every question which he thinks concerns his interest. This is merely in accordance with the principles of our free Government; and neither you nor I would wish to live under any other. It is time now, at the end of almost two years from the close of the war, we should begin to recollect what manner of people we are; to tolerate again free, popular discussion, and extend some forbearance and consideration to opposing views. The maxims that in all intellectual contests truth is mighty and must prevail, and that error is harmless when reason is left free to combat it, are not only sound, but salutary. It is a poor compliment to the merits of such a cause that its advocates would silence opposition by force: and generally those only who are in the wrong will resort to this ungenerous means. I am confident you will not commit your serious judgment to the proposition that any amount of discussion, or any sort of opinions, however unwise in your judgment; or any assertion of feeling, however resentful or bitter, not resulting in a breach of law, can furnish justification for your denial that profound peace exists in Texas. You might as well deny that profound peace exists in New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, California, Ohio, and Kentucky, where a majority of the people differ with the minority on these questions; or that profound peace exists in the House of Representatives or the Senate at Washington, or in the Supreme Court, where all these questions have been repeatedly discussed and parties respectfully and patiently heard.

You next complain that in parts of the State (Texas) it is difficult to enforce the criminal laws; that sheriffs fail to arrest; that grand jurors will not always indict; that in some cases the military acting in aid of the civil authorities have not been able to execute the process of the courts; that petit jurors have acquitted persons adjudged guilty by you; and that other persons charged with offenses have broke jail and fled from prosecution. I know not how these things are; but admitting your representations literally true, if for such reasons I should set aside the local tribunals and order a military commission, there is no place in the United States where it might not be done with equal propriety. There is not a State in the Union, North or South, where the like facts are not continually happening. Perfection is not to be predicated of man or his works. No one can reasonably expect certain and absolute justice in human transactions; and if military power is to be set in motion on the principles for which you would seem to contend, I fear that a civil government, regulated by laws, could have no abiding place beneath the circuit of the sun. It is rather more than hinted in your letter that there is no local State government in Texas, and no local laws outside of the acts of Congress which I ought to respect, and that I should undertake to protect the rights of persons and property in my own way and in an arbitrary manner. If such be your meaning, I am compelled to differ with you.

After the abolition of slavery (an event, I hope, which no one now regrets), the laws of Louisiana and Texas existing prior to the rebellion, and not in conflict with the acts of Congress, comprised a vast system of jurisprudence, both civil and criminal. It required not volumes only, but libraries to contain them. They laid down principles and precedent for ascertaining the rights and adjusting the controversies of men in every conceivable case. They were the creations of great and good and learned men, who had labored, in their day, for their kind, and gone down to the grave long before our recent troubles, leaving their works an inestimable legacy to the human race. These laws, as I am informed, connected the civilization of past and present ages, and testified of the justice, wisdom, humanity, and patriotism of more than one nation, through whose records they descended to the present people of these States. I am satisfied, from representations of persons competent to judge, they are as perfect a system of laws as may be found elsewhere, and better suited than any other to the condition of this people, for by them they have long been governed. Why should it be supposed Congress has abolished these laws? Why should any one wish to abolish them? They have committed no treason, nor are hostile to the United States, nor countenance crime, nor favor injustice. On them, as on a foundation of rock, reposes almost the entire superstructure of social order in these two States. Annul this code of local laws, and there would be no longer any rights, either of person or property, here. Abolish the local civil tribunals made to execute them, and you would virtually annul the laws, except in reference to the very few cases cognizable in the Federal courts. Let us for a moment suppose the whole local civil code annulled, and that I am left, as commander of the fifth military district, the sole fountain of law and justice. This is the position in which you would place me.

I am now to protect all rights and redress all wrongs. How is it possible for me to do it? Innumerable questions arise, of which I am not only ignorant, but to the solution of which a military court is entirely unfitted. One would establish a will, another a deed; or, the question is one of succession, or partnership, or descent, or trust; a suit of ejectment or claim to chattels; or, the application may relate to robbery, theft, arson, or murder. How am I to take the first step in any such matter? If I turn to the acts of Congress I find nothing on the subject. I dare not open the authors on the local code, for it has ceased to exist.

And you tell me that in this perplexing condition I am to furnish by dint of my own hasty and crude judgment the legislation demanded by the vast and manifold interests of the people. I repeat, sir, that you, and not Congress, are responsible for the monstrous suggestion that there are no local laws or institutions here to be respected by me outside of the acts of Congress. I say, unhesitatingly, if it were possible that Congress should pass an act abolishing the local codes for Louisiana and Texas—which I do not believe—and it should fall to my lot to supply their places with something of my own, I do not see how I could do better than follow the laws in force here prior to the rebellion, excepting whatever therein shall relate to slavery. Power may destroy the forms, but not the principles, of justice; these will live in spite even of the sword. History tells us that the Roman pandects were lost for a long period among the rubbish that war and revolution had heaped upon them, but at length were dug out of the ruins, again to be regarded as a precious treasure.

You are pleased to state that "since the publication of (my) General Orders No. 40 there has been a perceptible increase of crime and manifestation of hostile feeling toward the Government and its supporters," and add that it is "an unpleasant duty to give such a recital of the condition of the country."

You will permit me to say that I deem it impossible the first of these statements can be true, and that I do very greatly doubt the correctness of the second. General Orders No. 40 was issued at New Orleans November 29, 1867, and your letter was dated January 17, 1868. Allowing time for Order No. 40 to reach Texas and become generally known, some additional time must have elapsed before its effect would be manifested, and a yet further time must transpire before you would be able to collect the evidence of what you term "the condition of the country," and yet, after all this, you would have to make the necessary investigations to ascertain if Order No. 40 or something else was the cause. The time, therefore, remaining to enable you before the 17th of January, 1868, to reach a satisfactory conclusion on so delicate and nice a question must have been very short. How you proceeded, whether you investigated yourself, or through third persons, and if so, who they were, what their competency and fairness, on what evidence you rested your conclusions, or whether you ascertained any facts at all, are points upon which your letter so discreetly omits all mention, that I may well be excused for not relying implicitly upon it; nor is my difficulty diminished by the fact that in another part of your letter you state that ever since the close of the war a very large portion of the people have had no affection for the Government, but bitterness of feeling only. Had the duty of publishing and circulating through the country long before it reached me your statement that the action of the district commander was increasing crime and hostile feeling against the Government been less painful to your sensibilities, it might possibly have occurred to you to furnish something on the subject in addition to your bare assertion.

But what was Order No. 40, and how could it have the effect you attribute to it? It sets forth "the great principles of American liberty are still the inheritance of this people, and ever should be, that the right of trial by jury, the habeas corpus, the liberty of the press, the freedom of speech, and the natural rights of person and property must be preserved." Will you question the truth of these declarations? Which one of these great principles of liberty are you ready to deny and repudiate? Whoever does so, avows himself the enemy of human liberty and the advocate of despotism. Was there any intimation in General Orders No. 40 that any crimes or breaches of law would be countenanced? You know that there was not. On the contrary, you know perfectly well that while "the consideration of crime and offenses committed in the Fifth military district was referred to the judgment of the regular civil tribunals," a pledge was given in Order No. 40 which all understood, that tribunals would be supported in their lawful jurisdiction, and that "forcible resistance to law would be instantly suppressed by arms." You will not affirm that this pledge has ever been forfeited. There has not been a moment since I have been in command of the Fifth district when the whole military force in my hands has not been ready to support the civil authorities of Texas in the execution of the laws, and I am unwilling to believe they would refuse to call for aid if they needed it.

There are some considerations which, it seems to me, should cause you to hesitate before indulging in wholesale censures against the civil authorities of Texas. You are yourself the chief of these authorities, not elected by the people, but created by the military. Not long after you had thus come into office all the judges of the supreme court of Texas, five in number, were removed from office and new appointments made; twelve of the seventeen district judges were removed, and others appointed. County officers, more or less, in seventy-five out of one hundred and twenty-eight counties were removed, and others appointed in their places. It is fair to conclude that the executive and judicial civil functionaries in Texas are the persons whom you desire to fill the offices. It is proper to mention, also, that none but registered citizens, and only those who could take the test-oath, have been allowed to serve as jurors during your administration. Now, it is against this local government, created by military power prior to my coming here, and so composed of your personal and political friends, that you have preferred the most grievous complaints. It is of them you have asserted they will not do their duty; they will not maintain justice; will not arrest offenders; will not punish crimes; and that out of one hundred homicides committed in the last twelve months, not over ten arrests have been made; and by means of such gross disregard of duty, you declare that neither property nor life is safe in Texas.

Certainly you could have said nothing more to the discredit of the officials now in office. If the facts be as you allege, a mystery is presented for which I can imagine no explanation. Why is it that your political friends, backed up and sustained by the whole military power in this district, should be unwilling to enforce the laws against that part of the population lately in rebellion and whom you represent as the offenders? In all the history of these troubles I have never seen or heard before of such a fact. I repeat, if the fact be so it is a profound mystery, utterly surpassing my comprehension. I am constrained to declare that I believe you are in very great error as to facts. On careful examination at the proper source I find that at the date of your letter four cases only of homicides had been reported to these headquarters as having occurred since November 29, 1867, the date of Order 40, and these cases were ordered to be tried and investigated as soon as the reports were received. However, the fact of the one hundred homicides may still be correct. As stated by you, the Freedmen's Bureau in Texas reported one hundred and sixty. How many of these were by Indians and Mexicans and how the remainder were classified is not known, nor is it known whether these data are accurate.

The report of the commanding officer of the district of Texas shows that since I assumed command no applications have been made to him by you for the arrest of criminals in the State of Texas.

To this date eighteen cases of homicides have been reported to me as having occurred since November 29, 1867, although special instructions had been given to report such cases as they occurred. Of these five were committed by Indians, one by a Mexican, one by an insane man, three by colored men, two of women by their husbands, and of the remainder some by parties unknown—all of which could be scarcely attributed to Order No. 40. If the reports received since the issuing of Order No. 40 are correct, they exhibit no increase of homicides in my time, if you are correct that one hundred had occurred in the past twelve months. That there has been a perfect administration of justice in Texas I am not prepared to deny.

There has been no such wanton disregard of duty on the part of officials, as you allege, I am well satisfied. A very little while ago you regarded the present officials in Texas the only ones who could be safely trusted with power. Now you pronounce them worthless, and would cast them aside.

I have found little else in your letter but indications of temper, lashed into excitement by causes which I deem mostly imaginary, a great confidence in the accuracy of your own opinions, and an intolerance of the opinions of others, a desire to punish the thoughts and feelings of those who differ from you, and an impatience which magnifies the shortcomings of officials who are perhaps as earnest and conscientious in the discharge of their duties as yourself, and a most unsound conclusion that while any persons are to be found wanting in affection or respect for government, or yielding it obedience from motives which you do not approve, war, and not peace, is the status, and all such persons are the proper subjects for military penal jurisdiction.

If I have written anything to disabuse your mind of so great an error, I shall be gratified.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. S. HANCOCK,
Major-General Commanding.

To His Excellency E. M. PEASE,
Governor of Texas.

Mr. President, I have trespassed upon the patience of the Senate by this recital because it is claimed by the Democratic worshipers of General Hancock that his letter of the 9th of March, 1868, to Governor Pease, of Texas, was an exposition of the principles of constitutional law and of the maxims of free government which eclipses even his claims to military glory, and entitles him to stand upon the same plane with Jefferson and the other illustrious statesmen of the Revolutionary epoch. I assume, therefore, that I shall receive the thanks of the Democratic party for inviting public attention to this correspondence between General Hancock and Governor Pease, and that their gratitude will insure my pardon for affirming my opinion that General Hancock's attitude will be regarded as creditable only by those who were willing, after the battle for the Union had closed, to surrender to the enemies of the Government the legitimate fruits of victory.

This correspondence received the widest possible publicity through the Democratic press and from Democratic platforms in 1880. The world knows who one of the parties to that correspondence was; but the name of Governor Pease has not obtained as wide a renown.

Elisha Marshall Pease was a native of Connecticut, of Puritan descent, who emigrated in 1835 to Texas, while it was yet a Mexican province. He was an eminent and thoroughly disciplined lawyer. For ten years after the admission of Texas into the Union, as a member of the Legislature and governor of the State, he did at least as much as any other man in framing the laws and constitution of the new Commonwealth.

He was an original and life-long Democrat until expelled from the party for his uncompromising devotion to the Union. Before the war he was twice elected governor of the State by the Democratic voters of Texas. In all the relations of life he was without fear and without reproach. I believe that both the Senators from Texas knew him well. I am also assured that each of the eleven gentlemen who represent Texas in the other House of Congress were well acquainted with him, and I confidently rely upon the Senators from Texas and each of the Representatives in Congress to sustain me in the declaration that Governor Pease was not only an able but a thoroughly honest, upright, and conscientious man.

Apart from the merits of the questions of public interest involved in this correspondence, I feel sure that the people of the United States will agree with me in the declaration that between the two antagonists the governor of Texas bore himself with superior dignity. From some motive, which the people of the United States are as competent as I am to discern, the distinguished general, who is claimed by his adherers to be a model of knightly courtesy, permitted himself to omit the amenities which gentlemen are accustomed to observe in official intercourse. He called into question the honor and veracity of Governor Pease when the latter expressed his regret that a sense of duty compelled him to state that a degree of lawlessness prevailed in some portions of Texas which the ordinary civil tribunals of Texas were unable to repress. He allowed himself to administer an insulting reprimand to a gentleman who was honestly performing his duty, who was his equal as a man, and who, in point of experience in the civil service of his country and of acquaintance with the affairs of his State, was greatly his superior. His orders were rescinded by General Grant, and after a few inglorious months, finding the complications insupportable, he was relieved at his own request.

Mr. President, General Hancock received his reward. The Democratic party in 1880 nominated him for the Presidency. His claims were submitted to the people, who pronounced their verdict upon his political pretensions as a military leader who had remained true to the Democratic party. Notwithstanding his magnificent and unapproachable military career, recognizing his affiliation with those who had endeavored to destroy the Government by his opposition to the reconstruction policy of Congress and the acts and statutes made thereunder, he was overwhelmingly condemned. He carried, of the Northern States, California, 5 electoral votes; Nevada, 3, and New Jersey, 9; together with the 138 votes of the "solid South," which had been promised him in his speech at Cincinnati by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON]. Of the votes of Northern States that he received, those of California and Nevada were stolen by the forgery and fraud of the Morey letter, invented by Democratic politicians upon the very eve of the election, when it was impossible that the refutation should follow before the votes were cast.

Mr. President, the affected indignation of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] and others at my alleged assault upon these Union generals is discreditable either to their intelligence or to their candor. If they did not know that in speaking of them in that debate, in which I was not an intruder, I was speaking of them not as soldiers, but as politicians and as Democratic candidates for the Presidency, they are dull, stupid, and ignorant indeed. If they do know it and persist in their misrepresentations they are disingenuous, and I suspect, if such a thing were possible, they are both. [Laughter.]

Did the Democratic party in 1880v ote for the hero of Gettysburg or for the author of Order No. 40 and the opponent of the reconstruction policy ot Congress in the fifth military district?

Mr. President, from the impassioned eulogy, the rhapsody of approbation that flowed from the Senator from Indiana upon the great military achievements of McClellan and Hancock, I began to have some doubt who it was that really put down the rebellion, and was driven curiously to inquire into the attitude of the Democratic party in the North and to the Senator from Indiana as one of its acknowledged leaders in 1862, when McClellan, the idol of the Democracy, was fighting the battle of Antietam; in 1863, when Hancock was hurling back in confusion and dismay the scattered squadrons of the Confederacy at Gettysburgh. I was really for the moment inclined, Mr. President, to believe that the Democratic party of the North and the Senator from Indiana and those other great patriots whom he eulogized as the immovable bulwarks of liberty, of the Constitution, and of the Union, Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, Mr. Horatio Seymour, and Mr. William A. Richardson, were in full panoply of battle, aiding McClellan, upholding Hancock, and doing the utmost to make the success of the Union arms possible. It seems like the very climax of effrontery, the apex of audacity for these men, whose history is so well known, who were from the beginning the undisguised enemies of the cause of the Union at every step of its progress, and who, like the Senator from Indiana, were avowedly in sympathy with the South, were the advocates and apologists for slavery and secession at the outset, who gave aid and comfort to the rebellion in every possible way—the Copperheads, the Butternuts, the Knights of the Golden Circle, and all their brutal and degraded allies—to appear here as the advocates and champions of Union soldiers and of the cause of human liberty.

One would suppose from the recent enthusiasm displayed over the military achievements of McClellan and Hancock that we should upon inspection discover that the leaders of the Democracy during the war were in sympathy with the Union cause and in co-operation with the efforts to overthrow the Confederacy. Yet almost at the very hour, certainly in the very year, when McClellan was fighting on the undulating slopes of Antietam, the Senator from Indiana, without excepting even McClellan or Hancock, speaking at Sullivan, in Indiana, on the 5th of August, 1862, said in reference to the Union soldiers that they should go to the nearest blacksmith shop and have an iron collar riveted around their necks, bearing thereon the inscription, "My dog, A. Lincoln." Upon the same occasion he described Union soldiers as "Lincoln dogs and hirelings," without excepting McClellan or Hancock. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLPH). It is the duty of the Chair to inform the people in the galleries that under the rules of the Senate applause is not permitted, and if it occurs again it may be necessary to order the galleries to be cleared.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I speak to-day with difficulty in consequence of an infirmity of my throat, and I shall be under great obligations if there may be no interruption or disorder.

During the campaign that resulted in the election of Abraham Lincoln, the Senator from Indiana, who is now so vigorously in favor of the prosecution of the war of the rebellion, who eulogizes the efforts of the Union armies and the genius of the Union commanders, and poses as the special friend of the pensioners, and denounces and misrepresents my allusion to the political character and affiliations of McClellan and Hancock, made a speech at Greencastle, reported in the Cincinnati Commercial of August 8, 1864, by Joseph B. McCullagh, now of the Globe-Democrat, St. Louis. The Senator from Indiana said:

Why, this campaign of Grant upon the Rapidan and at Petersburgh—

And Hancock was there—

this campaign of Grant upon the Rapidan and at Petersburgh was of such a nature that you could hear the bones of your brave sons and brothers crash like glass clear to Washington City. The sickening details of the slaughter came up with the fumes of blood on our very breakfast plates at Washington City every morning; yet Lincoln says he will peg away for four years more. In God's name, have you not had enough of it? Let us try some other plan, this one has signally failed. Five hundred thousand more men, that's all.

Now listen to the opinion the Senator from Indiana then entertained of President Lincoln, the martyr:

Three human souls were hurried into eternity by each of Mr. Lincoln's jokes. Another section of land in view of Mr. Lincoln's room had been dug up for a graveyard, and while he jested and joked with his servile crew he could look out on this scene of dying and death. Yet you propose to me to retain that monster another term of office—that monster, that with utter disregard of human life and misery has proposed to prolong his term of office? Gentlemen, it seems to me that I can hear the spirits of the hundreds of thousands of lives that have been uselessly sacrificed in this war pleading against the re-election of this man. It seems to me the very inanimate objects and dumb brutes would cry out, enough, he has had his day—bloody, gory, reeking, let him go out into hateful obscurity, there to spend the residue of his days with the ghosts of the murdered dead, gibbering around the unhappy—felon!"

In 1864, when the great struggle that resulted in the destruction and overthrow of the rebellion was going on, the Senator from Indiana put upon record the views he then entertained of Union soldiers, the President of the United States, and the efforts that were being made to reenforce the Union Armies.

When the sun rose on the 4th of July, 1863—

Says the Senator from Indiana in his speech last Wednesday—and shone on Lee's army in retreat from Gettysburgh the last hope of the Southern Confederacy disappeared forever.

Yet in September, 1864, many months after the battle of Gettysburgh, that same Senator united with his party in the declaration that the war even then was a failure, that it was impossible to conduct it to a successful conclusion, and that immediate negotiations ought to be entered upon with the rebels for the purpose of procuring a dishonorable peace.

Mr. President, there appears to be some mysterious and occult fascination to the Democratic party about the "fraud of 1876." Senators within the past week have risen gravely to denounce it as one of the living issues of the day, and the Democratic party of Indiana, a few days ago, in their tenth resolution declared against it with emphasis.

I voted against the bill creating the Electoral Commission in 1876, because I believed that the power to count the votes rested with the President of the Senate. I was never specially enamored of President Hayes, but inasmuch as the question of his title is brought in controversy by the Democratic party as one of the issues of this campaign, I feel bound to say that his title is the most absolutely impregnable of any in the whole line of American Presidents, because it is the only one ever passed upon by a constitutional tribunal lawfully organized for that purpose.

The Democratic party should not forget that the Electoral Commission was one of their own devices. It was to consist, as we all remember, of fifteen members, five from a Democratic House of Representatives, five from a Republican Senate, which would leave an equal political division, and five from the Supreme Court of the United States, which as then organized would, as was discovered by the necessary investigation, complete a tribunal that would be in favor of seating Samuel J. Tilden, the Democratic nominee for the Presidency, by a majority of one.

It was not the first time, Mr. President, in the history of human affairs, that they who have digged a pit and dug it deep have fallen into the pit that they have prepared for their brother. By one of those mysterious and inscrutable dispensations of Divine Providence that sometimes appear to interfere in the affairs of man, Hon. David Davis, a member of the Supreme Court, was chosen to the Senate of the United States, in the place of Hon. John A. Logan, whose term had expired, which brought forward as the fifteenth member of the Commission on the part of the Supreme Court of the United States, Mr. Bradley, and presto, instead of being 8 to 7 for Mr. Tilden it was 8 to 7 for Mr. Hayes.

The interest of the Democratic party in the Electoral Commission ceased from that instant. [Laughter.] They immediately began to denounce it as an unconstitutional and illegal body, and Hon. Henry Watterson, as you may remember, issued his celebrated proclamation calling upon 100,000 unarmed Kentuckians to visit the city of Washington upon the anniversary of the battle of New Orleans for the purpose of superintending the Electoral Commission count. [Laughter.] I happened to have a conversation with President Grant at the White House shortly after that celebrated proclamation was issued and the interest of the Democratic party in the Electoral Commission had become so languid. I asked him if he thought there was going to be any trouble. He paused a moment with that deliberate method which characterized his utterances before he replied: "No; I do not think there is going to be any trouble, but it has been one rule of my life to be always ready;" and he was ready. In obedience to some mysterious direction parks of artillery and troops and munitions of war began coming into the capital and the agitation of the Democratic party became extreme, for if there is anything that will turn the average Democrat inside out with spasmodic indignation it is the sight of a Federal soldier in a new uniform. [Laughter.] The 100,000 unarmed Kentuckians did not appear and the count proceeded, notwithstanding the negotiations at the Wormley House, and in spite of the hostility of the Democratic party to the unexpected result of their own contrivance. The reason why the Presidential count was not protracted until after the 4th of March, 1877, and the Government thrown into a revolution, so far as the Democratic party could effect this, was not because they were patriotic or because they were so sincerely devoted to the peace and welfare of the country, but it was because U. S. Grant was in the White House, who had determined that when the count was completed, on the 4th of March or any other day, the candidate who received the certificate of election should be installed as his successor, whether it was Samuel J. Tilden or Rutherford B. Hayes, if it took the whole force of the United States and its Army and Navy to put him there. The people of the United States may as well understand that all this pretense about the fraud of 1876 and 1877 is not sincere. It was a Democratic device.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the Senator say that the Democratic party was responsible for the creation of the Electoral Commission? The resolution creating the committee which reported that bill was offered in the House of Representatives by Mr. McCrary, of Iowa. No person on that joint committee had so much influence in framing that electoral bill as Mr. McCrary and the honorable member from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], a member on behalf of the Senate. They all led in the framing of the bill. That statement is due to history.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I understand all about that. I know who devised the Electoral Commission and who supported it and how it was carried. All this talk about Hayes and fraud, and Packard and Chamberlain, which is to be apparently one of the issues of this approaching campaign as an illustration of the turpitude of the Republican party, is altogether too transparent.

I never liked the abandonment of Packard as governor of Louisiana. I never was satisfied with the abandonment of Chamberlain as governor of South Carolina. I never believed, however, that there was any truth in the Democratic allegation of a collusive agreement by which the State governments of Louisiana and South Carolina were to be turned over to the Democracy. I have heard it, but I never believed it, and the evidence is almost conclusive to the contrary, because the Democratic majority in the House of Representatives refused to make the necessary appropriations at that session of Congress for supporting the Army of the United States. Although Chamberlain in South Carolina and Packard in Louisiana got more votes for the governorship than the Hayes electors did, one obvious reason why they were not sustained was because there was no Army to send to their support. The Democratic party had refused the necessary appropriations. And yet we are perpetually reminded, in order to distract attention from the crimes of the Democratic party in the South and in our great cities, that the Republicans were guilty of an enormous and gigantic fraud in the election and in the seating of Hayes.

Why, Mr. President, Cleveland has a warranty deed apparently to the seat that he occupies, and yet compared with the title that Mr. Hayes had to his seat he is in possession of stolen goods, and the receiver is as bad as the thief. In the court of justice and fair conscience he never was elected at all, but counted into office by a partnership between Dick Turpin and Uriah Heep, foot-pads and sneak-thieves, Cartouche and Pecksniff, and it is some consolation that in this partnership the apostates and renegades have lost their share of the swag. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, we are upon the threshold of another election. We have had McClellan and Seymour, Greeley and Tilden, Hancock and Cleveland for Democratic candidates, and Cleveland is practically renominated for another term. It will be the most important contest of the century, a political battle whose result will determine the destiny of the United States for the next twenty-five years, involving the reconstruction of the Supreme Court of the United States, the control of the Senate, free trade or the protection of American labor, the currency, internal improvements, the distribution of the surplus, and all the other great political, social, and material issues that so nearly concern national greatness and individual happiness. And again we are confronted with the 153 votes of the "solid South," as we have been at every election since 1876; a "solid South" that is the essence and substance of the Southern Confederacy; and the success of the Democratic party means the triumph of the Confederacy, which is to-day as much an organized, active, aggressive force in our politics as it was in 1860 or at any previous time. Slavery is dead and secession is dead, but the ideas, the impulses, the purposes, the intentions engendered by slavery and secession remain. Ideas are immortal. They never die. Force can not annihilate them. No man was ever convinced by being conquered, and no Confederate has ever confessed that the cause for which he fought was wrong. The Senator from Virginia said the other day with spirit and courage that the Confederates felt contempt for but two classes of men, those who made apologies and those who demanded them; and so they rear monuments to their heroes, perpetuate the memory of their victories, teach their children that the cause for which they contended was just and must ultimately triumph. They strive to regain by diplomacy their ascendency in national affairs which they lost in the field, and eventually intend to appeal for the vindication of their cause to the judgment of posterity.

Sir, I honor and admire while I regret and deplore the constancy of the South to their ideals, their loyalty to their leaders, their fidelity to the cause for which they made such inconceivable sacrifices, and their determination to rewrite and reconstruct history so that their posterity may proudly say to the generations that are to come, "While it is true that we were vanquished by overwhelming numbers in the field, yet within twenty-five years after the war closed our leaders were restored to political power by the deliberate verdict of the American people; we were intrusted with the purse and the sword and made the custodians of the destinies of the Republic."

What other explanation will the historian be able to make of the appointment of L. Q. C. Lamar as associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States? It is the tribunal of last resort. There is no appeal from its decision except by revolution. Its influence in our political history has never been fully appreciated. All the important questions arising hereafter under the constitutional amendments, the reconstruction acts, the statutes of freedom, and the laws regulating national elections, the payment for slaves, captured property, and losses by war are to be decided by a majority of the Supreme Court. Why, then, was Mr. Lamar selected for a place upon the bench? He never was suspected of being a lawyer. [Laughter.] His bitterest enemy never accused him of that. He never had been admitted to practice at the bar of the Supreme Court; his age was against him. He had not tried a reported cause in any tribunal, State or national, for thirty years. It is an open secret that the President of the United States at one time peremptorily refused to appoint him, and said the case was closed. Why was he appointed, and how was the reluctance of the Executive overcome? There was no lack of eminent lawyers of suitable years in the South or in Mississippi. The only answer is that he had a record. On the 1st of June, 1861, upon a platform with Jefferson Davis, in the city of Richmond, Mr. Lamar used the following language:

> Fellow-citizens, if this continent is to be the theater of internecine war, history will acquit these Confederate States of all responsibility for this calamity. The very first act of the Confederate government was to send commissioners to Washington to make terms of peace and to establish relations of amity between the two sections; and if the buffoon who now disgraces the seat once occupied by Washington and Madison had not been lost to the dictates of truth, justice, and humanity, * * * it would have afforded the strongest evidence of the capacity of men for self-government ever presented to the world.

If we are to have peace, harmony, and reconciliation, why was it necessary to affront the North, the loyal sentiment of the Union, by placing in this most influential life position a man who was not a lawyer, and never had been, and who had described Abraham Lincoln as a buffoon? Why was it indispensable, of all the men in the South, to select him and force him upon a reluctant President and a protesting people? He was selected because he was the ablest and most conspicuous living representative of the Southern Confederacy, and because he was the nearest and closest adviser and representative of Jefferson Davis. That is why he was designated. There is no other explanation. If that is not true, then his nomination was a farce or a caprice, without excuse, without reason or justification.

And now already another vacancy has occurred by the lamented death of the Chief-Justice. Three associates are past the retiring age, and with another term of Democratic administration this tribunal will be reconstructed upon the basis of hostility to the amendments to the Constitution and all the legislation of Congress in the enforcement thereof.

The junior Senator from Kentucky, in a debate in the House of Representatives, of which he was then a member, in 1879, boldly declared that it was the purpose of the Democratic party to keep on until they had wiped from the statute-books the last vestige of Republican war legislation. That was a manly and honest declaration, and with a Democratic Executive, and Democratic majority in both Houses of Congress, and a Democratic Supreme Court, there is no question what the result will be. I know that the existence of such designs will be received with denials and denunciation, as an appeal to what the Senator from Indiana calls the issue of sectional hate. During the debate on the dependent pension bill I recalled the exercises at Atlanta, when the statue of Hill was unveiled, in 1886, the speech of the orator, the ovation to the venerable ex-President of the Confederacy as the "uncrowned king" of the Southern people, and the indescribable excitement and enthusiasm of the applauding myriads in attendance; my inferences were denied and my allusions resented with a freedom of criticism in the press that will not deter me from adverting to the circumstance of a similar occasion at Macon, in October, 1887, about six months ago. A monument to the Confederate soldiers was to be dedicated, with imposing display and ceremonials. The Confederate flag decorated the city, and was borne by the veterans of the Confederate armies, who assembled in great numbers to do honor to the occasion. The venerable ex-President again appeared, and Mr. Henry W. Jackson, late minister to Mexico under this administration, was selected to deliver the address. I have received a pamphlet containing a full report of his remarks, and, for the purpose of showing the convictions and purposes of the Democracy, I will read a few paragraphs from the address of the orator.

> For to-day there stands upon the soil of Georgia the distinguished Mississippian who, within the life of the present generation, was a prisoner in irons—the so-called "traitor" leader of a so-called "lost" cause. We, Confederate veterans, relict of the army which fought for that cause, are here to meet him; to move before him, in the pride and pomp of no Roman triumph, it is true, but bending our necks to no Roman yoke of subjugation. By invitation of the State of Georgia, speaking through her duly empowered officials, all have come. Behold majestic truth revealing herself! State sovereignty is not dead! Georgia is a sovereign still!

> And because, after decades of endurance as patient as it was delusive, the sovereign parties of the South declined to accept their revolutionary will in permanent place of the Constitution, the compact-breaking sovereigns of the North, with numbers overwhelming, and "material" unbounded, made aggressive war upon them to force them to accept it. Simple record this; yet forever fixed in the firmament of truth. Falsehood abroad, reckless or malignant; dallying with the false at home, ill-judged, cowardly, or venal, can not unfix it. As well attempt, standing upon a stool, to pluck a fixed star from heaven!
> The principle for which they fought—the only principle of government expansive enough to meet the requirements of advancing civilization, made of late by Gladstone's eloquence so familiar to European thought—was American-born. Sun of the modern as compared with the ancient civilization; "home rule" as contrasted with Roman centralization; it rose in the west, and now mounts the western firmament, red with the blood of Confederate heroes, moist with the tears of Confederate widows and orphans. Eastward shall it continue to roll, carrying with it the blessed light of the Christian civilization all around the globe. And, so surely as it moves, it shall bring the day of a final triumph, to be decreed by the mind and conscience of man to time-tested truth. In that triumphal procession, Abraham Lincoln shall not move as the rightful President, but Jefferson Davis, the so-called "traitor" leader of a so-called "lost" cause.

This speech is especially interesting because of the effect that it had upon the Democratic party in the State election in Ohio, which was then pending. Immediately upon its delivery at Macon to the Confederate veterans in October great fear, alarm, and agitation fell upon the Democrats at Columbus for some unknown reason. Why the assertion of this appointee of the administration of a belief in secession and of a conviction that Jeff Davis was the rightful President of the United States rather than Abraham Lincoln should be detrimental to the Democratic party rather than to the Republicans, or the Prohibitionists, or the Anti-monopolists, does not appear, but the tribulation was so great that our old associate in the Senate, Judge Thurman, in an address at the capital of Ohio, to the club bearing his name, arose in great wrath and smote him thus:

> An old crank down in Georgia by the name of Jackson—God forgive him for bearing that name—a disappointed politician, a man whom Grover Cleveland recalled from his mission to Mexico, some say because he got too drunk there to be of any use; I do not know how that is, I am not accustomed to making personal charges, but what I do know is that the President recalled him, and, from the day he was recalled to this day, it is said that the President and the Democratic party have no more malignant enemy in the United States than he. [Applause.] This old fool at a meeting at Macon, a month ago, or something like that, saw fit to make a speech, and declare that the doctrine of secession was not dead.

And so on and so on. Mr. Jackson, who was an eminent citizen of Georgia, appointed on the recommendation as is understood of the two Senators from that State, naturally protested against being called a drunken old crank and fool, and filed a general denial, affirming that he was not recalled for any such reasons by Mr. Cleveland, but that he resigned and came home of his own free will and accord.

And immediately after the speech was made, Governor Gordon, of Georgia, whom we all know, our former esteemed and beloved associate in this body, desiring to counteract the injurious effects of Minister Jackson's imprudent candor upon the Democratic party in Ohio, chartered a special car and as fast as an engine could carry him went to Cincinnati to explain and qualify the indiscretion. So great was his desire to show the complete reconciliation between the North and the South, and that no hostile feeling existed between the sections, he approached General George W. Morgan and kissed him on the mouth [laughter], as was reported in the papers of that day.

After making two or three speeches which were received with tumultuous and derisive laughter from one end of the State to the other, General Gordon got onto his special car and, like the King of France, went back again. The Democratic party in Ohio suffered the worst political defeat of the generation, as Judge Thurman admitted, in consequence of this declaration of the purposes of the Southern Democracy. Thereupon Mr. Jackson wound up the controversy by declaring that the Democrats of the South do not propose to submit to Northern dictation from any quarter, but that they intend to adhere to their convictions, and to transmit them to posterity. He concludes:

> Simply because of my having made a speech of such character, upon such an occasion, to an audience of veteran soldiers, called together for no political purpose whatever, you, and the swarm of insects which have been buzzing about my name, delighted, perhaps, in the thought that they were inflicting upon me the venom of their stings, have held me up to the world as the meanly vindictive enemy of the Democratic party, prepared to harm it to the full extent of my malignant power. Is it possible that we of the South are thus to be welcomed back into the Union, even by the Democratic party of the North? Are we to stand in perpetual terror of opening our mouths anywhere or upon any occasion, to say one word in commendation of our past, or in honor of our dead, or in vindication of what we know to be the truth of history, lest we may say something "to injure the Democratic party?" Is it not sufficient that we have been stripped of our property, and of many things far dearer to us than property can ever be? Must we also consent to sink our good name into the abyss of silence? Must we keep our peace, unless we be prepared to kiss the hand that smites us, and to place ourselves in the line of truckling hypocrits? Must our children grow up around us, hearing at the home fireside the story of the past and realizing that their fathers dare not repeat it in the face of the world? Will this be the school in which to train them for the manful discharge of the grand duties imposed by American civilization upon the American citizen? From the time they begin to perceive and to think for themselves, thus to be crushed to the dust by the cruel consciousness that, however pure and patriotic in fact their sires may have been, in the opinion of the world they were guilty of an enormous historic crime, the shadow of which must rest forever, like a black cloud of ignominy, upon the pride, the hope, and manhood of their posterity?

Mr. President, the Republican party would have no right to complain if the South was kept solid by fair means. If upon an honest, straightforward, open expression of opinion on the part of all men, black and white, in the South, there were 153 electoral votes for the Democratic party, nobody could complain. But as we have recently passed a statute forbidding all gambling and betting within the city of Washington, I may, perhaps, be pardoned for using the language of the pool-room by saying that the Democratic party is playing this political game with loaded dice. They throw sixes every time. Their cards are stocked; it is a cold deck; and they have a revolver in their boot and a bowie-knife down the back of their neck. We are compelled every day to witness, apparently without the possibility of prevention, wrongs inflicted upon thousands and hundreds of thousands of American citizens in the Southern States that, if they were inflicted by any foreign power upon "even the least of one of these my little ones," there would be a declaration of war within ninety days—even with the present Secretary of State in office. [Laughter.]

We have an illustration of what is going to happen in November next by what has just occurred in Louisiana. The Senator from Indiana after his denunciation of the Republican party, especially in its relations to the South, says:

Why gape and wonder at the result of the election a few days ago in Louisiana? There is nothing in the 75,000 Democratic majority to marvel at. It was simply the overwhelming protest of the people of that State, terrified and appalled at the prospect of ever again being governed by the leaders of the Republican party, and the only wonder is that the vote was not unanimous.

Mr. President, it was more than unanimous. The Democratic party have learned the art in the South not only of making it unanimous but of making it more than unanimous on their side. They have learned the secret of returning a larger Democratic majority than the entire registered vote in the precinct. I wonder myself at their moderation in returning only 75,000 majority. It has been going up since the Senator spoke; it is 83,000 now; and what it will amount to before dog-days nobody can tell.

I wish to refer to one other matter in connection with Louisiana. The Senator from Indiana, as a reason for this unanimity, says:

They had in former times seen their State government—

That is, the State of Louisiana—

They had in former times seen their State government pass into Republican hands with a debt of but $1,500,000, and they had seen her in the short space of four years afterwards crushed to the very earth, financially ruined, bankrupted, and dishonored by a mountainous debt of $50,000,000.

For the purpose of showing the accuracy and reliability of the Senator from Indiana when he makes a financial statement that is intended to be literally and exactly correct, I will read the figures of the debt of Louisiana when the State came into Republican hands and when it went out, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] being on the committee in which this report appears, the official statement having been obtained from the department of state at New Orleans.

The entire debt of Louisiana at the close of the war was $4,352,855. The Legislature chosen in 1865 was almost unanimously Democratic, and was composed of leading members of that party, who during its two years' term increased the debt $13,749,872; so that the entire amount of debt in Louisiana transmitted to the Republicans in 1868, instead of being $1,500,000 was $18,102,727. Of course the Senator from Indiana does not stand on a trifle of merely $15,000,000 or $16,000,000 in a statement of debt; it is nothing to him.

The bonded and floating debt of the State on January 1, 1875, was $23,933,407. The increase in seven years of Republican administration was $5,830,679, and in two years of Democratic administration, $13,749,872, or nearly three times in two years the increase that the Republicans made in seven years; and instead of being $50,000,000 that the State was in debt at the time when the Republicans finally abandoned it, the amount was $23,933,407, or a difference of about $26,000,000—it is a mere trifle to the Senator from Indiana—of which $18,000,000 was contracted by Democrats and about $5,000,000 by Republicans.

As an illustration of the temper that prevailed during the period of Democratic incumbency, there was a banquet of the Democratic members of the Legislature, and one hilarious member of that organization, in response to a toast, said:

Grant's motto is "Let us have peace." That is all very well; but we want a big piece.

And they got it. [Laughter.]

The story of the recent election in Louisiana is one of exciting interest. I do not propose to read all the tables I have here, for I have already trespassed too long upon the patience of the Senate; but it is important that the people of the United States should know precisely what the Republican party is to expect from the Democracy of the South in November next, and I shall therefore dwell somewhat at length upon the details of that election, which was held on the 17th of April.

In a speech at New Orleans in January, just before the election of delegates to the nominating convention, Governor McEnery said:

So far as my administration of the election laws is concerned, I pledge you tonight, that not only in the city of New Orleans, but throughout the State of Louisiana, I will see an honest and fair election; that every vote cast is counted as deposited, and that no substitution of ballots is practiced, but that the voice of all the voters in the State as deposited in the ballot-box shall find expression and receive recognition, and the officers elected commissioned. To that end I will remove any registrar or returning officer in the city or State that I have reason to believe will aid in the suppression or changing of the popular will.

This was a palpable admission that just ground of complaint had hitherto existed, but relying upon the public pledge of the governor, the Republicans organized and entered actively into the canvass.

The convention was held on the 10th of January, and after a bitter and protracted contest General Nicholls was nominated for governor over Governor McEnery. The Nicholls men on the committee of resolutions were asked to report a resolution indorsing Governor McEnery's administration. The question was submitted to the caucus of Nicholls men, who voted it down. J. D. Houston, a McEnery leader, informed the Nicholls caucus that unless the vote was reconsidered and Governor McEnery indorsed, he would offer a resolution in the convention declaring that the Democratic party demanded a "free vote and a fair count." Terrified by this threat, the Nicholls caucus reconsidered the vote by which they refused to indorse Governor McEnery's administration and adopted the resolution. It was reported by the committee on resolutions, adopted by the convention, and no resolution was introduced on the subject of a "free vote and a fair count."

In an interview between Governor McEnery, General McMillen, and ex-Governor Warmoth, at the St. Charles Hotel, Governor McEnery reiterated his declaration that he would see that a free, honest, and fair election should be held in April.

Governor McEnery's assurances were again and again reiterated during the campaign. As the canvass proceeded it became apparent that there was danger of Warmoth's election. The idea of a fair count and a free vote did not seem to be entirely satisfactory to the Democratic managers, and early in March, in a public speech, Governor McEnery said:

I tell you there is danger, and North Louisiana will have to save this State from disgrace. If you permit the negroes to organize, you will have to break it by power, and go right now and break it in its incipiency. Before I will see such another state of affairs I will wrap the State in revolution from the Gulf to the Arkansas line. The white people under the radical régime were fast going towards the condition of Hayti, and I now ask you to establish to the world that we, the white people, intend to rule the destinies of this country. We have now a Gaul at our doors, and it is time we shall say that the law shall be silent, and uphold our liberties at all hazards.

Not satisfied with this, Governor McEnery wrote to his returning officers, whose duty it is to fix the polling places, appoint the commissioners and clerks of election, and return the votes in all of the parishes of the State, as follows:

Warmoth is developing too much strength. We must beat him. See to it that your parish returns a large Democratic majority.

The author of the above statement is Governor Warmoth, who says:

I dare Governor McEnery to deny that he has written this letter. Not to one, but to many returning officers, besides many other leading Democrats.

At the meeting in March, at which Governor McEnery declared that "the law shall be silent," etc., he was followed by Colonel Jack, of Natchitoches, who said:

You have heard the assurances of our chief executive, that come what will or may he will wrap this State in revolution, from the Arkansas line to the Gulf, rather than have radicalism come into power. And I tell you we are in danger with the astute and wily Warmoth as a leader—the wily, crafty, and insidious gentleman from New Orleans.

If this state of affairs should confront him, all Governor McEnery would have to do would be to issue his fiat or manifesto, and the people of North Louisiana would come to his rescue and redeem the State as they did before; and if what I say is treason let them make the most of it.

I quote from the returns in the New Orleans Bee of April 24, 1888, the result of the election for governor, from which it appears that instead of 75,000 majority, as the Senator from Indiana stated, the majority has already reached the number of 83,200, and returns are still coming in:

The following table of selected counts in several important and populous parishes is exceedingly interesting in many particulars. The vote exceeds the registration more than 1,200, which is nearly the number of Republican votes counted:

Parishes.	Whole registered vote in 1884.			Whole vote returned in 1888.
	White.	Colored.	Total.	Nicholls.	Warmoth.	Total.
Bossier	1,002	2,600	3,602	4,213	95	4,308
Jackson	691	423	1,114	1,057	7	1,064

Sabine	1,173	329	1,502	1,440	1	1,441

I have also a few letters received of a recent date from eminent Republicans in that State. The first is from Bossier Parish, showing how the extraordinary unanimity for the Democratic condidates was obtained, and how a vote of 3,500 for Warmoth dwindled to 95.

BELLEVUE, LA., April 19, 1888.

DEAR SIR: I have just wired you the returns of Bossier Parish. Total vote returned, 4,308. Nicholls, 4,213; Warmoth, 95; total, 4,308.

There was a large turnout and a full Republican vote was polled. There seemed to be no trouble or hinderance about the negro voting the Republican ticket, and it is safe to say at least 3,500 votes were polled for Governor Warmoth and the Republican ticket, but they were counted out.

The work and proceedings of stuffing the boxes is no secret here; the Democrats talk plainly and boldly about how they did it.

Yours, respectfully, etc.,

B. F. O'NEAL.

Hon. ANDREW HERO, Jr.,
New Orleans, La.

The next is from West Feliciana Parish, where Nicholls received 2,036 and Warmoth 377:

ROW LANDING, April 21, 1888.

DEAR SIR: I write you a few lines to let you know how things went on here at Row Landing poll. Two hundred and fourteen votes cast for our ticket. At the Raccourci Island poll they robbed the box; they took 80 or 90 votes from the Republicans. At 2 o'clock 105 votes were polled, about 70 or 80 of them Republican votes. We had four men from our side of the river to work at that poll. They worked faithfully for the party. One hundred and thirteen votes were polled and they gave us only 5 votes. The Democrats stole our votes all over the parish.

Respectfully,

CLEM. SEWELL,
Chairman.

Hon. P. F. HERWIG.

The following letter is from Rapides Parish, in which Nicholls received 4,678 votes and Warmoth 449:

ALEXANDRIA, LA., April 20, 1888.

SIR: The election passed off quietly. We being without representation at any of the polls, the Democrats could make up the returns to suit themselves.

At the Alexandria box it was situated in a room in the court-house with a door opening in a hall, which was easy of access; the box was placed on a table and two or three gentlemen (Democrats) sat upon the table by the box from the time that the polls opened until they closed, and when a Republican voted, in nearly every case, one of the commissioners would take his ballot to put it in the box, but very few, if any, ever were put in the box. They were generally put on the table behind the box, and towards the closing of the polls the floor under the table was covered with the tickets taken from the colored voters by the commissioners to put in the box, which they failed to do; there were but few colored men allowed to deposit their votes.

At Cheneyville Mr. Barrett, the Republican candidate for State senator, distributed 180 votes to colored men, and they voted the tickets he gave them, and about half past five o'clock in the morning Mr. Barrett went to get a drink of water. He was absent from the poll about five minutes, and when he returned he saw a small crowd of white men enter the room where the ballot-boxes were and when he inquired what was the matter he was told that the polls had closed and that the commissioners were about to commence the counting of the votes; it was then a few minutes after six o'clock. Mr. Barrett staid until 9.15 p. m.; up to that time 300 votes had been counted, all straight Democrats and not one Republican vote. This Mr. Barrett could not understand, as he and a friend had kept a tally all day and had been absent but five minutes, and according to their tally there was but 260 votes cast, and 180 of them Republican, but the commissioners returned 600-odd Democratic majority though there were not 300 votes in the box. At Lamourie, out of a vote of over 300, they gave us but 11. They had about 44 votes, but the commissioners gave them a majority of 300, and the same can be said about Wiel's Store; only a few of our voters voted. At Boyce I am told that the whole poll-list was counted of that ward as a majority for the Democrats.

Truly, etc.,

GEORGE Y. KELSO.

Maj. A. HERO, Jr.

PARISH OF WEST BATON ROUGE (FOURTH WARD),
State of Louisiana, April 17, 1888.

We, the undersigned committee appointed on the above date to assist or witness the counting of the votes cast for both Nicholls and Warmoth and the remainder of the two tickets, declare that the commissioners closed the doors for about fifteen minutes, at which time the ballot-box was stuffed with Democratic tickets, and they made away with all the Republican tickets but 34, and counted themselves or their State ticket 409, which is more votes than are in the ward.

E. Tappins and A. L. Jadot tallied every vote both white and colored; we therefore enter our solemn protest against the Fourth ward of the parish aforesaid, and we the voters are willing to come down at any time and swear to the above statement.

I remain yours, respectfully,

I. S. TAPPINS, Chairman.

The following letter shows how Tobias Gibson did it in Terre Bonne:

NEW ORLEANS, April 27, 1888.

SIR: On Friday morning between the hours of 1 and 2 o'clock I was awakened by hearing some one calling at my gate. I did not answer, but quietly jumped out of bed and went to the window, peeped through the blinds to see who was calling me. I knew it was Mr. Tobias Gibson, the brother of Senator RANDALL GIBSON, but to be sure it was him calling me I got up on a chair in my house and peeped through the blinds, as I always keep the upper blind open, and in looking through the opening I saw and recognized Mr. Gibson and am sure that it was him who was calling me. He called me for at least fifteen minutes, but I did not answer. I also recognized Mr. Millard Thomas, the Democratic candidate for the House of Representatives, and Mr. John R. Grinnage, also a Democratic candidate for the House of Representatives at the election held April 17, 1888, and several others that I well knew. There were about fifteen or twenty other persons that I did not know.

After failing to answer Mr. Gibson he said, "Johnson, if you do not come out, I will come in and get you." He then ordered his men to open fire on my house and kill everybody therein; they fired about thirty or forty shots with their Winchester rifles. I returned the fire from inside for the purpose of keeping them from breaking the door and taking me out. They then began firing again and fired about as many shots as before, or more; they failed to hit me, as I was between the armoir and the wall. In my house was my family, composed of my wife and two boys, also three other women; they would have been killed only for my coolness and presence of mind in getting them to lay flat on the floor. I do not think they would have left as quick as they did, but I suppose they thought that they had killed everybody in the house, but Providence let it so happen that no one was killed.

I infer that the cause of the trouble was my action in the late canvass. The Republicans met in convention at Morgan City, La., and indorsed the nomination of Judge B. F. Winchester for judge of the nineteenth judicial district, comprising the parishes of St. Mary's and Terre Bonne. We made this indorsement by the request of one wing of the Democratic party of Terre Bonne. A day after the indorsement was made the Democratic executive committee of the parish of Terre Bonne also nominated Judge Winchester. They then met the following night in the Fireman's Hall, in the town of Houma, in a meeting numbering 150 or 200, all Democrats. No Republican was admitted. The meeting was called to order by Mr. Thomas L. Winder, chairman of the Democratic campaign committee, who used the following language in his speech: "For twenty-five years this parish has been held in bondage by the Republican party with a negro majority; by the eternal God we shall deliver ourselves from the bondage of the negro and the Republican party. This is a white man's government and this parish shall be placed in the column of the other Democratic parishes regardless of the cost and what may be the penalty, if it takes blood to do it." Speeches as violent were made by the other speakers.

These speeches alarmed the colored people much. Knowing that they have a majority of at least 600 votes in Terre Bonne Parish, the leaders of the Republican party made an appeal to the planters and stated that if they would give them the protection of life and safety of the ballot and a fair count they would support the candidate of their choice for judge. They pledged themselves to do that, and they did so; they asked of the Republican sheriff to appoint a planter as deputy sheriff at each poll. The sheriff did so. There was no trouble all the day of election, because of the presence of each planter (deputy sheriff) with a Winchester rifle on his shoulder. By that means we succeeded in electing the Republican State ticket and all the Republican parish officers and Judge Allen, whom the Republican leaders promised to support. Being unable to carry out their threats and plans before the election, they sought revenge after the election by calling one man from his house and putting thirty bullets through him. After killing one man they came to my house to kill me also, but I was not fool enough to go to the door and be led out by them.

This man Tobias Gibson was the captain and leader of the mob. He said he wanted to have the two Democratic members of the house of representatives elected in order to secure those two votes for his brother as United States Senator.

This man Gibson was a candidate on the Democratic ticket for district attorney.

I was compelled to leave my home in Terre Bonne Parish to save my life; also a large number of Republicans were compelled to leave, and are now refugees in your city.

Respectfully, yours, etc.,

R. B. JOHNSON.

Maj. ANDREW HERO, Jr., City.

I append also a statement showing the perils of vote-distributing for Warmoth, giving the adventures of Mr. William Adams, a resident of Ouachita Parish, who was shot to death by unknown persons at the court-house in that parish:

[From the Daily City Item, Wednesday evening, April 25.]

WAS IT ASSASSINATION?—REMARKABLE ACCUSATIONS FROM MONROE.

The Item yesterday received information from Monroe to the effect that on Sunday, April 22, William Adams, a resident of Ouachita Parish, was shot to death by unknown parties at the court-house in that town. According to this authority Adams was first shot outside of the court-house, wounded in the nose and arm, and was subsequently captured and taken into the building, where he was killed by the mob. The provocation that led to this assassination is said to be as follows:

William Adams was a Republican, and just before the election he came to this city and obtained from Governor Warmoth authority to distribute the Republican tickets in Ouachita, Franklin, and other parishes of that district, and rendered himself very obnoxious to those who dominated the politics of that district, and that this led to his assassination. The number of men engaged in the affair could not be ascertained. On inquiring why no telegrams or other intelligence had been sent to the city, the gentleman said that there was an an apparent reign of terror in Monroe, and that the people did not dare send out this news for fear of being assaulted.

Still another statement is that he was first shot in the court-house yard, wounded in the nose and arm; that he then retreated to his house, from which he subsequently returned to the court-house. Upon entering the court-house a scuffling was heard, and it is supposed that he was killed with knives. Shortly after a carriage was driven away from the court-house, which is supposed to have contained his body, which has not been found.

I received this morning a private letter from New Orleans, from which I will read an extract as illustrating the condition of affairs in Louisiana:

It is said that thousands of colored men voted for Nicholls. I do not know if this is true; but I know that I was born in Louisiana, educated at the college of the Jesuit Fathers of New Orleans. I have always lived here. I know thousands of colored men, and I have never met one who was a Democrat.

I hope the North will understand the South, and will be solid in the coming campaign. For President the Republican party will not have a single electoral vote from the South.

There are many Republicans in the South, but no Republican party. With the despotism of the Democratic party of the South an organization is not possible.

And this is the "fair vote and honest count" which was promised by the governor of Louisiana!

Upon the subject of spurious and manifestly fabricated majorities, or majorities that exceed the entire registered vote, the statistics are interesting. For instance, in the parish of Bossier, giving Nicholls 4,213 votes and Warmoth 95, making a total of 4,308 cast, the registered vote of the parish is but 3,603, making a difference between the votes returned as cast and the registered vote of 705.

In East Carroll Parish the registered vote was 2,576, of which Nicholls received 2,680, or 104 in excess of the entire registration, and Warmoth the remainder of 285, being a total of 389 votes more than appeared upon the lists.

Adjoining the parish of East Carroll is Madison, where the law was entirely "suspended." The registered vote in Madison was 3,360, of which 279 were white and 3,081 colored. Nicholls's vote was 2,530, with not a single vote for Warmoth, so that Nicholls received 170 votes more than the entire number of voters, white and colored, in the parish.

The parish of Concordia had a registered vote of 4,201, of which 448 were white and 3,753 colored. Nicholls received 4,219 votes in Concordia, being 18 votes more than the entire registration, and the Democracy gratuitously gave Warmoth 145, making a total of votes cast apparently 4,364, or an excess of 163 votes above the entire registration.

In Red River Parish the result was still more "unanimous." The registered vote was 1,181, of which Nicholls received 1,679 and Warmoth 78, being a total of 1,757, an excess of 576. Subtracting the registered vote of the parish from the vote received by Nicholls, it will be perceived that the "reform" candidate was given 498 votes more than the entire parish contains. This is a free vote and an honest count.

Coming down to the parish of West Baton Rouge we find a total of 1,811, of which 504 are white and 1,307 colored. In this parish Nicholls was given 1,712 and Warmoth 454, a total of 2,166, making an excess of votes counted above votes registered of 355.

Another illustration of the fulfillment of McEnery's pledge that he would see an "honest and fair election" is found in the vote of Vermillion, in Southwestern Louisiana, a parish whose registered vote is 2,099, of which Nicholls received 1,687 and Warmoth 619, total 2,306, an excess of 211.

In Washington Parish the registered vote was 965, of which Nicholls received 763, Warmoth 271, a total of 1,034, or 69 more votes than the registration shows to have been in the parish. In these precincts and parishes to which I have referred, containing a registered vote of a little less than 20,000, the excess of votes cast above the registration is more than 2,600.

The returning officers evidently thoroughly obeyed the injunction of Governor McEnery to see to it that their parishes returned a large Democratic majority. Upon a fair and reasonable estimate of the actual poll in Louisiana on the 17th day of April there is no room for rational doubt that Warmoth carried the State by not less than 25,000 majority, which was converted by the methods heretofore described into a majority for Nicholls of more than 83,000. It is not surprising that even Democratic newspapers revolt at such an extraordinary and unprecedented result. The Madison Times, a leading Democratic newspaper in Louisiana, declares that:

The ridiculous majority of over 60,000 (or perchance 70,000) will make trouble in local and district matters; the unparalleled Democratic majority will excite derisive sneers through the North, and will go far towards electing a Republican President (though as opposed to Mr. Cleveland that would not be a terrible misfortune), and when these things come about the curses both loud and deep showered on the head of S. D. McEnery will make him quail in dismay before the storm.

Only a suspension of the law could produce such an unnecessary and exaggerated majority, and Louisiana, and the Democratic party, if it indorses such methods, will become a by-word and a reproach. A weapon has been put into Republican hands to break Democratic heads, and the heads will surely suffer. A mistake has been made, and it will not be long before everybody will know it.

Mr. Thomas Fortune, a colored Democrat of scholarship and culture, in a letter to the Brooklyn Eagle upon the results of the election, says:

You know my opinions are more Democratic than Republican, and that for years I have striven to liberalize the opinions of colored votes to the point of viewing men and parties as intelligent citizens and tax-payers rather than as narrow, ignorant, and unreasoning partisans.

* * * * * * *

The 153 electoral votes of the South predicated upon a "system of suppression and oppression," will yet become as troublesome an old man of the sea on the back of the Democratic party as they once were upon that of the Republican party—a source of weakness where they now appear a source of strength. Mark that.

I believe in the broad Democracy of Jefferson, Jackson, and Tilden. I repudiate the bastard Democracy of the South, based upon a "system of suppression and oppression."

* * * * * * *

I do not here enter into the admitted difficulties arising out of the race problem in the South. I understand them as well as any other man born and reared and educated in the South. They are systematically magnified for partisan advantage. I simply pin myself down to the scandalous outrage of constitutional guaranty and Democratic principle embodied in the system of suppression and oppression. Our Constitution recognizes neither race nor creed in its citizenship. It covers all the races of men except the Chinese. It is a question of principle, and we can not admit that it is just to outrage the principle in Louisiana without admitting that it is just to outrage it in New York.

Mr. President, it is by such performances as these in Louisiana that the South is kept solid by the Democratic party, and it is by such pretensions as those set forth by the Senator from Indiana that an attempt is to be made to divide the North at the approaching election. It is an absurd and intolerable declaration that—but for the attitude and influence of Horatio Seymour, Thomas A. Hendricks, Allen G. Thurman, William A. Richardson, and their political associates and followers, not only would the Union never have been restored, but that the dearest and most sacred rights of American citizenship would have been swept away in the blinding storm of partisan wrath, which was most frequently mistaken for patriotic zeal.

Or that the—Democratic party began its career and has maintained it in the broad spirit of nationality and fraternal union. No thought of a disunion of the States ever entered its councils as a party, and it filled the ranks of armies in the North and commanded them with its bravest and best.

No one has ever pretended to assert that there were no Democrats in the Union armies, or that all Democrats were disloyal; but there were no Republicans voluntarily in the rebel armies, nor were there any Republicans who were disloyal. The great mass of the Democrats were on one side and the great mass of the Republicans on the other. There were no Republicans enrolled in the "Sons of Liberty" or as "Knights of the Golden Circle." These were Democrats. Every member of Congress who declared that he would not vote a man or a dollar or a gun to carry on the war for the Union was a Democrat. Every man who described Union soldiers as "Lincoln dogs and hirelings, who deserved to have collars welded about their necks," was a Democrat. All guerrillas and bushwhackers, the men from Union States who entered the Confederate service for plunder—in war cutthroats, in peace horse-thieves—were Democrats. All those who believed that it was honorable warfare to infect and destroy innocent men and women by the introduction of fever-infected clothing, all those were Democrats. Quantrell, Bill Anderson, Dave Livingstone, Hilldebrand, and the James boys belonged then, as they would were they living now, to the Democratic organization.

Equally untenable is the claim that such a party so organized and recruited is the special champion and friend now of the pensioners, and committed to the policy of liberal relief to the surviving soldiers of the Union armies.

The Senator from Indiana enlarged upon the title of the Democracy to this confidence, and insisted that because the President had signed more bills than any other Executive the pretensions of the Democrats were fully sustained. The real question is not how many more has he signed, but how many more has he vetoed? I have examined the record with some care, and the following tabulated statement will be of some interest as exhibiting the number of private pension bills approved and the number of private pension bills vetoed in the last half century.

Name of President.	Number approved.	Number vetoed.
Jackson	176	.....
Polk	160	.....
Taylor	1	.....
Fillmore	62	.....
Pierce	158	.....
Buchanan	117	.....
Lincoln	48	.....
Johnson	431	.....
Grant	499	5
Hayes	329	.....
Arthur	684	.....
Cleveland	801	122

Two pension bills became laws without his signature, and one was passed over his veto.

The statement, however, is not entirely accurate, because in earlier Congresses it was the habit to pass pension bills embracing many persons. One bill, approved May 2, 1830, contained 130 different persons by name, who were pensioned for various reasons, but in the computation under the administration of Jackson this bill is counted only as one.

The President has been consistent in but one course apparently, and that is in his opposition to Federal soldiers and to liberal bills for their relief. He vetoed the disability bill last session, but found no difficulty in approving the service bill for the surviving soldiers of the Mexican war, under which the first pension was granted to the Confederate general John S. Williams, of Kentucky; another to the widow of the rebel general George E. Pickett, the Confederate hero of Gettysburgh, who holds certificate 1056; to the widow of the rebel general Braxton Bragg, who holds certificate No. 4040; the widow of the rebel general Gideon J. Pillow, who commanded at Fort Donelson with Floyd and Buckner and escaped during the night previous to the capitulation.

The Senator from Indiana declares that the—

> Especial anger of Republican leaders is excited because the vote of the South in a national contest is solid against their party. Will some one on the other side of the Chamber, and with even the slightest knowledge of human nature, tell me how the vote of the South could be other than it is? You had political supremacy once from the Potomac to the Rio Grande. At one time and another for seven years and more after the war you had the ascendency in every State of the entire South; you elected Republican governors, State officers, and Legislatures in them all. You had the purse with which to corrupt, the sword with which to intimidate, and a Republican Congress and President to enact and to enforce all laws necessary for the overthrow of individual and State rights and for the consolidation of your power.
> You seized upon the enfranchised negro and sought to organize and hurl him against the peace and security of political and social order, and for a time and in many instances you succeeded. You and your allies, who mostly went there from the North, not "allies of the Confederacy," but allies for power and plunder, swept down upon the helpless South like Hyder-Ali upon the Carnatic, and left scarcely a vestige from which to hope and with which to rebuild, except its never-failing soil and its stanch and splendid manhood. You despoiled States of their resources, and you dismantled them of their credit. You issued their bonds and securities in the interest of fraud, and hawked them on the markets, like counterfeit paper, for anything you could get.
> You ordered investigations, and sent committees and commissions, composed of your bitterest partisans, into the South, for the purpose of scraping together and putting in permanent form the perjuries of vagabonds and scoundrels with which to defame and blacken the reputations of the Southern people. They were proclaimed in some instances as bandits, and in others as barbarians. You repeatedly annulled honest elections when their results were favorable to the stability and good order of society and against the schemes of partisan plunderers. You would have overturned the State government of South Carolina in 1876, and again sacked the substance and the credit of the State, had it not been that a giant stood in your way upheld by the public judgment of the world.
> You provoked collisions between the two races in order to justify military usurpation and to inflame sectional hate at the North. Sir, the career of the Republican party during its ascendency in the South was a career of crime, unrelieved by a single act tending to promote the education, the progress, the prosperity, the peace, or the happiness of either race, white or black. It reared and left behind it no monument of patriotism, wisdom, or benevolence to tell future ages that its presence had been a blessing and not a curse. And when the future historian comes to inquire why and how and exactly when the Republican party lost its tremendous hold on the prostrate South and slunk away to return no more forever, he will be puzzled to make answer in definite details, but he will finally write that its administration throughout all that region had become so vast and intolerable a scandal, filling the civilized world with its foul odors, that an intelligent and omnipotent public opinion here and everywhere demanded its downfall and the restoration on its ruins of home rule and decent government.
> And it is this party, sir, whose leaders now fume and resolve and threaten the Southern people and their States, because they do not welcome it back again into power with all its unhallowed memories and its predaceous instincts and habits! As well might you expect a frontier settlement to welcome with joy a second invasion of tomahawks and scalping-knives.

In the controversy that is now before us the Republican party is not asking for power, but it is demanding justice. It has made incredible sacrifices in the past for justice, and it now stands, as it has done hitherto, insisting that there shall be equal rights and exact justice in every portion of the Republic.

The Republican party, with its illustrious membership and its record of imperishable glory, does not suffer from the denunciations of the Senator from Indiana, who in the same speech denounced Seward as a political charlatan; Stanton, in his grave, as an organizer of defeat; and the brave, patriotic Pope as a vain, inglorious, and incompetent military pretender.

In the supreme struggle for constitutional liberty, in the crisis of the national life, millions of patriots responded to the call of the Government for defense against the conspirators and traitors who first sought to betray and then to destroy. But for their incredible sufferings and sacrifices, their patriotic devotion, their death, we should have no country, no vast continental commonwealth shored by the oceans, comprehending all zones, all creeds, and all tongues, gratifying the highest hopes and realizing the loftiest aspirations of humanity. Instead of this majestic Union there would have been an incoherent assemblage of jealous and discordant communities, rent with internal feuds and quarrels intestine, without permanence or stability. The United States of America would have been blotted from the map; its past would have been a troubled and distempered dream; its fragments would have been a present menace to prosperity and peace. Our future would be a frustrated and broken hope, contemplated by tyrants with derision and by their victims with despair. Our history and our traditions, the teachings of our sages, the eloquence of our statesmen, the achievements of our heroes on land and sea, would have been distributed among insignificant claimants or dispersed and dissipated like the trivial assets of an insolvent partnership. The Declaration of Independence would have been an empty echo, the Constitution of the United States an antiquarian relic, and American citizenship a forgotten and abandoned attribute.

Averting our gaze from this tragic and lamentable spectacle of what might have been, we behold in the far centuries that are to come the prophetic vision of a united, prosperous, and happy America; a vast, homogeneous dominion of freemen, rulers of the continent from the polar zone to the Gulf, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, enjoying the franchises of liberty inherited from us and perpetuating the arts of peace. And no generation will ever forget, as they assemble to recall the memories of this age, that the nation holds in its fertile and tender breast no more priceless treasure than the consecrated dust of those who died that this might be a government of laws and not of men, and that liberty and constitutional government might not forever perish from the earth. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, before the Senator from Kansas yields the floor, hoping that he will be glad to hear the sentence a portion of which he quoted to the Senate from memory, I will call his attention to the official record of Congress on page 202, under date of April 3, 1879, three lines marked, constituting the sentence of mine a portion of which he read.

Mr. INGALLS. Give them to the Reporter.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will leave the Senator to make any correction he pleases when the Secretary shall read the words.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> We do not intend to stop until we have stricken the last vestige of your war measures from the statute-book, which, like these, were born of the passions incident to civil strife and looked to the abridgment of the liberty of the citizen.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is all.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, there is a fable with regard to a mountain in labor, a vast object struggling to express or bring forth something worthy of itself, and at last it is recorded that a poor, small mouse was seen creeping up into the distance from the labors of the mountain. The spectators had expected to see volcanic action, power displayed, but when the end came they saw nothing of the kind, and I have never been more reminded of that fable than on this occasion.

Two hours have passed away. The blare of trumpets and notes brought here a large audience, and what have they heard, and what have they seen? Were it not for here and there a small, old, stale allusion to myself happening long years ago, and despised then as despised now, I would not rise to my feet to say a single word.

The Senator from Kansas mistakes himself. When I made my remarks last week, few and brief, but truthful, coming from my heart, my allusions to him were not because of him personally. I had no animosity towards him; I have no rivalry with him; I have no antagonism against him; but when I found the great Republican party, an organization worthy of battle anywhere, placing him in the highest position in the gift of the Government short of the Presidency of the United States, and listening to his accusation and arraignment here on this floor, I passed him by to ask the Republican party whether they expected to write the history of the war in falsehood, whether they expected to dictate a tome in history that men who were Democrats, faithful and loyal to their party, were disloyal thereby, notwithstanding the great services they had rendered their country.

That was the occasion of my allusion to the Senator from Kansas. He was more incidental to my remarks than protection is to a tariff for revenue. I alluded to him as incidental to my remarks. Why should I assail him?

Mr. President, as I have said, men mistake themselves, and the Senator from Kansas more than anybody I know. He has not been alive politically since the 6th of March last. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] disposed of him, and he has been dead politically ever since. [Applause in the galleries.] He has been walking——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend. If there is a repetition of this applause in the galleries, the Chair will peremptorily order the Sergeant-at-Arms to clear the galleries.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is right. It ought to have been done some time ago, however, to make the thing fair. [Laughter.]

I repeat, Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas has been walking the streets and posing before the world as a political vitality since the 6th of March. As an old friend of mine once said to me in Indianapolis, who was in failing health, "I have been dead, but I am walking around to save funeral expenses." [Laughter.] So the Senator from Kansas has been walking around to save funeral expenses in a political way. The Senator from Kentucky settled that question.

The only criticism I have seen in the press of the country in regard to my remarks of last Wednesday alluding to the Senator from Kansas has been that I galvanized the corpse. I disclaim any purpose of that kind, because I made no attack upon him, intended none, but I did intend an attack upon the Republican party. I regard the Senator from Kansas, whatever his harsh opinions may be of me, as the most brilliant and capable man on his side of the Chamber, and elevated to its highest position consequently; and when I listened to the amazing and extraordinary speech of his on the 6th of March I passed him by and I arraigned the party of which he is made the leader here because no member of that party on that side of the Chamber, either here or in the other branch of Congress, disclaimed his terrible assault upon the most brilliant names in American history.

That, Mr. President, is the reason why his name came under my review, not because of personal hostility, not because of any desire to injure him—far from it. But it seems to me the Senator is mistaken in another thing. He not only saw fit to descend from the chair to make the assault of which I am speaking, but he readily assumed the rôle of orator for the occasion, if I may so say.

Mr. President, I was raised upon a farm in the country. I have seen the splendid peacock upon a high barn-yard fence posing of a summer morning, looking at his own feathers in the glare of the sun, delighted with himself and vocalizing the whole neighborhood with his harsh, unmusical, and unmeaning cries, unmindful of the fact that there were more useful fowls in that barn-yard; and I would commend that fable, however feebly told, to the Senator from Kansas. He is not the only bird of beauty or of usefulness on the Republican side of the Senate, and if he will get anybody else to assume the responsibility which I shall speak of directly of his 6th of March speech, I will divide that responsibility with him and with them.

Sir, that Senator saw fit to-day to arraign me. How useless a task! What a waste of time! He read here the old, stale, putrid, rotten slanders of years gone by, on which I have trampled in forty campaigns. They sounded to me like the voices of old, decayed, hackneyed political campaign liars of the last twenty-five years. That I ever uttered one word derogatory to the Union soldiers, that I ever talked about their having collars around their necks, is so base a lie, so infamous a falsehood, that the black walls of perdition can not repeat them with impunity. I say so. When the war closed I ran a race for Congress in a Republican district of 1,500 majority, in 1868, with Seymour and Blair up for President and Vice-President, and they were Democrats. I carried that district in the first race I ran after the war was over and the soldiers all home, because the soldiers all believed as I now pronounce every word of that slander a calumny and falsehood. I pronounce it so here.

I do not defend myself. The people of Indiana have defended me. I do not need to stand here and respond to what the Senator from Kansas has said. I spit upon it; I spurn it; I kick it from me; I despise it; and I say to the Senator from Kansas, without meaning the full extent of what perhaps my words may convey, that it is not in his power to fish up from the sewers of infamy old campaign lies and make them respectable in the Senate of the United States; but it is possible for him in a short step to put himself on equality with them.

What have the people of Indiana answered on these questions? What have they said? I stand here, sir, with four commissions as a member of this body. I never have had an opponent in my own party; popular majorities have risen on the legislative tickets from 20,000 to 30,000 in my State. The largest majority on joint ballot ever given a man since the State was in the Union has been given for me; and let me say to the Senator from Kansas, in order to warn him against the temerity and recklessness with which he has dealt with me, that no committee ever followed me here; no suspicion ever followed me here; no affidavit charging that I bought my way ever followed me here and aspersed my title. Never was I whitewashed by any report as a Senator; and it ill becomes the Senator from Kansas to arraign me, standing as I do upon the record given me by the people of Indiana. I, sir, can afford, infinitely afford to despise and contemn the reckless charges made by the Senator from Kansas.

I will do the Senator from Kansas this justice, as I look at it: I have admired his brilliancy, his scholastic habit, but he was born with inaccuracy marked upon him. If he was my long-lost brother, and I was looking for the stripling, I should look for "Inaccuracy" marked on him somewhere. He does not state things correctly and can not do so. Why, sir, a few moments ago, when reading the platform of the Democratic party in 1864, he stopped in the middle of a sentence at a comma. I have it here, and I will allude to it again. I would commend to the Senator, with his brilliant talents and his great leadership, a straight, old-fashioned adherence to the truth. Imagination he has imperial, power of language beyond almost anybody; but there is something more than that necessary to carry weight and strength, and that is to know your facts. When he assails me, as he has done here, I answer back that the people of Indiana have settled these questions and settled them as I have in many a hard-fought battle against the miserable and slanderous accusations that have been made.

Mr. President, I have observed the Senator from Kansas and what he has said in regard to his assault on McClellan and Hancock. I pray my Father in Heaven to smite me if I would do him or anybody else injustice; but he did here on this floor denounce McClellan and Hancock as false and traitorous to their country in war, not in peace, and I will show it—not in peace, after the war was over, but in war. I looked carefully over what the Senator said at a Grand Army meeting, when he spoke of the fact that his allusion was to their adherence to the Confederacy after the Confederacy fell! Nobody thought of such an explanation. He was inaccurate even then in stating that McClellan rode down the Avenue. He did not. It is so reported; I take it back, as the Senator shakes his head, and he may consider it as dropped; but that was the way he was reported.

But, Mr. President, how could George B. McClellan and General Hancock be allies of the Confederacy when it was no more? Just look at this thing broadly and squarely. The Senator from Kansas stands before the public as pretending that he alluded to those grand officers of the Union Army as allies of a vanished cause, of a broken cause; allies of the Confederacy when the president of the Confederacy was in irons in Fortress Monroe; allies of the Confederacy when every one of its armies was flying, when there was no organization of its government, when the world spoke not of it as a Confederacy.

Let me show the Senator from Kansas that he might have corrected this alleged false impression, had he seen fit to do so, very soon. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], with a superb composure equal to his superb eloquence, while on the floor said, speaking of the Senator from Kansas:

> In his intemperate zeal he has not hesitated to invade graves. In his frantic efforts to stir prejudice between sections that have already been reunited he goes into the trenches of the soldiery, and not on my side but on his side, and drags up for abuse and vilification before the American Senate such men as traced with their own unblemished swords in blood the brightest pages of American history. McClellan and Hancock are to be denounced upon this floor as allies of Confederates. Might it not have been in better taste, more creditable at least to the courage and to the candor of that Senator, if he had made that charge before both of these men were dead?

"I made the charge often," interrupted the Senator from Kansas, before they were dead that they were allies of the Confederates. The Senator from Kentucky responded:

> Then so much the worse for the Senator from Kansas. What warrant or ground had he for that, except that they were both different from himself, at least in political faith, if we may not hope in many other regards?

Then said the eloquent Senator from Kentucky:

> Hancock an ally of the Confederates!

This was the Senator standing there and the Senator from Kansas over there.

> Was he so regarded and believed when, weltering in his blood upon Cemetery Heights, he refused to be taken from the field, and yet persisted in giving orders to check the last advance of Longstreet's irresistible veterans?

These two Senators were standing and sitting near by and face to face. Here was the question hurled from the Senator from Kentucky, "Was he so regarded and believed when weltering in his blood on Cemetery Heights?" The question was then asked of the Senator from Kansas which he could have answered, was he so regarded when commanding at Gettysburgh, when leading the Union forces. Was it then, says the Senator from Kentucky, that you meant to charge that he was an ally of the Confederacy?

The Senator from Kansas says now that he meant long years afterwards. The Senator from Kentucky gave him a chance, and I use the words that he was more imposing in utterance because it gave an opportunity to the Senator from Kansas to answer. Did he answer the Senator from Kentucky, pausing himself there as we all remember, asking whether Hancock was regarded as an ally when bleeding at Cemetery Heights, commanding the Union lines, resisting Longstreet's charge? The Senator from Kansas, who is alert in debate, circumspect, and clear, sitting where he sits now, could have answered him, "I do not mean then; I mean afterwards when politics raged, when he became a candidate for the Presidency." That is what he says now.

Sir, without meaning any disrespect to the Senator from Kansas, his present position is a miserable afterthought. It is not what he impressed upon the country then. The Senator from Kentucky gave him an opportunity to disclaim all that he charges now, and he saw fit to sit in his chair and let it go by, and let the brilliant and, as he to-day declared, the superb Hancock go under the ban of an ally of the Confederacy. There is no escape from this.

I repeat, not for the purpose of tautology or iteration, but to emphasize the fact before the country, that the Senator from Kansas said he had often charged Hancock with being an ally of the Confederacy, and when the Senator from Kentucky asked him "When? Was it when he bled at Gettysburgh? Was it when he lay in those lines and refused to be carried away?" and the Senator from Kansas opened not his mouth. It is too late, sir. The verdict of history is against him and will stand against him.

But what else is there on this subject?

Mr. President, we seem to be parading in the midst of a false scene, the creation of some magician with malicious purpose, with mischief in his eye. George B. McClellan an ally of the Confederacy! There is a passage in the speech of the Senator from Kansas which I spared him last Wednesday, which I forbore to bring forward here, which is so crushing, killing, and conclusive that I did not discuss it at that time. Said the Senator from Kansas on that occasion:

> We know why Hancock was nominated. We know why that other ally of the Confederacy, George B. McClellan, was nominated, who had just declared that the war was a failure after he had been trying for two years to make it so.

The last part of that sentence is what I spared—"after he had been trying for two years to make it so." He declared the war a failure after trying two years to make it so! Sir, that covers more than the period of his entire service. He was in the service not over sixteen months. I think I said fourteen months the other day. If I did, perhaps I shortened it more than I should have done.

The Senator from Kansas says that "for two years," so as to make it sure, from the time that he was brought here from his brilliant military and successful record in West Virginia until he was deposed in November, 1862, he had tried to make the war a failure.

The Senator from Kansas is an adept in the use of language. He knows the meaning of language, and I know him too well to suppose that he will complain when I hold him to the meaning of his language.

Benedict Arnold never did more than that. He tried to make the war of the Revolution a failure. He negotiated down the banks of the Hudson in the dark. He took André across the river and called him Mr. Anderson, clothed him in disguise, and sent him back. He was to accept his $10,000 in gold and a brigadiership in the British army, which he did, and did for what? To make the war of the Revolution a failure. No bitterer charge can be brought against Benedict Arnold than the Senator from Kansas brought against George B. McClellan, and he knows it as well as I do. He knows that his charge that McClellan was an ally of the Confederacy does not apply to the civil period subsequent to the war. He knows that his charge that McClellan was false to his country and an ally of the Confederacy is explained by that portion of the sentence which says he had tried to make the war a failure. A marshal of the army of France surrendered 180,000 men at Metz and was ordered to be shot to death. He only tried to make the war against Prussia a failure; that was all. He failed in his duty. He was forced from his command, and it is all covered by the language of the Senator from Kansas that he desired to make the war a failure.

More base, more infamous conduct can not be attributed to a man on the earth than that he wears the epaulets, takes the sword, takes the honors of the country, goes into the field with a false heart desiring to make a war a failure; and that, allow me to say to the Senator from Kansas, is what he charged upon this gentleman, this soldier, and this patriot. You can not make the country believe that of George B. McClellan. It is false from top to bottom. Before Richmond in that dreadful, bloody contest of seven days, with one-third of his rightful army held from him—the Senators around me of the Confederate army will bear witness to what I say—McClellan was driven and beaten every day for six days, fighting stubbornly and hard against the first flower of the Confederate power before they were defeated, before their forces were stricken, before they had been decimated in battle; and yet that man, General McClellan, held the confidence of his men. On the seventh day he gathered his forces about him, every man believing in him, and at the battle of Malvern Hill, his artillery parked and his infantry steady as veterans to their holy cause, he inflicted upon the Confederate forces almost a fatal and final overthrow. That was the manner of man that is said to have planned and desired the failure of the war during all the time he was there!

Why should I not speak as I did last week? Why should I not speak for the truth of history? Why should I not say what I knew to be true? Why should I not refute as far as my humble voice could the dictates of partisan falsehood and madness on this question?

George B. McClellan was the Democratic candidate for the Presidency in 1864. The Senator says that he was practically an ally of the Confederacy after the war was over. I have said all I wish to say in my speech of Wednesday last about the great battle of Antietam. It is as important as any other battle-field of the world where the destinies of nations were turned. Had the result been different the history of this country would have been different; and when McClellan rode into that fight quietly but firmly in his saddle there were no such men around him as the Senator from Kansas, who would say he was trying to overthrow our country. There was nothing against him in the voice of the country then, whatever might have been suppressed in the War Department or in the hearts of rivals. There were faith and hope in his courage and in his capacity, and the result showed that the faith and hope were not misplaced.

But, sir, the Senator from Kansas sees fit to attack General McClellan as a candidate for the Presidency or in civil life as if there was something wonderful there. He read from the Chicago platform of 1864, and stopped at the words "cessation of hostilities," when the sentence continues as follows—> with a view to an ultimate convention of the States, or other peaceable means, to the end that at the earliest practicable moment peace may be restored on the basis of the Federal union of the States.

No thought of disunion. Whether the resolution was wise or unwise, I am not discussing; I am discussing McClellan to-day, and I ask what said he on this question that justifies the Senator from Kansas in aspersing his great fame in order to call an audience together to denounce a man as faithful to duty as was ever known in human history? McClellan in his letter of acceptance of the Presidential nomination in September, 1864, said:

> It is unnecessary for me to say to you that this nomination comes to me unsought. I am happy to know that when the nomination was made, the record of my public life was kept in view.

He continues:

> The effect of long and varied service in the Army during war and peace, has been to strengthen and make indelible to my mind and heart the love and reverence for the Union, Constitution, laws, and flag of our country impressed upon me in early youth. These feelings have thus far guided the course of my life, and must continue to do so to its end.
> The existence of more than one government over the region which once owned our flag is incompatible with the peace, the power, and the happiness of the people.
> The preservation of our Union was the sole avowed object for which the war was commenced. It should have been conducted for that object only, and in accordance with those principles which I took occasion to declare when in active service.
> Thus conducted, the work of reconciliation would have been easy, and we might have reaped the benefits of our many victories on land and sea.
> The Union was originally formed by the exercise of a spirit of conciliation and compromise.

Is that disloyal?

> To restore and preserve it the same spirit must prevail in our councils and in the hearts of the people. The re-establishment of the Union in all its integrity is and must continue to be the indispensable condition in any settlement.

And that is the expression of a man who it is said wanted the war to be a failure—"must continue to be the indispensable condition in any settlement."

> So soon as it is clear, or even probable, that our present adversaries are ready for peace, upon the basis of the Union, we should exhaust all the resources of statesmanship practiced by civilized nations and taught by the traditions of the American people, consistent with the honor and interests of the country, to secure such peace, re-establish the Union, and guaranty for the future the constitutional rights of every State.

Was there ever broader statesmanship? Was there ever broader constitutional thought? Was there ever anything more worthy of commendation, however it may strike the mind of the Senator from Kansas?

General McClellan continues:

> The Union is the one condition of peace—we ask no more.

Sir, there has been so much calumny, so much inconsiderate and reckless slander against George B. McClellan that while I am on my feet and hardly fit to be upon my feet, I intend to stay here until I do his great and beloved memory some justice. He continues:

> Let me add, what I doubt not was, although unexpressed, the sentiment of the convention, as it is of the people they represent, that when any one State is willing to return to the Union, it should be received at once, with a full guaranty of all its constitutional rights.

Is that what the Senator from Kansas objects to?

If a frank, earnest, and persistent effort to obtain these objects should fail, the responsibility for ulterior consequences will fall upon those who remain in arms against the Union. But the Union must be preserved at all hazards.

I could not—

Says McClellan—

I could not look in the face of my gallant comrades of the Army and Navy who have survived so many bloody battles, and tell them that their labors and the sacrifice of so many of our slain and wounded brethren had been in vain, that we had abandoned that Union for which we have so often periled our lives. A vast majority of our people, whether in the Army and Navy or at home, would, as I would, hail with unbounded joy the permanent restoration of peace, on the basis of the Union under the Constitution without the effusion of another drop of blood. But no peace can be permanent without Union.

As to other questions, he proceeds to discuss them. Sir, look back to the war; its glorious victories and even its glorious defeats under McClellan answer for his constancy and fidelity in war; that letter answers for the same in peace; and yet to-day, after time for consideration, the Senator from Kansas has no apology to make for standing here on the 6th of March, and saying that for two years George B. McClellan had endeavored to make the war for the Union a failure.

Am I, or am I not, justified before the American people in answering as I did, not in any personal hostility, malignancy, or antagonism, but in calling the attention of the country to the fact that the highest officer now in the Government by Republican suffrage dares to confront the common sense and the common decency of the nation with a charge of this kind? He had a chance to disavow as to McClellan when the Senator from Kentucky interrogated him. I can only say he had a chance not to have made this aspersion upon McClellan.

There is another matter in this regard. In speaking of the support which the Democratic party gave to McClellan and Hancock he introduced the case of our support of Horace Greeley. Sir, I was not under any circumstances for Horace Greeley. I did all I could to prevent the Democratic party from taking what I thought was a false step. But when they took that step—I am one of those men who hold that a party is wiser than an individual—I bowed my head and went to defeat with them. But I was not prepared to have the Senator from Kansas or anybody else, because we did so, and in connection with the names of McClellan and Hancock, say that there was never an occasion wherein the Democratic party did not "commit illicit intercourse with the degraded elements of the North," characterizing McClellan and Hancock and Horace Greeley as the degraded elements of the North. I see that in the pamphlet speech (and I congratulate him upon his sense of propriety to use no other word) the word "subservient" is put in the pamphlet speech instead of the word "degraded," as appears in the RECORD. It appears in the RECORD that the Democratic party in supporting McClellan and Hancock was in "illicit intercourse with the degraded elements of the North." I congratulate the Senator on striking out that word and making it "subservient elements of the North" in the pamphlet speech.

Sir, what more should I say? I do not intend on this occasion to discuss in detail the affairs of the South. I do say that my statement in regard to Louisiana, notwithstanding the denial of the Senator from Kansas, will be substantially sustained by the figures of history and by her able and accomplished representatives on this floor. I commit, with all confidence, the task to them.

Sir, the Senator from Kansas saw fit to impugn my right to speak upon military affairs. After quoting reports and assigning the authority of the Cincinnati Commercial for what I said, he arraigned me as one whom he thought most likely had fought the battles of the war. He shakes his head to me now, and it only shows that inaccuracy is indelibly written on his face—a want of memory, no more.

Why, sir, let me say to the Senator from Kansas that there is something queer in his own history. He has not faltered or shrunk from bringing up the harsh, the old, stale, exploded, and decayed slanders that have been uttered against me. I uttered nothing against his personal character when I spoke here a week ago. I did arraign him as the representative of his party, and through him I sought to arraign his party sitting around him there, and to make them stand by him or stand off.

I do not intend here this afternoon to pay compliments to the Senator from Kansas. If I did I would say he was bolder than his associates, and brighter, too; but be that as it may, how comes it that he becomes a military censor? How comes it that he becomes a military critic? It happens that I have looked through the books. The Senator from Kansas came here young, handsome, and brilliant, in 1873, and the Directories—I have them here from that day twelve years forward—contain an unbroken statement. I must say that the Senator from Kansas had a care to see to it that all he had done in life was put into that biography. There was no official position missed. He had been secretary of the Wyandotte convention, and that was put down, and everything else was put down.

We all know, Mr. President, that it is put down by ourselves, for nobody knows that much about us, and it would be of small consequence whether any one did or not. I do not blame the Senator from Kansas for having it all put in. He tells us he was born in Massachusetts in 1833. It is a good place to be born in, and a good State to emigrate from. I beg pardon of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. My allusion the Senator from Massachusetts will understand when I say that the best emigration I know of on this continent was that whose centennial he spoke so eloquently at Marietta a few weeks ago. When I say to the Senator from Kansas that Massachusetts was a good State for him to be born in and a good State for him to emigrate from, it is no aspersion on that great old classic State which the Senator from Massachusetts does so much to honor.

Mr. HOAR. I shall not undertake to pardon the Senator from Indiana, as he requests, but I recommend him to mercy.

Mr. VOORHEES. Now, don't you know that I am complimenting you? Don't bother me. [Laughter.]

The Senator from Kansas not only tells us where and when he was born, in this biography which I have here, but he tells us where he went to school. He tells us that he read law and that he was admitted to practice law. He tells us when he went to Kansas and what he did there, with a circumstantiality and minutiæ that is extremely creditable to his memory. But, sir, from 1873 until December, 1885, twelve weary years, the fertile memory of that Senator did not remember that he had ever been in the military service of his country in any way, shape, or form, and for twelve years there was a statement without one reference to the great military services he had rendered his country. I have the statement here of his services. Suppose I read it. The Senator spoke two hours; I shall not speak one.

John James Ingalls, of Atchison, was born at Middleton, Mass., December 29, 1833; graduated at Williams College, Williamstown, Mass., in the class of 1855; studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1857, and has since been engaged in the practice of law; removed to Kansas in October, 1858; was a member of the Wyandotte constitutional convention in 1859; secretary of the Territorial council in 1860; secretary of the State senate in 1861; member of the State senate of Kansas from Atchison County in 1862; editor of the Atchison Champion in 1863, 1864, and 1865.

I am not leaving anything out.

Defeated as anti-Lane candidate for lieutenant-governor in 1862, and again in 1864.

He rather prided himself on running against Lane. I do not blame him for that much. [Laughter.]

Was elected to the United States Senate as a Republican to succeed S. C. Pomeroy, Republican; took his seat March 4, 1873, and was re-elected.

Leaving out "re-elected," it answers from the beginning.

Now, Mr. President, it is a singular circumstance, not one that is discreditable at all, yet I do not know—let us see how it reads now. It reads in the same words precisely with one parenthetic invasion. I wish I could say those things like the Senator from Kansas does, so as to be startling and striking; but suppose I call it a parenthetic invasion. Here is his autobiography of twelve years' long standing, in which, after saying everything else that has been said in what I read, he then says:

Major, lieutenant-colonel, and judge-advocate Kansas volunteers, 1863-'65.

Then he goes on and finishes it. That is the parenthetic invasion in the autobiography. Two years ago last December, in December, 1885, the Senator from Kansas remembered for the first time since the war that he had been a major and a lieutenant-colonel and judge-advocate of Kansas volunteers.

Sir, I have read in regard to the fountain of honors. In monarchical countries the king and the emperor constitute the fountain of rank and of military honor. In this country, under our Constitution, the President and this body in its power to confirm, compose the fountain of splendid honor which has given to the world its mighty names. But it seems the Senator from Kansas combines all these powers within himself. In December, 1885, he appointed himself a major in the Directory, and then promoted himself to a lieutenant-colonelcy in the Directory, and became a judge-advocate of Kansas volunteers in the Directory. [Laughter.]

Now, if the Senator from Kansas can find in any adjutant-general's report of the State of Kansas where his name ever appeared as a warrior, even in the diluted and dilapidated form of judge-advocate [laughter], I will let up on him. I say here that the American Army has but three names of Ingalls in it. Rufus Ingalls, and I speak his name with honor, the old Quartermaster-General, the old reliable friend of Grant, was one Ingalls. There was another Ingalls, who commanded a regiment from New York, and when we go out towards Kansas there was another Ingalls, by the name of Pearl P. Ingalls, who was a chaplain of an Iowa regiment. I will ask the Senator from Iowa about him. He prayed and preached. That is the nearest that the name of Ingalls is found in the United States Army in the records of the War Department. Being pious, perhaps he was a cousin of the Senator, but I do not know how that may be. There was none other.

All this, Mr. President, is not much to the American people. The Senator from Kansas and myself know how little it counts, and all that justifies me in bringing it forward is that that Senator on such a slender foundation sees fit to appear as the censor of George B. McClellan and General Hancock.

I ask him if I am not fair in presenting the reasons why somebody else ought to discuss the military aspects of this question besides him. He may say that somebody ought besides me. I will answer, yes, but, sir, I will say that he has no greater claims than I; and here, once for all, whatever shortcomings I may have had, I will stand with him on a popular vote before the soldiers of Indiana or the soldiers of Kansas, and leave this body if I am not approved by them over him. If that is arrogance, it is justified by the provocation.

The Senator from Kansas has alluded to General Hancock's celebrated Order No. 40, issued while he was at New Orleans, issued in the blazing spirit of civil liberty, the supremacy of civil government over the military. It spoke the voice of the fathers and rang out over the country as a bugle-call back to the foundations of the Government. The Senator saw fit to denounce it. I have simply to answer in response that the Supreme Court of the United States, composed of men of the Senator's own political persuasion, construed that order to be constitutional and founded upon the eternal principles of liberty.

Mr. President, I have occupied the floor as long as I designed to do so. I spoke, as I said, a week ago for the truth of history, and here in my heart I reassert and reaffirm what I then said. I am willing that the figures in regard to pensions may be summed up as between those stated by the Senator from Kansas and myself. I will not open that question and go into detail now. As to the history of the South and the history of reconstruction, I stated the true scenes through which I lived, through which I passed, and which I know. I know that the Republican party in its dominancy and supremacy spoliated the South of over $200,000,000, broke in dishonor her civil governments, and but for the fact that she is composed of a people born to self-reliance, born to civilization and the higher arts and walks of life, they would have destroyed them from the earth.

In addition to what I said last week I will say here now that the annals of mankind furnish no other instance where the system of labor, social organization was torn up and turned upside down, slaves set free (which I was glad of) and put on top in political supremacy (which I was not), where society held together as it did in the South. You may attack, you may denounce, you may make war on such a people, but the end is their triumph and your defeat. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. INGALLS. It is not my purpose, Mr. President, to prolong the debate. I regret exceedingly that the Senator from Indiana has thought best to refer to personal matters in connection with my history, to which I do not propose now to advert. My military service was inconspicuous and obscure, and no one is more conscious than I am of the debt that I owe my country, and of the unpaid obligation of gratitude which I am under to those who did what I might under other circumstances have done.

But inasmuch as the Senator from Indiana has seen fit to invite comparison between his record, his history, and his relation and mine to the great questions that have for the past twenty-five years attracted the attention of the country, I feel it to be my duty, in the defense of the truth of history, to put on record the information in my possession, and I have it in a shape I think that he will not deny. I shall refer only to public matters in public records, and I shall venture the affirmation that whatever may have been my own relation to the great struggle between the North and the South, and for constitutional liberty, the Senator from Indiana was from the outset the determined, outspoken, positive, aggressive, and malignant enemy of the Union cause.

Mr. VOORHEES. I pronounce that deliberately false.

Mr. INGALLS. Well——

Mr. VOORHEES. It is absolutely false. I voted for every dollar that was paid to the soldier, for every suit of clothes he wore, and every pension that he has ever had, and for every land warrant. A proper statement——

Mr. INGALLS. I did not interrupt the Senator from Indiana. The Senator from Indiana took seven weeks to reply to my speech of March 6. He came in here with a pile of manuscript bigger than a Hebrew Talmud—sweltering venom sleeping got. I can excuse unpremeditated assaults.

There is something in chance medley and hot foot that is excusable, but the deliberate, premeditated preparation of malignant, unfounded attack is to my mind entirely incompatible with a noble nature. When the Senator from Indiana sat down in the privacy of his closet and called me a Thersites and referred to me as a "judge-advocate," a peevish and paltry politician, as one who, like Job's war-horse, had smelt the battle afar off, if he thinks that is not a personal assault, or if that is his idea of the observance of the comity that ought to prevail among gentleman, well and good.

My relations with the Senator from Indiana for many years have been those of cordiality and friendship, and never was I more surprised than when my attention was called to the vindictive, unfounded, malevolent, and unjustifiable aspersion with which he assailed me in manuscript. I could have borne it if an enemy had done it, but it was, as the Psalmist said, "my own familiar friend." I was unconscious of ever having uttered a word in derogation of the Senator from Indiana. We have agreed on many questions, and in the supreme crisis of my fortunes to which he has referred, unjustifiably referred, referred to me as having been "white-washed," I had his avowed and expressed sympathy; and when I escaped from the conspirators who had followed me from the State capitol to the doors of this Senate Chamber the Senator from Indiana was the very first man to write me a note of congratulation and sympathy.

Yet he comes in here to-day and says: "Thank God, he never had been followed here by a committee that questioned his right to his title to his seat," and with much diffuseness of illustration, for the purpose of casting aspersion and belittling and humiliating me in the eyes of the American people, when I had only referred to his public utterances given in debate, his speeches, which he did not deny.

Mr. VOORHEES. I did.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Indiana did not deny the veracity of the publication that I read.

Mr. VOORHEES. I did.

Mr. INGALLS. He could not do so. It was a verbatim stenographic report, and was certified to by the man who made it.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not want to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. INGALLS. Yes; I shall be very glad to hear the Senator, because I would not do him an injustice.

Mr. VOORHEES. I say that not a word or syllable read by the Senator is true, or believed to be true in Indiana. I have met those accusations and trampled them under foot. I would say further that the Senator's insinuation that I was ever a member of the secret society of the Knights of the Golden Circle is so base and infamously false that I do not know how to choose language to denounce it. I am not so held in my own State. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the rules of the Senate be enforced in regard to applause in the galleries. We have had enough of it.

Mr. INGALLS. I am quite sure that a suggestion to the occupants of the galleries that the rules forbid disorder will be sufficient to secure a strict observance of propriety; and I trust that no violent measures of removal will be taken, and no order will be issued for that purpose. I am sure none of us here are courting applause, and none of us desire any expressions of disapprobation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remind the persons in the galleries that they are here by the courtesy of the Senate and its guests. They have been reminded more than once that the rules of the Senate do not allow any manifestations of satisfaction with or disagreement to what is said in the Senate; and while it would be a harsh measure, as has been suggested, and it would be much regretted, to clear the galleries, if it is necessary for the purpose of enforcing the rules of the Senate it will have to be done.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to arrest any one who makes any applause in the galleries, and to so direct the doorkeepers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms is so directed.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Indiana has just said that he was in favor of the destruction of slavery and that he was opposed to secession, and yet in the published volume of his own speeches there is a reprint of an address delivered by him in Virginia shortly before the war in which he advocates both.

Mr. VOORHEES. Now, will the Senator pardon me a moment?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will be perfectly candid. I did not say that I was in favor of the destruction of slavery in connection with the war, but I did say that I was glad that it took place. Now, make the most of that.

Mr. INGALLS. I will say further than that, that the Senator from Indiana at the time when he delivered that speech had two editions of it prepared, one of them for circulation in the North and one in the South.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is not true.

Mr. INGALLS. Not true! Why, they are accessible to-day, just as much so——

Mr. VOORHEES. Get them and show them.

Mr. INGALLS. They are just as accessible as the Statutes of the United States.

Mr. VOORHEES. Get them and show them. I say it is not true. I have met that on the stump. I have heard campaign falsifiers before.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator pleases to call these campaign rumors because he has heard them for the last fifteen years, and therefore they are not true.

In 1860, after the Senators from South Carolina had withdrawn from this Chamber, and when preparations for war were rife all over the South, and everybody knew that secession was to be, so far as the South could make it, an accomplished fact, the Senator from Indiana wrote a letter, which I shall read. Perhaps he will deny that. It is a letter to Mr. Francis A. Shoup, that he took South with him and filed in the Confederate war department in support of his own application for appointment as a brigadier-general in the Confederate army. The man who received it was appointed a brigadier-general in the Confederate army, and he is now an ecclesiastic in Alabama or somewhere in one of the Southern States. I will read what the Senator from Indiana wrote. Anybody can see it, and anybody who knows his handwriting can identify it. This is the letter:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., December 12, 1860.

My friend, Capt. Francis A. Shoup, is about visiting the South with his sister, on account of her health.

I have known Captain Shoup since our boyhood; we were schoolmates. He is a graduate of West Point, and was in the Army as a lieutenant four years. No more honorable or upright gentleman exists. On the disturbing questions of the day his sentiments are entirely with the South, and one of his objects is a probable home in that section.

I take this occasion to say that his sentiments and my own are in close harmony.

D. W. VOORHEES.

I suppose the Senator will say that that is a campaign slander, the vile calumny of the opposition press.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, that is not a campaign slander, but it is——

Mr. INGALLS. He has trodden it under foot and spat on it.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator pardon me a moment?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. VOORHEES. I say it is not a campaign slander, but it is one of those things the people of Indiana have passed upon for now nearly thirty years.

Mr. INGALLS. The Democratic party of Indiana have passed upon it, I dare say. [Laughter.]

Mr. VOORHEES. They have passed upon it by a very large majority and no——

Mr. INGALLS. Oh, I know the Knights of the Golden Circle have passed upon it.

Mr. VOORHEES. No colporteur or missionary from Kansas can give it any more respectability than the fellows in Indiana have heretofore. I have disposed of them. There was no war when the letter was written; there was not for nearly a year afterwards.

Mr. INGALLS. Sumter fell ninety days afterwards.

Mr. VOORHEES. No, it did not.

Mr. INGALLS. Let me look at the date.

Mr. VOORHEES. In December.

Mr. INGALLS. December 12, 1860. When did Sumter fall?

Mr. VOORHEES. In April.

Mr. INGALLS. In April, 1861?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes.

Mr. INGALLS. December, January, February, March—four months afterwards.

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes; inaccuracy is written on your face.

Mr. INGALLS. Within four months from the time the letter was written Sumter had fallen, and yet the Senator from Indiana says:

I take this occasion to say that his sentiments and my own are in close harmony.

That is something I suppose that the Senator regards as the vile expectoration of a partisan press. He spits on it and treads it under foot and kicks it out of sight. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that that paper was very important and influential in securing Mr. Shoup the appointment of brigadier-general in the Confederate army. When the archives of that government were captured it was sent here to the War Department, and the original is on file to-day.

Jesse D. Bright, from Indiana, was expelled for as small an offense as that from this body, yet the Senator from Indiana ventures to criticise my military record and my right to speak of the relations of George B. McClellan and Hancock to the Democratic party. The Senator from Indiana says that the accusation that he called Union soldiers hirelings and Lincoln dogs, that he said they ought to go to the nearest blacksmith shop and have a collar welded around their necks on which should be inscribed, "My dog. A. Lincoln," is a campaign calumny and slander which has been spat on, and kicked out, and trodden under foot. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that the averment that he made that statement can be substantiated by as credible a witness as there is in this city at this time.

Mr. VOORHEES. It is false, and even if the Senator said it it would be utterly false—just as false coming from the Senator as from the greatest liar ever in the country.

Mr. INGALLS. If this were a police court the Senator from Indiana would be sent to the rock-pile for being drunk and disorderly.

SULLIVAN, IND., September 28, 1868.

We, the undersigned citizens of Sullivan County, Indiana, were present at a public speaking held in Sullivan August 5, 1862, when Hon. D. W. VOORHEES said, speaking in reference to the Union soldiers, that they should go to the nearest blacksmith shop and have an iron collar made and placed around their necks, inscribed thereon in large letters, "My Dog. A. Lincoln," and at the same time he referred to the Union soldiers as Lincoln's dogs and hirelings.

I suppose those are reputable citizens of Indiana. They are not ashamed of their names or their residence. They give their home and their designation. The Senator from Indiana can settle the question of the truth or falsehood with them and not with me. And when the Senator from Indiana states that he has been indorsed by his own party, that all these accusations have been trod on and contumeliously spat upon by the people of Indiana, I say to him that has only been done by the Democratic party of Indiana and not by the people of Indiana. We all know what business the Democratic party of Indiana were engaged in during the war. Seventy thousand of them were Knights of the Golden Circle, conspiring against this Union. They entered into combinations, as General Holt states in his report on that subject, for the purpose of——

1. Aiding soldiers to desert, and harboring and protecting deserters.
2. Discouraging enlistments and resisting the draft.
3. Circulation of disloyal and treasonable publications.
4. Communicating with, and giving intelligence to, the enemy.
5. Aiding the enemy by recruiting for them, or assisting them to recruit within our lines.
6. Furnishing the rebels with arms, ammunition, etc.
7. Co-operating with the enemy in raids and invasions.
8. Destruction of Government property.
9. Destruction of private property and persecution of loyal men.
10. Assassination and murder.

And it is susceptible of proof that they did conspire to murder Governor Morton, to overturn the State government and put it in the possession of the rebels; and this organization, to which the Senator from Indiana says he never belonged, had a ritual and organization of which 112 copies were found in his office—in the office of the Senator from Indiana—at the time when Hancock was at the bloody angle. In that same office was found correspondence between the Senator from Indiana and a Senator from New Jersey for the purpose of furnishing arms, 20,000 stand of them, not to the National Government, for the Senator from Indiana was not in sympathy with that at that time; not to the State government of Indiana, because that was in other and loyal hands; but for the purpose, as may be imagined, of carrying out the objects and purposes of this organization.

I am aware that the Senator from Indiana states and has stated that although these papers were found in his office, it was not then occupied by him. He is entitled to the benefit of the doubt. He states that he had abandoned the practice of law and was not intending to resume it; but I have here a list of what was found in his office at the same time when these 112 copies of the ritual and rules of organization of the Knights of the Golden Circle were found there, and he never denied it. He afterwards said that there had been an unwarrantable search of his private papers. General Carrington is a well-known man, and has stated publicly what was found in the office of the Senator from Indiana that did belong to him at the time when "these papers" were found.

The papers referred to are 112 copies of the ritual of the O. A. K., a treasonable order, aiming to overturn the Government of the United States, of whose Congress you are a member.

* * * * * * *

Your law library and office furniture were in the office where "these papers" were found.

You had declined renomination for Congress and the office as not for rent as late as April, 1864.

The ritual had been issued in the autumn of 1863. Your Congressional documents were in the office where "these papers" were found.

Your speeches, up to March, of your entire Congressional career, with the "John Brown" speech, were in the office where "these papers" were found.

The correspondence of Senator Wall, of New Jersey, under his frank, indorsing a proposition to furnish you with 20,000 stand of Garibaldi rifles, just imported, "for which he could vouch," was in the office where "these papers" were found.

The correspondence of C. L. Vallandigham, from Windsor, Canada West, assuring you "our people will fight," and that "he is ready," and fixing a point on the "Lima road" at "which to meet you," was in the office where "these papers" were found.

There is a little more historical information on that subject which I think may be valuable. In the rebel archives was found a letter from Mr. Clement C. Clay, dated Welland Hotel, St. Catherine's, July 11, 1864, addressed to Hon. Jacob Thompson, Montreal. Lest I may seem inaccurate I believe I will have the whole letter printed. I take an extract from it. It is full of confidential communications to Mr. Thompson as an agent of the rebel Confederacy, tells him what is being done by the Sons of Liberty and the Knights of the Golden Circle, advises methods for the purpose of releasing Confederate prisoners, and he says:

The only fear is, they will not be prepared for it, and will be surprised and stupefied without notice. You need not fear, as they are of the sworn brotherhood. Voorhees is to be here on Monday or Tuesday, and perhaps Ben Wood.

July 11, 1864, "Voorhees is to be here on Monday or Tuesday, and perhaps Ben Wood." What was Voorhees "to be here" for in Canada to see C. C. Clay, and why was Jacob Thompson, of the Southern Confederacy, advised of it?

The correspondence of Joseph Ristine, auditor of state, declaring that "he would like to see all Democrats unite in a bold and open resistance to all attempts to keep ours a united people by force of steel;" and that "this was a war against Democracy, and our only hope was a successful resistance of the South," was in the office "where these papers" were found.

The correspondence of E. C. Hibben, who assures you that "the Democracy are fast stiffening up when this war is to be openly declared as being waged for the purpose of freeing the negro," "which will arouse another section of the country to arms," and declaring "that Lincoln bayonets are shouldered for cold-blooded murder," was in the office "where these papers" were found.

The correspondence of J. Hardesty, who "wants you to have that one hundred thousand men ready, as we do not know how soon we may need them," was in the office where "this Ritual" was found.

And I have the letter of Hardesty here in which he calls on the Senator from Indiana to have the one hundred thousand men in readiness. There is a curious explanation about that letter, which is that when the Senator from Indiana, just previous to the breaking out of the war, was in Virginia making addresses in favor of slavery and secession, he made a speech at a serenade or on a public occasion in which he said that if any attempt was made to coerce the South one hundred thousand Democrats in Indiana would come down to resist the effort. My informant says that they did come, but their guns were pointed the wrong way.

The correspondence of J. J. Bingham, who asks you "if you think the South has resources enough to keep the Union forces at bay," and says that "you must have sources of information which he has not" was in the office where "these papers" were found.

The correspondence of John G. Davis informing you that a certain New York journal "is wonderfully exercised about the secret anti-war movements" and "tremble in their boots in view of the terrible reaction is sure to await them" was in the office where "these papers" were found.

The correspondence of U. S. Walker, who "keeps out of the way," because they are trying to arrest him for officiating in secret societies, inclosing the oath of the K. G. C.'s prior to that of the O. A. K., was in the office where "these papers" were found.

The petition of C. L. Vallandigham, D. W. Voorhees, and Benjamin Wood in favor of two republics and a united South was in the office where "these papers" were found.

The correspondence of Campbell, E. Etheridge, George H. Pendleton, J. E. McDonald, W. B. Hanna, and others, Mr. Carrington says,

Are some of the "circumstances" that led me to believe that "these papers," the ritual of the O. A. K., were found in your office.

I looked upon these circumstances as a plain juror might be supposed to do, and not as a statesman, and innocently supposed that such papers as these, if spared from the fire, would be in possession of the owner, and that the office of the owner would be the place where "these papers" would be found.

And yet, with Colonel Thompson, I cheerfully accepted your denial, and so respond as you request "that the people may know the truth."

The Senator from Indiana in response to this wrote a letter three columns long that was published in the Democratic papers and printed in the Richmond Enquirer in Virginia, with praise of the Senator from Indiana!

A letter from J. Hardesty, of Harrisonburgh, Va., to his nephew, Daniel W. Voorhees, dated—

HARRISONBURGH, February 17, 1862.

Addressed—

MY DEAR NEPHEW: We want you to hold that 100,000 men in readiness, as we do not know how soon we may want them.

J. HARDESTY.

Addressed on envelope:

Hon. DANIEL W. VOORHEES,
Terre Haute, Ind.

SENATOR WALL, OF NEW JERSEY, TO DAN. VOORHEES.

LONG BRANCH, August 21, 1863.

MY DEAR SIR: I inclose you two letters from a man by the name of Carr, in reference to arms. A letter directed to him simply Philadelphia will reach him. I can vouch for the excellent quality and great efficiency of the rifles.

Yours, in haste,

JAMES W. WALL.

And another from Carr to Wall, dated August 14, 1863, on the same subject, giving the price at which these arms could be purchased, which was $14 apiece, saying there were about twenty thousand of them in all. For what purpose they were wanted is left to the imagination to disclose.

With regard to the question as to the side on which the sympathies of the Senator from Indiana were—I suppose the Senator from Indiana will deny this also and say it was mere campaign calumny cast out and trodden under the feet of men—on the 5th day of March, 1864, he spoke of Vallandigham as "that representative American patriot, who, with Hendricks and Seymour and Richardson, had done so much to uphold the hands of the American public and had preserved so far the guaranties of constitutional liberty," a man who was tried and banished from the country for being a traitor, and justly banished; and yet the Senator from Indiana said on the 5th of March, 1864:

Will some poor, crawling, despised sycophant and tool of executive despotism—

That sounds very much like the Senator from Indiana. If that is a fabrication it is a very ingenious one—

Will some poor, crawling, despised sycophant and tool of executive despotism dare to say that I shall not pronounce the name of Vallandigham? The scandal and stigma of his condemnation—

The scandal and stigma of Vallandigham's condemnation—and banishment have filled the civilized world, and the Lethean and oblivious wave of a thousand years can not wash away the shame and reproach of that miserable scene from the American name. Some members have attacked with fierce clamor the great American statesman and Christian gentleman who suffers his exile in the cause of liberty on a foreign soil. So the basest cur that ever kenneled may bay, at "the bidding of a master, the aged lion in the distance."

His opinion of Mr. Lincoln was contained in the same speech—

Genghis Khan and Tamerlane, preserved by the pen of the historian for universal execration, found no pursuit so pleasant as calling for more men for the harvest of death, and, like our present Executive, snuffling with jests and ribaldry the warm taint of blood on every gale.

Oh, bitter mockery, justice has been dethroned and the blessings of liberty annihilated.

Because four millions of slaves were set free, apparently.

There is not one square mile of free soil in the American Republic.

The Senator from Indiana was also a member of Congress in the early days of the war, and he made some speeches upon the subjects that were then agitating the country. In an address to his constituents in April, 1861—I hope I am not inaccurate about that—he declared that he would never vote a single dollar or a single man for the prosecution of the war, and he never did so long as he was in Congress.

He consistently and persistently voted against every measure for upholding the Union cause and re-enforcing its armies, voted against all the constitutional amendments, and finally declared by a nay vote that he would not hold that the amendments were constitutional or binding upon the conscience of the American people. And yet the Senator from Indiana, who I think deserves charity more than any man that I know upon this floor, and who has received it at the hands of his associates, and who can less afford than any man of my acquaintance to invite a scrutiny of his war record with anybody, with playfulness and hilariousness refers to the fact that I served during the war as a judge-advocate with the rank of major and subsequently of lieutenant-colonel. I have this to say: That however obscure or inefficient my services may have been, they were always on the side of my country, and not as his has been, always against it.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas, to just take a matter of fact, will find one single vote that I have cast against the payment of soldiers for their pay, for their supplies, for their bounties, or appropriations for their pensions, I will resign my seat in the Senate. Every word that he has stated on that subject is absolutely false by the record—absolutely.

I measure my words as I stand here. If I am an object of his charity, he is an object of my contempt. He says I issued a proclamation to my constituents in April, 1861, that I would not vote for men or money. That is false. I never did anything of the kind; never in the world. I was a pretty hard fighter during the war in political campaigns. The party then in power gave it out that there should be no parties, that we should not contend as parties; but I did not accept that, and I fought my battles in my own way. I fought for free speech and a free press; but the soldiers of Indiana know, and they will measure and hear what I am now saying, that I voted for every dollar that ever fed them, that ever clothed them, and the man who says otherwise is a falsifier and a slanderer, and I brand it on him.

I can go home to my people on that statement. In 1864 I was in a bitter, hard canvass for Congress. The Senator from Kansas has announced that I had quit practicing law. That is not true. There is not a word of truth in it. I had gone from one office to another. Some papers that belonged to me were left in the office, and others put up a job on me in political campaigns, and put things there which were found and were published as found there. I denied then, as I deny now, that I was ever a member of any secret political society in my life.

Oliver P. Morton, a brave man, not, like the Senator from Kansas, small and active, but great and strong, and who believed that there was a secret organization in Indiana menacing the safety of the Republic, never pretended that I was connected with that organization. There has never been a man in public life, until the Senator from Kansas here persuades himself to do it, who ever alluded to the pretended fact that I belonged to such an organization. There was a gentleman from New Hampshire once, a member of the House, who inadvertently, in a sort of hurried way, alluded in a general manner to me as a member of a secret organization in Indiana; and the next day I took the floor for a personal explanation.

I remember the House gathered around me, and among the rest General Schenck, who was the leader of the House on the opposite side. He came close to me. I explained all these things, and that was the last of them. Now the Senator from Kansas sees fit, nosing around in a low, little way, to bring up these things which are stale, putrid, cast off, and the offal of years gone by.

When the matter that he speaks of as to my office was brought out by General Carrington I was in a hard canvass for Congress. I carried the district by nearly 800 majority. As my friend, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], remembers they contested my seat, and they threw me out because the Republicans needed two-thirds majority to fight Andrew Johnson then, and for no other reason in the world. I went back to a changed district, where they put 1,500 majority upon me, and I beat them in that district with the soldiers all at home.

Now, if the Senator from Kansas thinks he is making respectability or honor or even courtesy by reviving these things which have been passed upon by a jury of my peers—a good deal more than his peers, but a jury of my peers in Indiana—he is mistaken. I have had several elections to Congress since all this poor old stuff was published, and then I have been four times commissioned a Senator. I have been elected three times by the Legislature, and I have carried the State twice, by from 25,000 to 30,000 majority. If the Senator from Kansas in his miserable condition attempting to extricate himself from the disgrace of assailing McClellan and Hancock, sees fit to assail me, he is welcome to do so. A man who has aspersed the fame of McClellan, and says that he had fought two years trying to make the war a failure, and that Hancock was an ally of the Confederacy, and that Hancock and McClellan and Horace Greeley all belonged to the worst elements of the North, I feel his abuse as a compliment, and I thank him for the aspersions and respond to him accordingly. [Laughter and applause.]

So far as the old stuff about my denouncing the soldiers of Indiana is concerned, the soldiers will take care of that, and there is only a miserable set of people who were never soldiers, or if they were were sutlers most likely or sutlers' clerks, ever allude to anything of that kind, and I can only say—I do not want to be offensive to the Senator from Kansas, and do not care much whether I am or not [laughter]—I can only say (because he has thrust these matters upon me), as I have said, that the people whose names he reads there do lie and do not tell the truth, nor does the Senator when he repeats what they say tell the truth either. I have not the slightest concern, not the slightest feeling, not the slightest irritation upon this matter. It has been passed upon time and time again.

As to the letter for Captain Shoup I wrote the letter for Frank Shoup. I knew him well. We were boys at school together. He was going down South with his sister, who was dying of consumption. It was in December, before a single State had seceded, before the war had broken out, and I did sympathize with the feelings of the South that there ought to be a compromise at that time. The Crittenden compromise was pending, and the Peace Congress was called. I had no favors to ask; and as to charity, as I said, I respond with contempt.

That is all I have to say.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to ask him whether the soldiers of Indiana did not threaten to hang him with a bell-rope on a train between New Castle and Terre Haute after he made that "Lincoln dog" speech? [Laughter.]

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, the Senator is a great liar when he intimates such a thing—a great liar and a dirty dog. ["Order!" "Order!"] Such a thing never occurred in the world. That is all the answer I have to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is hardly in order. Personal discussion is not proper. The Chair hopes Senators will be in order.

Mr. VOORHEES. I pass it back to the scoundrel behind him who is instigating these lies.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, there is a very reputable gentleman in the Chamber, a citizen of Indiana, who informs me that the signers of the certificate about the "Lincoln dog" speech are entirely reputable inhabitants, male and female, of Sullivan County, and that he knows fifty people there who heard the speech made and can swear to it.

Mr. VOORHEES. I say he is an infamous liar and scoundrel who says I did. I say so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will be in order. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] was recognized before the interruption.

Mr. BUTLER. Before that is done——

Mr. EUSTIS. I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana give way to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. EUSTIS. For what purpose?

Mr. BUTLER. I was going to ask to have the resolution reported to which these speeches have been addressed.

Mr. HARRIS. I rose to ask the Senator from Louisiana if he preferred to go on now or adjourn until to-morrow.

Mr. EUSTIS. I have very few words to say and I prefer to say them now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before the Senator proceeds the Chair desires to say that a considerable portion of the debate has been out of order, and in violation of the rules of the Senate; and he hopes hereafter that Senators will observe the rules and proceed in order, and that there will be order preserved in the Senate Chamber and in the galleries.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, I simply rise to very briefly protest against the great freedom and license with which the Senator from Kansas has seen fit to discuss the election which has taken place in the State of Louisiana. I am aware that we must make great allowances for that Senator. The fact is that his speech reminded me of a conversation that I happened to overhear yesterday between two ladies. One of them said seriously to the other, "What a great place Washington is for amusement; just think of it; we have INGALLS and the circus and the races, all the same week." [Laughter.] I am sure that no one will complain of the very theatrical entertainment that we have had furnished us to-day by the Senator from Kansas.

I can only say that I consider it exceedingly unseemly, undignified, and unjust for a Senator of the United States, in the absence of any proof or any testimony whatsoever, to denounce as fraudulent an election which has been held in a State. I would inform the Senator from Kansas that the mode and manner in which that election has been conducted, being a State election, is none of his business whatsoever.

Mr. INGALLS. We think it is.

Mr. EUSTIS. It is only, sir, when the credentials are presented to this body of a Senator who claims to have been elected by virtue of that election, and he offers himself to have the oath of office administered, that this body has any jurisdiction or any power whatever to inquire into that election. It is only that fact and that circumstance which invests this body with any power whatsoever to pass judgment upon the legality or regularity of a mere State election; therefore I denounce as scandalous, vituperative, and unparliamentary the language which has been used by the Senator from Kansas with reference to the people of Louisiana.

Sir, there seems to be a preconcerted conspiracy among the Republican leaders to question the legality of elections in the South for no other purpose than to be able to show and convince the Northern people that a Democratic administration placed in power by the suffrages of the American people is not legally elected.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] some time ago in a speech which he made in Springfield, Ill., made the startling statement and declaration that every man, woman, and child in the United States knew that Grover Cleveland had been elected to the Presidency by fraud, intimidation, crime, and violence in the South, and that declaration has been adopted as the party cry for the coming canvass by the Republican conventions which have been held. I read the resolution adopted by the Republican convention in Vermont:

> The present Democratic majority in the House of Representatives and the executive branch of the Government is a usurpation, and never before except by hostile armies has popular government been so seriously imperiled.

Then, sir, we have a like declaration made by the Republican convention in Ohio, and the Republican convention in the State of Massachusetts. The Republican party of Massachusetts, which is always true to its habit of pestiferously and mischievously interfering in the affairs of other States, made the declaration that the Louisiana election held last April was a fresh illustration of the suppression of the votes of the majority in that State.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EUSTIS. I have no objection if it is pertinent to what I am saying.

Mr. HOAR. I will endeavor to make it pertinent to what the Senator is saying. Does the Senator deny that the language which has been read here by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] and attributed to Governor McEnery, and the language which was read here the other day by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and attributed to him, were correctly quoted?

Mr. EUSTIS. I can only answer for the quotation which was made from my speech. That was strictly accurate, and I stand by every word that I uttered on that occasion.

Mr. HOAR. Now, has the Senator no knowledge or belief in regard to that ascribed to Governor McEnery?

Mr. EUSTIS. I know nothing in regard to the speech attributed to Governor McEnery. I was taken sick soon after I went to Louisiana, and am not well to-day. What I said was this: That the Republican leaders of this country are almost preparing the American people for a coup d'état.

What do you mean by stating that the President of the United States is illegally and unconstitutionally in office? What do you mean by stating that the Democratic Administration is a usurpation? What does that mean except that we have a government which has been established and installed by revolutionary methods and not by constitutional and legal methods; that we are reducing ourselves to the level of Mexico and Central America, and that you are going into the canvass with the declarations which you have made by your conventions proclaiming that the President of the United States was elected, not by the free and honest suffrage of the American people, but that he holds his election by virtue of the suppresssion of the will of the majority and by reason of the violence and intimidation and fraud committed in the Southern States at their elections?

Mr. President, I am glad that this era has at last arrived when Republican Senators rise in this Chamber, as do the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Kansas, and advocate free and honest elections in the State of Louisiana. Let them look back, and what will they find from 1868 to 1876? In 1868, in 1870, in 1872, in 1874, in 1876, the Democratic party in Louisiana carried the State by an overwhelming majority. That majority was suppressed, and by the bayonet a government was installed over the people of Louisiana, and you admitted Senators into this Chamber and members into the other House who had not the shadow of a title to the seats which were given to them by Republican votes. I was in favor of honest elections then.

As a Democrat and a Senator of the United States I could sit in silence and listen to your aspersions and your accusations, deeming them unworthy of an answer until you have cleansed yourselves of the odium and disgrace and infamy and enormity which attach to you by reason of your fraudulent elections in the State of Louisiana. I could tell you, as Peter the Great told Charles XII., if I chose—"By defeating me you have taught me the art of war." But no, sir, I take no such position as that.

I tell the Senator from Kansas that he does not know what he is talking about. I will teach him what an election in Louisiana is some day. I will tell you that there is no reason why Mr. Warmoth should have received 500 votes in the State of Louisiana instead of 20,000. There is no reason why a solitary colored man in the State of Louisiana should have cast a vote for such a governor as Warmoth. He has a record as governor in Louisiana.

Suppose we did resort to irregularities, suppose we did resort to fraud, suppose we did do what you accuse us of doing and what we know perfectly well we did not do, what did you give us by your fraudulent elections? You gave us a government which was a disgrace to civilization; you gave us a government which produced conflicts between the two races, where society was torn up by the roots. The white men of the State of Louisiana resisted this negro domination which meant desolation, disaster, destruction to every interest in our State. When you failed to perpetuate your political supremacy in that State by the infamous machinations and the diabolical machinery which you invented and which you have used, then you rise to-day and in your wrath asperse and traduce the Democratic party of the State of Louisiana.

I, as a Democrat of that State, having taken an active part in every struggle which that noble people have made, tell you that instead of being abashed by your charges and aspersions, I throw them back in your teeth and tell you that I am proud of what the people of Louisiana have done in their struggle for home government and for the redemption of the State. I applaud their efforts, and notwithstanding these harangues and speeches that are made by political leaders I believe that the conduct of the people of Louisiana will have the approval of the thoughtful and intelligent and honest people of the North, because the people of Louisiana are only doing what the people of Kansas and the people of Massachusetts would do under the same circumstances and under the same conditions unless they are deficient in manhood and patriotism, and I know they are not.

Mr. President, I have not the strength to-day to make an elaborate speech on this question, but I wish to tell the Senator from Ohio, as he has chosen to criticise a speech which I made, and by which, I repeat, I stand, that I do not consider him a fair or honest judge of an election in the State of Louisiana.

When he and I in that Chamber witnessed that dramatic political scene when the veil was drawn from the chaste body of Eliza Pinkston, and her wounds eloquently appealed to the credulous sympathies of the distinguished Senator from Ohio, from that time, with reference to elections in Louisiana, I considered his judgment most sadly perverted.

I would also tell him that if he advocates negro domination in Louisiana, as I judge that he does by his speech, or if any Republican Senator does, I would tell him that if I were in this Chamber or to go abroad among the Northern people and make a speech there, and advise them to band together to make war upon society, to hang the rich capitalists who have enslaved them for so many years, to create a reign of terror in Northern cities and in Northern communities, to strike from the face of the earth those capitalistic oppressors who have put chains on their limbs, I would tell these Senators that I would no more feel guilty of having committed a crime against my country or against society than I feel that they are guilty when they ask the negro population to become the governing race in the State of Louisiana. I am too feeble to continue. [Applause.]

Mr. GIBSON and Mr. INGALLS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. GIBSON. I give way to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. I thought, inasmuch as Governor Warmoth had been aspersed, or at least harshly criticised, by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS], that it was no more than just to him that I should put on record the published utterance of Governor McEnery to Warmoth, his antagonist. Governor McEnery, in a speech at New Orleans, March 8, 1888, reported in the Picayune of the next day, said:

> I have no accusation to make against Governor Warmoth's personal or private character. I have cited the testimony of accomplices, who were actors in the saddest drama of our history. They may not have told the truth as to him personally, but as to the acts of the party of which Governor Warmoth was the chief their evidence is trustworthy. Governor Warmoth was a product of that era and he is inseparable from it. As a private citizen his life has been exemplary, his ability universally admitted, and his energy and progressiveness recognized.

There are a few more words I should like to say, but I refrain from doing so now.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate by any extended remarks in reply to the Senator from Kansas. Before commenting upon his criticisms of the recent election in Louisiana I desire to say a word in answer to his extraordinary observations upon the Southern people. He says that the Southern Confederacy still exists, that it is embodied in the Democratic party in the South, and that the Democratic party in that section is animated by all the ambitions, the purposes, and the hopes of the Southern Confederacy itself.

Now, Mr. President, this is an aspersion upon every Senator on this side of the Chamber who represents a Southern constituency. It is an aspersion upon the character, the patriotism, and the intelligence of the Southern people themselves. It is an aspersion upon the Northern statesmen who draughted and ingrafted in the Constitution of the United States those amendments that contain the fruits of the war for the Union.

What was the issue put at arms by the Southern and Northern sections? It was in the first place the institution of slavery. Every one knows that slavery was the occasion of the war, and every one understands perfectly well that the principle of secession was invoked by the Southern people as the only safeguard to protect their property and liberty, their public peace, their social and political systems from violent overthrow. Those two questions were settled and settled finally by the amendments of the Constitution which we have sworn to support, the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments.

What Southern man, what Southern State, has attempted to revive the institution of slavery? What Southern statesman has, since the arbitrament of arms, agitated the doctrine of secession? Not one. We all admit to-day that if any one were to take up arms, whether under State authority or not, against the United States, he would be guilty of treason, because the constitutional amendments declare that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States." Citizenship and allegiance are correlative.

The Southern members of the Senate have voted for years with a lavish hand nearly a thousand millions in pensions to the soldiers of the Federal Army and to their families. We have freely voted supplies to the Army and Navy of the Union, from which we ourselves are excluded.

We have done what we could to establish a sound currency for the people of the country, to diminish the public expenses, to improve the rivers and harbors, and to maintain the credit and honor of the flag in every land and on every sea under the sun.

Sir, I believe I echo the sentiment that this day is in the heart of every man in the South when I repeat the glowing language of the great Senator from Massachusetts, which I learned in my boyhood:

> When my eyes shall be turned to behold for the last time the sun in heaven, may I not see him shining on the broken and dishonored fragments of a once glorious Union; on States dissevered, discordant, belligerent; on a land rent with civil feuds, or drenched, it may be, in fraternal blood! Let their last feeble and lingering glance rather behold the gorgeous ensign of the Republic, now known and honored throughout the earth, still full high advanced, its arms and trophies streaming in their original luster, not a stripe erased or polluted, not a single star obscured, bearing for its motto no such miserable interrogatory as "What is all this worth?" nor those other words of delusion and folly, "Liberty first and Union afterwards," but everywhere, spread all over in characters of living light, blazing in all its ample folds as they float over the sea and over the land and in every wind under the whole heavens, that other sentiment dear to every true American heart, "Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable."

These are the sentiments of the people that I represent.

Now, sir, I reply to the charges made by the Senator from Kansas against the people of Louisiana, but I shall do so briefly.

In the first place, according to the report of a joint legislative committee to examine the books and accounts and other official documents in the auditor's and treasurer's offices, dated April 19, 1875 (and which I hold in my hand), signed by E. F. Herwig, chairman, and W. W. Wharton, J. A. Masicot, and Thomas A. Cage, on the part of the senate, and by C. W. Lowell, A. B. Levisee, O. F. Hunsaker, F. R. Wright, and R. F. Guichard, on the part of the house, all Republicans, a committee created by the Kellogg administration to ascertain how the finances of the State had been conducted under the Warmoth administration, the debt of the State of Louisiana amounted, on January 1, 1866, to the sum of $1,500,000, and on January 1, 1867, after deducting available funds and credits, to $3,595,000; and they also show that the total debt on January 1, 1873, when the Warmoth administration went out of office, as reported by the auditor, was $29,567,849. The committee found that the funded, unfunded, and contingent liabilities of the State amounted at that time to the vast sum of $50,597,394.95.

I will give the summary:

Floating debt	$2,165,171.71
Bonds loaned property banks	4,830,683.33
Bonded debt proper	22,134,800.00
Contingent debt reported by auditor	10,895,000.00
Contingent debt not reported by auditor	9,605,500.00
	49,604,155.04
Add trust bonds and bonds missing	993,194.91
Total	50,597,394.95

The committee says:

> In conclusion, the commission find that a large portion of the public debt has arisen from extravagance, profligacy, and misuse of the revenues of the State; that as to all that portion created since 1865, the State did not realize over 50 cents on the dollar, nor was the amount realized expended for the benefit of the State to the extent of more than one-half; in other words, the State has not been actually benefited in an amount exceeding one-fourth of the debt created, nor to an amount exceeding one-half of the taxes collected since 1865. The entire balance, say one-half of all the taxes and three-fourths of all the present debt, have been squandered or done worse with by the administration of the government since that date. The taxes and other revenues which have been collected and squandered are past recall, and the only possible benefit to be desired from this contemplation is the lesson which may be taught for the future administration of the revenues of the State.

This enormous debt of $50,000,000 was contracted in four years on an assessed valuation of about $200,000,000. While piling up this debt on the people of Louisiana they gathered in through their tax-gatherers in the city of New Orleans every year 5 per cent. of the assessed valuation of the property of that city, and 5, 6, and 7 per cent. throughout every parish in the State of Louisiana.

I do not think it is necessary for me to go further into details. This statement from Republican sources, from a committee of the Legislature of Louisiana, looking carefully into the auditor's accounts, declares in effect that Warmoth's administration had placed a mortgage upon one-quarter of the entire property, movable and immovable, of the people of Louisiana in four years, while it had consumed their annual earnings with remorseless rapacity.

With such a record as that it was natural that the property-holders of the State, that the intelligent men of the State in the recent election should show great earnestness and firmness and devotion to their own interests, in order to prevent a return of an administration which represented a policy which had already put in peril the earnings and the property of every man in the State.

I do not accuse Governor Warmoth himself personally; I do not say that Governor Warmoth himself put his hands into the treasury; but I say that he by the irresistible logic of events found himself at the head of the negro population, who but a few years ago had been held in abject slavery. They were ignorant. They could not conduct the government of a great commonwealth like the State of Louisiana. Unscrupulous and disreputable men took possession of the negro vote of the State and of the Legislature of the State, and Governor Warmoth at that time, even if he had been disposed, would not have been able to hold in check the debased and ignorant elements of society which the Republican party then represented.

I do not defend nor condemn him. I am not speaking of individuals. I am speaking of a system of government and of the relation which the Republican party as it was originally constituted in the State of Louisiana bore to property and to intelligence. To commit their destinies again to that party would be to put in peril every interest of the people of that State, their agriculture, their manufacturing industries, their institutions of learning, and their institutions of religion.

Mr. President, I will not indulge in further remarks about the relation of this party to the finances of the State, but I desire to respond briefly and directly to the insinuations which the Senator from Kansas has thrown out against the legality and fairness of the recent election. He has said that at the election in Louisiana the number of votes cast exceeded the male population of the State, or the registered vote of the State.

Mr. INGALLS. In several precincts.

Mr. GIBSON. He mentioned amongst others some precincts of Bossier Parish, and I will meet him on those precincts. The registration was taken four years ago and it was again taken but a few days before the recent election. The registration of Bossier Parish is 4,625, as taken before the recent election, and the vote in that parish does not equal by any means the registration. So, in Tensas Parish the registration to which the Senator referred shows 5,160. These are the figures with respect to these two parishes, to which the Senator referred. I desire to call his attention to what the vote of Kansas was in 1884. The vote of Kansas was 100 per cent. of its male population over twenty-one years by the census of 1880. The total vote of Kansas was 265,843, while the males twenty-one years of age and over in 1880 were 265,714, showing that the vote of Kansas at that time actually exceeded the total number of males in that State in 1880 over twenty-one years of age.

In the recent election in Louisiana, eight years from 1880, there has been cast only 80 per cent. of the males over twenty-one years of age by the census of 1880, whereas in many States of the Union, the American Almanac, of which our Librarian, Mr. Spofford, is the author, shows that it was quite usual in the election of 1884 that 100 per cent. of the voting population by the census of 1880, as in Kansas, should be cast, 90 per cent. as in Iowa, 99 per cent. as in Indiana, 104 per cent. as in Nebraska, 94 per cent. as in Ohio, 93 per cent. as in Wisconsin. In some States the percentage was lower; as 42 in Rhode Island, 60 in Massachusetts, 40 in Nevada, 78 in Connecticut, 69 in Maine; whereas in the recent election in Louisiana the total vote is only 80 per cent. of the males over twenty-one years of age in that State by the census in 1880.

I do not desire to detain the Senate any longer. I participated in the canvass in Louisiana and addressed large audiences in different parts of the State, and I can bear testimony to the peace and harmony and good feeling that existed everywhere in the State. And I can say further that the colored people and the white people live in relations of kindness and amity so far as I know everywhere in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. GIBSON. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I ask him the same question which I put to his colleague, whether he can tell us as to the correctness of the remarks attributed to the governor of that State.

Mr. GIBSON. I did not hear the speeches of the governor of Louisiana, except one.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator has a belief whether the governor said that.

Mr. GIBSON. My belief is that he did not say it. I heard the governor of Louisiana speak in the town of Thibodeaux, and he delivered a speech of ability and eloquence, and I never heard a man address the people with more composure and more conservatism. I heard also the speeches of Governor Nicholls, who was a candidate for the Democratic nomination against Governor McEnery, and I have the language which he employed substantially everywhere during the long six months of the canvass in the State of Louisiana, and here are his sentiments in brief:

> I am thoroughly satisfied that any course of political action traced on a narrower line than the good of the whole people, regardless of color or condition, must inevitably lead to disaster and ruin.
> I have earnestly sought to obliterate the color line in politics and consolidate the people on the basis of equal rights and common interests, and it is a source of gratification to say that this great object is about to be realized.

This was the language he used when he was first inaugurated. It was the language I heard him repeat substantially in several parishes throughout the State of Louisiana. I do not know a Senator on this floor from any State in the Union who is more conservative, or who possesses the confidence of the people whom he represents in larger measure than the governor elected by the State of Louisiana. He was educated at West Point, conservative in all his instincts, devoted to the real welfare of the people of the State. I do not believe that under any circumstances there could have been a fairer canvass conducted in that State.

If every Senator here had seen fit to go to the State in behalf of Warmoth, it would not have stopped the march of the people of Louisiana in support of this gallant, heroic, and magnanimous soldier and gentleman and statesman. That is the secret, Senators, of the success of the Democratic party in Louisiana, and when that election shall be investigated through and through you will find that the colored people as well as the white people rallied around Nicholls; and I venture to declare that if that canvass had been prolonged three weeks or six weeks longer, Governor Warmoth would have retired from the race.

I have here extracts from some of the papers of Louisiana, among them extracts from papers edited and owned by colored men, in which they urge the colored voters to cast their votes for Nicholls. I will read one of these extracts to show Republican Senators particularly how these people, some of them educated, some of them acquiring property, some having pride in the name and welfare of the State, what sentiments they cherish towards Governor Nicholls. I read now from a newspaper edited by a colored man, in the city of New Orleans—the New Orleans Progress—which says:

> But perhaps the most gratifying result of the election is the breaking up of the color line. Outside of New Orleans and a few of the lower parishes thousands and thousands of colored voters, remembering the just, fair, impartial, and peaceful administration of General Nicholls, rallied around his standard and joyfully cast their ballots for him. So complete is this political revolution that hereafter it will be impossible for any one to marshal the colored voters solidly under the Republican banner again.
> Verily, the colored people of Louisiana have at last freed themselves from political servitude. It is for this that we have been contending for years, and whatever humble share we have had in bringing it about has made us supremely happy. Crow, our rooster, crow, and let us have the illumination.

The leading Republican organ in the city of New Orleans, edited and owned by white men and Republicans, the Item, says:

> One of the results of the political canvass just closed has been a large voluntary accession of the negro vote to the Democratic party. The causes of this seeming defection are not difficult to trace. They may be found partly in the nature of the negro himself, being destitute of any great amount of sentiment such as binds white men to a principle, an idea, a nationality, or a clan.
> Chiefly, however, the flexibility of the negro vote as an element in politics owes its origin to the profligate and corrupt character of those who meet in conventions to dispose of its nominal control. The recent Republican State convention which was held at Washington Artillery hall brought to the front all the old-time traders and tricksters who could squeeze themselves into a delegation under any pretext whatever; and, as their methods, objects, and aims were intuitively understood by all, even the dullest, they failed to effect an organization having any cohesive power or strength. A number of the better sort of intelligent and independent negroes, like Martinet, boldly proclaimed themselves Democrats and in favor of the election of General Nicholls from the beginning. * * *

And now, when the Southern people, stricken by losses in battle, by poverty unprecedented in the history of the world, are rallying around the great central ideas of constitutional government, building railroads, starting furnaces, building up great institutions of learning, doubling, as in the State of Louisiana in the last five years, the number of schoolhouses in the State and the number of teachers in the State, reducing governmental expenses, inviting foreign immigration and immigration from our countrymen in the North—why will Senators here, merely for political purposes, endeavor to excite the animosities of our former slaves and disturb the peaceful relations that are being knit together between the white people of the South and the negro people of the South—why, for political purposes, will they put in peril these growing interests of a new civilization when they know that the white people of the South have a problem to solve which is unique in the history of civilization? Not the abolition of slavery in Rome, not the abolition of vassalage in the Middle Ages, not the emancipation of serfs in Russia, not the graduated and compensatory form of emancipation in the West India Islands, not the conquest itself of India, none of these furnish an analogue to the vast problem which in the main must be settled by the white people of the South and by the colored people of the South.

It is true, sir, that on the surface of society occasionally there is a ripple of disturbance; true, that there are individual wrongs by white men against the negroes, and by the negroes against the white men; but the great body of the population reposes solidly upon those sentiments of religion and charity, of good-will and patriotic endeavor, that constitute the basis upon which the structure of every enlightened government must rest.

The Southern people are doing their best. With benevolence, with charity, with composure, with courage, they are invoking all the resources of our civilization to settle this great question in a way that will free us from strife, from the loss of life, from the loss of property, from those unseemly agitations that possess every other people in the world except our own. We have no orders in society, no standing armies, no traditions to which we may cling, no great vested interest, no class to lead us. There was a disruption in the South in which everything went down into a chasm and beyond recall.

By an interposition of Divine Providence a revolution was wrought at the very moment when we were put at the greatest stress of fortune; and will not the people of the North, the generous and patriotic men and women of the North, who have come to our aid with such abundant benevolence in our many trials, be persuaded that the good men and good women of the South are striving not for party conquest, not for any base and ignoble purposes, but that they are endeavoring to do all they can according to their means to solve rightly every problem which God Almighty has committed to them, to do what they can to free society from the dangers of ignorance and vice and strife?

But they will never cease as long as they cherish liberty to feel that they ought to make any sacrifices to prevent this great instrument of government from falling into the hands of a race marked as distinct from the white race, and which has not yet the capacity because perhaps it has not had the opportunity to fit itself for the responsibilities of self-government.

We united with Senators from the North to exclude the Chinese from our country because they were regarded as an element dangerous to our society, and we have read in Froude's account of the West India Islands of the deplorable and blighting results of negro supremacy.

Sir, I do not mean at this time to suggest that we should take the ballot away from the negroes. I trust the experiment of universal suffrage in the South may prove successful. But we owe it to ourselves and to them to exhaust all the resources of civilization, using a phrase of Mr. Gladstone, to dissuade them from casting their ballots in favor of men incapable of administering the government, and from banding together in secret orders, under unscrupulous and designing men, to make war upon all the institutions we have inherited from our ancestors.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before submitting the motion, the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 39 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 2, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 1, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask by unanimous consent that the reading of that portion of the Journal relating to the introduction and reference of bills and resolutions be dispensed with.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

The residue of the Journal was read.

CORRECTION.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I desire to correct the Journal. I introduced yesterday a bill to abolish war taxes upon American shipping. Upon examination I do not find that bill noticed in the Journal, and I would like to have the proper correction made. The mistake has arisen from confusing two bills—one introduced by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN], and the other by myself.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read that part of the Journal.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. DUNN: A bill (H. R. 9738) providing for the organization of the Commission on Fish and Fisheries, and defining its duties; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is the bill introduced by the gentleman from Arkansas. Mine was a bill to abolish war taxes on American shipping; and it does not appear in the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the correction to be made.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Now, I desire to have the RECORD corrected. It follows the Journal, as those bills were filed at the Clerk's desk. On page 3672 it is stated that the bill (H. R. 9738) providing for the organization of the commission on fish and fisheries and defining its duties, was introduced by myself. That is the bill introduced by the gentleman from Arkansas. My bill, which the House gave consent should be printed in the RECORD, is not noticed. I desire that the RECORD should be corrected, so that my bill may appear as introduced and may be published in full, in accordance with the leave granted by the House.

The SPEAKER. The necessary correction will be made. The Chair will cause the Journal to be corrected according to the gentleman's statement.

The bill introduced by Mr. BUCHANAN, a bill (H. R. 9739) to abolish war taxes upon American shipping, was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, ordered to be printed, and also to be published in the RECORD. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved May 31, 1830, entitled "An act to repeal the tonnage duties upon ships and vessels of the United States and upon certain foreign vessels," which was repealed by section 15 of the act approved July 14, 1862, entitled "An act increasing temporarily the duties on imports, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, re-enacted as follows:

"That from and after the passage of this act no duties upon the tonnage of the ships and vessels of the United States, of which the officers and two-thirds of the crew shall be citizens of the United States, shall be levied or collected; and all acts or parts of acts imposing duties upon the tonnage of ships and vessels of the United States, officered and manned as aforesaid, so far as the same relate to the imposition of such duties, shall, from and after said 1st day of April next, be repealed.

"SEC. 2. That from and after the said 1st day of April next all acts and parts of acts imposing duties upon the tonnage of the ships and vessels of any foreign nation, so far as the same relate to the imposition of such duties, shall be repealed: Provided, That the President of the United States shall be satisfied that the discriminating or countervailing duties of such foreign vessels, so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the United States, have been abolished."

EXPENSES OF INTERNATIONAL MEDICAL CONGRESS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of expenditures of the appropriation for entertaining and providing for expenses of the Ninth International Medical Congress, September, 1887; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and ordered to be printed.

REPAIR OF SEA-WALL, NAVAL HOSPITAL, NORFOLK, VA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Secretary of the Navy of an appropriation to be immediately available for repair of the sea-wall at the naval hospital, Norfolk, Va.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FIRE-ESCAPES, HOWARD UNIVERSITY BUILDING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Secretary of the Interior for the erection of fire-escapes upon the Howard University building; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PENSION APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions requesting that the sum of $3,500,000 be transferred from the appropriations for Mexican war pensions to the Army pension appropriations; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

UNION BANK OF AUSTRALIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, with accompanying papers, and a letter from the Secretary of State, relative to the relief of the Union Bank of Australia, limited, for losses sustained through payment of certain drafts drawn by the late United States commercial agent at Levuka, Fiji Islands; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REFERENCE OF BILLS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, under the rule, Senate bills, which were severally read a first and second time, and referred as follows, namely:

The bill (S. 347) to provide for the erection of a public building at Youngstown, Ohio—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill (S. 349) for the erection of a public building at Akron, Ohio—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill (S. 1747) to authorize the sale of a tract of land in the military reservation of Fort Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (S. 2329) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to re-examine and reaudit a claim of the State of Pennsylvania for advances made and money borrowed by said State to pay the militia called into the military service by the governor under the proclamation of the President of June 15, 1863—to the Committee on War Claims.

The bill (S. 68) for the relief of James H. Smith, late postmaster at Memphis, Tenn.—to the Committee on Claims.

RETURN OF BILL TO THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will also lay before the House a request of the Senate for the return of a bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, April 30, 1888.

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 1161) granting a pension to Mrs. Jeannie Stone, widow of General Charles P. Stone.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection this request will be complied with, and the Clerk will be directed to return the bill to the Senate.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WHITE, of Indiana, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (H. R. 1788) for the erection of a public building at Lancaster, Pa.

KANSAS CITY AND PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Indian Affairs the bill (S. 1148) to grant a right of way to the Kansas City and Pacific Railroad Company through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, and ask its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. The bill, Mr. Speaker, is quite a lengthy one, and if there is to be an objection to its present consideration, perhaps it should be interposed now, so as to save the time that would be necessarily occupied in reading the bill.

Mr. MILLS. What is the purpose of the bill?

Mr. PERKINS. To grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to this railroad company.

Mr. DOCKERY. I trust the gentleman will not object. It is a measure of great importance to our people.

Mr. PERKINS. I will say that I have received a large number of petitions asking for the immediate consideration of this bill, and also from the Board of Trade of the city of Kansas City, Mo., and numerous other cities and towns in Kansas. It is quite important that immediate action should be taken upon the bill.

Mr. MILLS. I think we had better not delay the consideration of the regular order.

Mr. DOCKERY. I sincerely hope that there will be no objection to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. MILLS. How long will it take to get through with it?

Mr. PERKINS. There will be no debate, I take it. The bill is carefully prepared and contains all the safeguards usual to such legislation.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let the bill be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MILLS. If it will not consume much time in its consideration, I will not make any special objection.

Mr. PERKINS. It contains every provision and every safeguard that has been incorporated in bills of this character heretofore and which have received the favorable consideration of this House in the past. This bill has received the consideration of our committee and now comes before the House with its unanimous indorsement. It is recommended unanimously by the committee——

Mr. MILLS. Can we dispense with the reading of the bill?

Mr. MCKINLEY. Let the gentleman simply state the object of it, and let the reading be dispensed with.

Mr. PERKINS. The object of the bill is to grant to the Kansas City and Pacific Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory for their road from Kansas into Texas. I repeat, it has every safeguard which has been incorporated in this character of bills for the protection of the Indians, and all the rights of the Government under it are preserved.

Mr. ROGERS. Ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bill, and put it upon its passage.

Mr. PERKINS. I was just about to make that request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to dispensing with the reading of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. The company for which I speak is a responsible one, and now has more than a hundred miles of road in operation and desires to extend its road from Kansas City to the Gulf and give to the people of Missouri, Kansas, and Texas another competing line through the Indian Territory, and also another line binding together and connecting more closely these great States of the West and South.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Kansas whether the usual limitations as to the transportation of passengers, etc., are in the bill?

Mr. PERKINS. Every one, and in addition there is a clause not heretofore incorporated in such bills which provides that Indians who are not satisfied with the award of damages in condemnation proceedings may appeal to the courts, and although they may not recover in court as much as is given by the commissioners, still they are to recover costs, notwithstanding such appeal and reduction in damages awarded.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The reading of the bill in full was dispensed with.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS EASTERN BRANCH.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (S. 2458) to amend an act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River at the foot of Pennsylvania avenue east.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to make such alterations in the plan of said bridge as will best accommodate the traffic over and under said bridge, and for said purpose the sum of $60,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company pay their fair and just proportion of the cost of said alteration at the west end of said bridge, to be determined by the Secretary of War.

The Committee on the District of Columbia recommended the following amendment:

In lines 4 and 5 strike out the words "said bridge" and insert "the bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River at the foot of Pennsylvania avenue east."

Mr. MILLS. Does the bill make any appropriation?

Mr. HEMPHILL. The bill makes an appropriation of $60,000. The House will remember that last year we made an appropriation for a bridge over the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River. We appropriated a sum of money which at that time was thought to be sufficient. The Secretary of War has let out contracts under that act; but now it has become perfectly apparent that the sum appropriated is not sufficient to give the people there the bridge they want. In addition to that the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company, by reason of the extension of the track which they are entitled to under the law, have a title to the land upon which this bridge as now planned will land; so that the public in crossing the bridge will run against the railroad. It is necessary to extend the bridge far enough over to allow the railroad to run under it. The Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company have the right of way of, I think, 60 feet on each side of its track, and as the bridge is now planned people in crossing it will run right into the railroad track. This bill proposes to give additional money to build a better bridge, so that people in crossing the bridge may go over the railroad track instead of running right into it.

The bill has passed the Senate, and has been unanimously reported by the House committee after a personal investigation by some of the members, if I recollect correctly.

It is provided that the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company shall pay their just proportion of the increased cost, and that the amount of their share shall be determined by the Secretary of War.

The reason why I ask unanimous consent of the House to pass the bill at this time is because I have a letter from the Secretary of War, received yesterday, stating that the construction of the bridge according to the present plan is now going on, and that it will cost from $500 to $1,000 each day if there is delay in changing the plan.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much is appropriated out of the public Treasury for the bridge, including the appropriation made by this bill?

Mr. HEMPHILL. The original appropriation, I think, was $125,000. This will make the total amount $185,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the District provide half the cost?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. What provision does the bill make about that?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Let the Clerk read the bill again.

The bill was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not observe any such provision in the bill.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will add a proviso to the effect that one-half of the appropriation shall be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

"Provided further, That one-half of the sum hereby appropriated shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The question being put on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee and the amendment offered by Mr. HEMPHILL, they were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ABOLITION OF PUBLIC DRUNKENNESS.

Mr. ATKINSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 9769) to punish public drunkenness in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

The SPEAKER. That requires a vote of two-thirds.

The motion was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports to present may file them at the desk for reference to the appropriate Calendars.

There was no objection, and the following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

GEORGE CAMPBELL.

Mr. FORD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 6018) for the relief of George Campbell; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS OF VOLUNTEER OFFICERS.

Mr. CUTCHEON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the joint resolution (H. Res. 144) to provide for the adjudication of claims of volunteer officers under the acts of June 3, 1884, and February 3, 1887; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS FOR STORES AND SUPPLIES.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. 9770) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army as reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HUDSON G. LAMKIN.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9464) for the relief of Hudson G. Lamkin; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

THOMAS ENGLISH.

Mr. LAWLER, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 8692) for the relief of Thomas English; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SCREW STEEL STEAMER SCYTHIAN.

Mr. DUNN, from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9081) to authorize an American register to be issued for the screw steel steamer Scythian; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, OTTUMWA, IOWA.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back the bill (H. R. 8031) to provide for the erection of a public building at Ottumwa, Iowa, and for other purposes; which was laid on the table.

He also, from the same committee, reported in the nature of a substitute a bill (H. R. 9771) for the erection of a public building at Ottumwa, Iowa; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EMANUEL H. CUSTER.

Mr. CHIPMAN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9387) for the relief of Emanuel H. Custer; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN A. ROLF.

Mr. CHIPMAN also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 7093) granting an increase of pension to John A. Rolf; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARGARETHA SUSSMAN.

Mr. CHIPMAN also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 3901) for the relief of Margaretha Sussman; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. ADELINE COUZINS.

Mr. CHIPMAN also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2356) to provide a pension for Mrs. Adeline Couzins; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

J. W. M'MILLAN.

Mr. CHIPMAN also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1074) for the relief of J. W. McMillan; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NEIL FISHER.

Mr. HOOKER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 105) for the relief of Neil Fisher; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TENEDORE TEN EYCK.

Mr. LAIRD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 5569) to authorize the President to restore Tenedore Ten Eyck to his former rank in the Army, and to place him upon the retired-list of Army officers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM R. MURPHEY.

WILLIAM C. LORD.

Mr. GALLINGER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 7202) granting a pension to William C. Lord; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN S. BRYANT.

Mr. GALLINGER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 5155) granting a pension to John S. Bryant; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LOUISE PROVOST.

Mr. GALLINGER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 1884) granting a pension to Louise Provost; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CONVICT LABOR.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, from the Committee on Labor, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 8716) to protect free labor and the industries in which it is employed from the injurious effects of convict labor by confining the sale of the goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured by convict labor to the State in which they are produced; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

INTERNAL-REVENUE LAW.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to present at this time, that it may be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and printed in the RECORD, a petition, very numerously signed by well-known business men of the city of Philadelphia, relative to a repeal of a portion of the internal-revenue tax, especially that upon alcohol wherever it enters into the making of medicines, so that medicines can be sold cheaper. I ask that the petition be read.

Objection was made to the reading.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Then I will put it in the box, and hope the Committee on Ways and Means will read it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the petition be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and that it be printed in the RECORD without the names.

The petition is as follows:

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned, citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, respectfully petition your honorable bodies to repeal that portion of the internal revenue law which classes druggists as liquor dealers, and requires them to take out a license and pay annually the sum of $25 therefor; and your petitioners further pray that as alcohol enters largely into the manufacture of medicines, thereby increasing their cost to the sick and needy, and as the necessities of the Government no longer require this excessive tax upon an article so largely used in the arts and medicine, that your honorable bodies take such action as will reduce the tax on spirits.

TARIFF.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Chairman, we are confronted to-day by a large and increasing surplus of money in our Treasury, while our people are overburdened with unjust and unnecessary taxes. One of the cardinal principles of good government is that no more money should be collected by taxation than is necessary to pay the expenses of the government, economically administered. President Jackson emphasized this principle in his last annual message to the Congress of the United States by saying:

The safest and simplest mode of obviating all the difficulties which have been mentioned is to collect only revenue enough to meet the wants of the Government, and let the people keep the balance of their property in their hands to be used for their own profit.

A GREAT QUESTION.

One of the great questions before us is, what causes this surplus, which amounts to nearly a hundred millions of dollars per annum, and which in a few years, if nothing is done, will draw all the money into the Treasury and produce stagnation of business, destruction of value, and financial ruin throughout the country? There can be but one answer to this question, and that is, excessive taxation and unjust exaction produce the surplus. Under our system of government every citizen is guarantied the full enjoyment of the efforts of his industry and strength, subject only to such deductions as may be his share in maintaining the Government. The collection of more than this is unjust extortion and legalized robbery. The history of the world shows fearful and wonderful results growing out of high taxes and unjust exactions. For these causes Charles the First was beheaded and the last of the Stuarts was driven into exile. For these causes our war for independence was fought and our Government established on the doctrine of proper taxation and fair representation; but—

Peace hath her victories, no less renowned than war.

The time has come when private extortion must yield to public right and selfish interest give way to public good, and excessive taxation must be remedied by a fair and conservative reduction of the taxes, and a diminution of the surplus will follow.

PRESIDENTS AND PARTIES HAVE RECOMMENDED TAX REFORM.

Both the great national parties have declared in favor of a tariff reduction. The Republican party at the national convention held at Chicago in 1884 promised to correct the inequalities of the tariff. The Democratic party at the national conventions held at St. Louis in 1876, at Cincinnati in 1880, and at Chicago in 1884, declared in favor of a revision of the tariff in a spirit of fairness for all interests.

In 1883 a Republican Congress provided for the appointment of a "tariff commission," which was composed mainly of men interested in protected industries; but the necessity and wisdom of tariff reduction were so great that the commissioners reported in favor of a reduction of from 20 to 25 per cent.

President Arthur said in his first message to Congress:

It seems to me that the time has arrived when the people may justly demand some relief from their present onerous burdens.

In his second annual message to Congress he said:

I heartily approve the Secretary's recommendation of immediate and extensive reductions in the annual revenues of the Government.

President Cleveland made himself conspicuous before the world for wisdom, patriotism, and courage by devoting his entire annual message to the Fiftieth Congress to the discussion and recommendation of surplus reduction and tax reform. In the light of these expressions it seems to me that Congress should have long ago provided for a diminution of tariff rates.

The Journals of the House of Representatives, however, show that when we on this side of the House have brought in bills to reduce taxes on the necessaries of life those on the other side have mustered nearly their entire strength to defeat us.

In 1884 and 1885 they struck out the enacting clause of our bills to reduce taxes, and in 1886 and 1887 they voted almost unanimously in opposition to even considering the bill to reduce taxation; but the continued flow of money into the United States Treasury at the rate of $42,000 per hour, and the manifest injustice and impolicy of maintaining a revenue system which compels the people to pay annually millions of dollars more than is needed by the Government, and the demands of those who have to bear the burdens and endure the hardships of onerous taxation are beginning to be heeded, and "A bill to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue" is at last being considered in the House of Representatives of the United States.

Mr. McKINLEY. As we were in a minority, of course we could not have prevented the consideration of that bill without the help of Democrats on your side of the House.

Mr. McCREARY. If it had not been for the Republicans on your side of the House we would have prevented the enacting clause from being stricken out of the first bill and we would have considered the last bill, which was known as the Morrison bill.

Mr. McKINLEY. You mean that if it had not been for some Democrats on your own side of the House you would have succeeded.

Mr. McCREARY. The revenues of the Government are derived mainly from internal taxation and from tariff duties. The receipts from internal revenue for the fiscal year of 1887 amounted to $118,823,391.22; the receipts from tariff duties amounted to $217,286,893.13, and from miscellaneous sources, $35,292,993.31, amounting in all to $371,403,277.66. The total expenditure of the Government for 1887 amounted to $315,835,428.12

INTERNAL-REVENUE TAX.

The internal revenue is derived mainly from the taxes on distilled spirits, malt liquors, and tobacco, and the amount collected from this source goes directly into the Treasury, less about 3 per cent., the cost of collection. This tax is imposed on luxuries, and the amount collected is a clear gain to the Treasury. It does not interfere with nor add to the cost of clothing, food, shelter, farming implements, or any necessary of life, but helps to relieve them of the burdens of taxation.

TARIFF TAX.

The tariff tax is imposed on foreign articles imported into this country. It is first paid by the importer, but ultimately comes out of the consumer. When levied and collected for the Government, it is a revenue tariff; when it is levied for the purpose of aiding individuals in their business or private enterprises, it is a protective tariff.

The average tariff rate in 1850 was 27 per cent., in 1857 it had been reduced to a little over 18 per cent., but it was raised to an average rate of 40.29 per cent. on dutiable goods between the years 1862 and 1866 inclusive—the venerable and distinguished father of the bill then introduced declaring—

This is intended as a war measure, or a temporary measure, and we must, as such, give it our support.

His utterances have not been fulfilled. Although more than twenty years have passed since the war closed, these war taxes still remain, and they are heavier to-day than they were on an average during the late war, the average tariff duty now being 47.10 per cent.

WAR TAXES THAT HAVE BEEN REPEALED.

As peaceful and prosperous years have rolled by, many taxes caused by the necessities of the war have been repealed.

The income tax, which brought to the United States Treasury in 1866 $72,000,000; the tax imposed on home manufactures, which brought in $127,000,000 in that same year, were soon repealed after the war. They reached a high and select class of manufacturers and moneyed men, and they were soon blotted out.

There were also taxes on bank deposits, bank checks, taxes on the receipts of railroad companies, on insurance companies, and on express companies. These also yielded to the magic wand, waved by the rich and powerful, and vanished from our statute-books. Even the taxes on whisky and tobacco were much reduced, and the tax on playing cards was removed, but the tariff tax, which is so burdensome and crushing to the moneyless man and the laboring man, stands before the world as the only tax in our "land of the free and home of the brave" whose average rate has been increased since the war.

MANUFACTURERS GET MOST OF THE MONEY.

The tariff brings more money to the manufacturer than to the Treasury. The aggregate value of the manufactured products of the United States is reported by the Bureau of Statistics to be worth, in round numbers, $6,000,000,000 annually. More than two-thirds, or four billions, are sold in this country. The increased cost to the consumer in consequence of the tariff duties is, according to the estimates made by Professor Arthur L. Perry, $869,159,572 per annum, which goes into the pockets of manufacturers and private persons, outside of the amount received in the Treasury on imports.

Therefore the tariff tax, which put $217,000,000 into the Treasury last year, put $869,159,572 into the pockets of manufacturers and private persons, being $4 into their pockets for every dollar put into the Treasury. When we reduce the tariff we not only provide for a reduction of a continually increasing surplus, but for every dollar we leave out of the Treasury we leave $4 in the pockets of the people.

THE PROBLEM.

The problem then to be solved is, what shall we do with the surplus and the tariff; shall we get rid of the surplus by extravagant expenditures and leave the tariff high, or shall we reduce taxation, and thereby reduce the surplus?

We have more money piled up in the United States Treasury than there is in the Treasury of any kingdom, monarchy, or empire under the sun. Indeed, we have a greater amount thus hoarded than have the three leading nations of Europe.

A large surplus is a perpetual menace to an economical government, and invites unwise legislation, jobs and rings, and a long train of evils. It should be avoided.

If we reduce taxation, shall it be done by reducing the tariff taxes or by reducing the internal-revenue taxes?

If I consulted my own wishes I would say the reduction of tariff taxes is the true course. They rest on the necessaries of life and on nearly everything by which industry is benefited or civilization advanced.

The internal-revenue tax is obtained from luxuries. The taxes on them are in the nature of voluntary taxes, for any person who is burdened with them may cease to use the articles and avoid the tax.

To me it seems preposterous to suggest that whisky, beer, and tobacco be made free and the necessaries of life bear the burdens of taxation. No civilized country on earth ever did this. I can never vote for free whisky, free tobacco, and free beer, until we have free food, free clothing, free fuel, free implements of labor, and last, but not least, free blankets and free Bibles.

WHO WANTS FREE WHISKY AND FREE TOBACCO?

Whence comes the demand for free whisky and free tobacco? There are no delegations of distillers or tobacco raisers here to ask the repeal of internal revenue taxes. No petitions have been sent here that I have heard of by whisky makers or whisky sellers or whisky drinkers. Neither have the tobacco producers or the chewers or the smokers sent in their petitions. The great, zealous, importunate demand for free whisky, free tobacco, and free beer comes from the advocates of that masterpiece of injustice, inequality, and false pretense, known as "high protective tariff," and from the manufacturers and monopolists who have fattened on the hard earnings of the people and who are making colossal fortunes by means of the tax imposed on the necessaries of life.

The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], the venerable god-father of the existing tariff, does not agree with me. He declared as far back as the 12th day of December, 1870, in this Hall, but his party overruled him, that the true principle of revenue reform points to the abolition of the internal-revenue system, and he reiterated that statement in his recent speech against the pending bill.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman pardon a moment's interruption?

Mr. McCREARY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. I believe the resolution to which the gentleman refers was adopted with but six dissenting votes in the House. It is, therefore, a mistake for him to say that my party overruled me on that resolution; there were but six votes against me.

Mr. McCREARY. Was not the other branch of Congress Republican at that time?

Mr. KELLEY. The resolution did not go to the other House.

Mr. McCREARY. Was there not a caucus of the Republicans here which overruled the gentlemen?

Mr. KELLEY. You are referring now to the Forty-seventh Congress, when I had the honor of being chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. McCREARY. Was there not a caucus of your party in the Forty-seventh Congress in relation to your internal-revenue resolution?

Mr. KELLEY. You have recited a resolution that I offered in 1870—eighteen years ago.

Mr. McCREARY. Was there not a caucus held relative to the resolution which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] introduced, urging that the internal-revenue taxes be repealed, and did not that caucus refuse to indorse that resolution?

Mr. KELLEY. Not the resolution to which the gentleman refers in his speech.

Mr. McCREARY. I am asking the gentleman this question: Was there a Republican caucus held here at any time in reference to the gentleman's resolution, and was he not compelled by that Republican caucus to give up his views in favor of repealing internal-revenue taxes? I ask the gentleman to answer that question, yes or no.

Mr. KELLEY. I mean to answer the question, and I know that so courteous a gentleman as the gentleman from Kentucky does not wish to make a misstatement.

Mr. McCREARY. Oh, no.

Mr. KELLEY. You have cited a resolution that I submitted to Congress in 1870, and as to which there were but six dissenting votes, although you have said that my party overruled me. When I deny that, and say that six votes did not overrule the whole House, you now refer to an incident which occurred in the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress, four years ago, when I proposed to repeal internal taxes, to wit, the taxes on tobacco and on malt liquors, and my party did, in caucus, although I was chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, refuse to hear either my argument or my figures. That is so.

Mr. McCREARY. As the Republicans were in power for twenty years and had authority and power during that time to repeal the internal-revenue taxes, why did they not do it?

Mr. KELLEY. Why? Because they needed the money; having had a Southern rebellion to suppress. [Derisive laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McCREARY. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania's views are carried out and the entire internal-revenue taxes are repealed, as he proposes in his speech, there will be a deficit of $60,000,000 per annum in the revenues of the Government.

Mr. KERR. Would it not take four years of that deficit to overcome that surplus?

Mr. McCREARY. Oh, no, sir; it would not.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Oh, yes; it would.

Mr. McCREARY. He said also that "the enactment of this bill would instantly paralyze the enterprise and energy of the people." This is his view of a measure, the purpose of which is to relieve an overflowing Treasury and reduce taxation. This is his criticism of a bill, the object of which is to lessen the taxes which a comparatively small number of men can impose on millions of their fellow-men to build up the industries of one State at the expense of the people of a large part of the country. This is his opinion of a bill which, if it becomes a law, will still leave the average tariff rate in our Republic higher than it is in any other country in the world. I say to the distinguished gentleman that the assertion he has made can not be maintained, and that the people will require further explanation before they will believe that a conservative reduction of a war tariff and a gradual return of a hoarded surplus to those from whom it was unjustly taken will retard or paralyze the enterprise of the people or the prosperity of the country.

DEFENSE OF KENTUCKY.

He is mistaken in this, as he is mistaken in many of the statements made in the same speech about Kentucky.

I remember well that in the early autumn of last year, when our fields and pastures had reached their rich perfection, while the people were resting after an abundant harvest, and the genial climate and the sunny days suggested hospitality and social meetings, I noticed in the papers that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania had arrived by invitation at Louisville, Ky., to address an industrial convention. I noticed also with pleasure that after remaining at Louisville a few days he was escorted to the State capital, and then to Lexington, the center of the blue-grass region, and to other cities. We were all glad that the distinguished statesman from Pennsylvania had time and was willing to be our guest, for we love to welcome our brothers from the North as well as from the South to our State, believing that if "we know each other better we will love each other more."

The distinguished gentleman's speech in this Hall, I regret to say, indicates that he arrived at many erroneous conclusions while in Kentucky, and that he did not study that State as closely as he has studied the tariff.

When he called Kentucky a "laggard," why did he not compare Kentucky with Vermont, the first-born of the United States, and the only State which came into the Union before Kentucky, where protection has always flourished like a green bay tree, where it has had its stronghold for more than half a century, where the father of the existing tariff law has been elected term after term to the Senate of the United States? Vermont, the eldest daughter of our Republic, always steadfast and true to a protective tariff, has a population of 332,286, and only two Representatives in Congress. Kentucky has a population of 1,648,090, and has eleven Representatives in Congress, yet the gentleman singled Kentucky out as a laggard, and said not one word about Vermont.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] said of Kentucky:

> The mass of her people are steeped in poverty and illiteracy. In 1880 the number of her people above ten years of age, who were reported by the census as unable to read and write, was more than one-half her total population. That number was 606,578, while her total population, which of course included those under ten years of age, numbered 1,163,498.

This is a marvelous misrepresentation.

According to the census of 1880, Kentucky had a population of 1,642,000, instead of 1,166,498, as stated by him. The census report also shows that the percentage of illiteracy in Kentucky is less than in any other of the Southern States, except Texas and West Virginia; and instead of there being 606,578 persons, or one-half of her whole population, as he states, who can not read and write, there are but 258,186 persons above ten years of age who can not read and write, out of her entire population.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. McCREARY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. I was speaking, from census figures, of the proportion of illiteracy among the people over ten years of age. I said elsewhere that Kentucky had a population of more than 1,600,000, but that when you abstracted from that total the children under ten years of age, you were left with a total, as I stated it, of one million and one hundred and odd thousand, and that was the total with which I was dealing.

Now, as the gentleman has permitted me, I am ready to say that I may have fallen into error in assuming that the total of persons unable to read was distinct from the total of those who were unable to write, while it is possible that the latter number included the former; which would make a change in my figures but would leave the general elements of the statement as they are.

I have in my desk the papers upon which I based my statements.

Mr. McCREARY. I will read from the gentleman's speech which I hold in my hand, the corrected copy which he has printed and sent out to the country:

Speaking of Kentucky he said the mass of her people—> are steeped in poverty and illiteracy. In 1880 the number of her people above ten years of age who were reported by the census as unable to read and write were one-half of her total population. The number was 606,578, while her total population—

Which of course includes those under ten years of age—> numbered 1,163,498.

That speech does not agree with what the gentleman says to-day. Mr. Chairman, according to the census of 1880 Kentucky had a population of 1,642,000, instead of 1,163,498 as stated by the gentleman. He merely made, as regards Kentucky, a mistake of half a million, or one-third of her population.

Mr. KELLEY. I stated her population at 1,600,000, but her population within school age at 1,100,000.

Mr. McCREARY. I have here the remarks of the gentleman as printed and sent out by him.

The census report also shows that the percentage of illiteracy in Kentucky is less than in any other of the Southern States except Texas and West Virginia, and instead of there being 606,573 persons, or one-half of her whole population, as he states, who can not read and write, there are but 258,186 persons above ten years of age who can not read and write, out of her entire population, and when we subtract colored persons——

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman is mistaken. There are more than 348,000 who can not write.

Mr. McCREARY. I said "read and write."

Mr. KELLEY. There are 348,392 who can not write.

Mr. McCREARY. The gentleman makes the mistake now, as he did before, of adding together those who can not read and those who can not write.

Mr. KELLEY. Those are the illiterates; and they number, as I have said, more than 348,000.

Mr. McCREARY. I wish to be understood, Mr. Chairman, on this point, because I make a comparison with Pennsylvania to which I invite the attention of the gentleman. When we subtract colored persons in Kentucky over ten years of age who can not read, to wit, 133,895, there are but 124,219 white persons over ten years of age who can not read and write in that State, while there are 128,105 white persons who can not read and write in Pennsylvania. Thus it appears that there are more white persons who are illiterates in Pennsylvania than in Kentucky. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman whether the colored people are not part of the population of Kentucky?

Mr. McCREARY. They are; and are they not a part of the population of Pennsylvania?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes; but why do you exclude them when you enumerate the illiterates?

Mr. McCREARY. I subtract them in Pennsylvania and I subtract them in Kentucky.

Mr. KELLEY. The native white population of Kentucky who can not read and write are more numerous than in any other State.

Mr. McCREARY. I have stated that there is less illiteracy in Kentucky than in any of the Southern States except Texas and West Virginia, and the census report shows this.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania said:

> The mass of her people are strangers not only to the comforts of humble life but to the commonest and most absolute daily necessaries of Northern laborers.

This is a gross misrepresentation, for there is not a State in the Union where the laboring classes are better clothed, fed, and housed than in Kentucky, and this is the reputation of Kentucky with every person I have ever heard except the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to say that I quoted a statement made to the convention which I was invited to address, by one of its committee. I knew nothing of the subject; but it was so reported to the convention.

Mr. McCREARY. I have the published proceeedings of that convention. The gentleman may have heard privately some such statement, but no such statement was ever sent out to the public.

Mr. KELLEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon; it was.

Mr. McCREARY. Then I say further, Mr. Chairman, that on this important subject the gentleman from Pennsylvania ought not to have made that assertion unless he had examined the facts and found out for himself that it was the truth. [Applause.]

In his zeal to assail Kentucky, why does he forget his own city, Philadelphia, and his own State, Pennsylvania.

I call him as a witness to testify about his protection-ridden city. In his speech in the House of Representatives, May 8, 1879, he said:

> Why, sir, the people of my city, Philadelphia, the working people, whose pride it has been to have their families under their own roof, are many of them huddling together, three or four families in one such house, and then are probably unable to pay their rent.

No such poverty and huddling as he testifies to in his own city can be found in any part of Kentucky.

I have not time now to read the evidence as published by the Senate Committee on Labor and Education in regard to the condition and wretchedness of laboring men in the coal and iron region of Pennsylvania, but I commend it to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The testimony shows that the wages and earnings of laborers in the coal and iron region of Pennsylvania are not sufficient to give them comforts or even a decent support for their families, and that there has been a steady degradation in the condition of laboring men in Pennsylvania during the last twenty years.

Mr. Chairman, I will now read an extract from a speech made by a former member of this House in 1884, who is now the distinguished and honored mayor of New York City, Hon. Abram S. Hewitt:

> I have been in the coal regions of this country within the last six months, and have seen with my own eyes a condition of things which made my heart sad, which made me hope that this Congress might be wise enough to remove some of the causes of the wretchedness and the misery which I saw there. When I saw that men who worked a whole day away from the light of heaven, and who took their lives in their hands every time they entered the pit, are housed in hovels such as the lordly owners of the mines would refuse to stable their cattle in, then I felt that something was wrong in the condition of the American laborer.

When I learn that there are miners of iron ore working in the State of Pennsylvania for 75 cents a day, then I know that there is something wrong in the legislation of this country, for the duty upon iron ore was put up by the last tariff act on an average from 40 or 45 cents a ton to 75 cents a ton in order to protect these very miners and to give them high wages. When that act was passed they were in receipt of $1.25 a day; to-day they are in receipt of 75 cents a day. Surely, if there be virtue in legislation these men, hard-working, industrious, independent voters, if you will give them the means of living, ought not to have been reduced to this wretched state of misery. [Applause.]

My heart grows sad and swells with deeper emotions than his did when he was painting with lugubrious but unfaithful colors illiteracy and poverty in Kentucky, as I reflect that the poverty and suffering he has proven and the illiteracy I have shown exist in sight of Independence Hall in Philadelphia, the city of Brotherly Love, where the old Liberty Bell can still be seen; where the first constitutional convention assembled; where the centennial celebration of the Declaratio of Independence was held but a few years ago, and where, as civilization halted and took an inventory of our resources and of our vast and varied and wonderful progress, and the first grand volume of personal and national freedom was closed, the suffering and poverty in Philadelphia and in the State of Pennsylvania, if known, would have thrown a blight and gloom over all the proceedings. [Applause.]

He said also—

That the maxim of "Kentucky for Kentuckians" had been so rigidly maintained that there were many counties in the State in which a person of foreign birth could not be found.

If he had examined the Census Report of 1880 before making this statement he would have found that there were in Kentucky in 1880 30,217 foreign-born white voters, exercising all the rights of native-born citizens, and there are perhaps as many more families and an equal number of children under twenty-one years of age, making a total of at least 100,000 persons of foreign birth in Kentucky.

In the district which I have the honor to represent there are four flourishing settlements or colonies of Swedes and Swiss, several hundred in population, and I do not know how many are in the districts represented by other Kentuckians.

We have for a number of years had a bureau of immigration busily looking after immigrants, and a geological survey, both of which have done much good service and been of vast benefit to our State, but the distinguished gentleman seems to have overlooked them or failed to appreciate them.

His statement—

That so extreme was the poverty of a majority of the people of about one-half the counties of the State that they were unable to defray the expense of maintaining county governments, and were therefore known as pauper counties, whose local expenditures had to be paid from the treasury of the State—is as amusing as it is misleading and unfounded.

Under our system in Kentucky there is a general State tax. Last year it amounted to 47½ cents on each $100 worth of property, since reduced, I believe, to 42½ cents, of which 26 cents is for educational purposes.

Where the amount outside of the school tax collected in the county is more than sufficient to pay the county expenses, the excess goes into the State treasury to assist in defraying the general expenses of the State.

If there is a less amount of tax collected in a county than is needed to pay the necessary expenses of maintaining the county government, such deficiency is paid out of the treasury.

It is not because the counties are wholly unable to defray their expenses, but because in equalizing taxes they do not pay as much as is needed.

If it will give my friend from Pennsylvania any comfort, I will tell him that nearly every county of the so-called pauper counties of Kentucky is Republican in politics. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLEY. That shows that humanity is never totally lost, but there is always some redeeming element. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] Poverty can not extinguish all virtue.

Mr. McCREARY. If he wants more comfort I will ask him to read the census report of 1880, and he will find that while Kentucky has 2,059 paupers, his State, Pennsylvania, has 12,646 paupers, or more than six times as many as Kentucky. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the maxim that "charity should begin at home" is a beautiful and truthful one, and I commend it to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania.

When he said on the floor of the House of Representatives, "Kentucky is the most illustrious victim of the whisky trust," why did he not remember that New York, Illinois, and Ohio, paid last year more internal revenue than Kentucky, Illinois paying double as much, and Pennsylvania standing next to Kentucky? Why did he not look into the iron trusts, Bessemer-steel trusts, plow-steel trusts, general steel trusts, and whisky trusts of his own State? If the internal-revenue system has established a despotism in Kentucky, as he states, why has it not also established a despotism in Illinois, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, for Pennsylvania made more whisky last year and paid more internal revenue than all the thirteen Southern States, leaving out Kentucky?

A close examination of the last report of the United States Commissioner of Internal Revenue shows that his own State, Pennsylvania, is the most illustrious and conspicuous victim of the whisky traffic in the United States save one.

The Commissioner's report shows that Kentucky has 3,598 retail liquor-dealers, and that Pennsylvania has 19,240 retail liquor-dealers. While Kentucky has one saloon to 445 people, Pennsylvania has one saloon to every 204 people. These figures show that the gentleman might evangelize with success in his own State, and that he might read with profit the good words:

First cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye.

[Laughter and applause.]

If the number of saloons indicated are supported now in Pennsylvania, it is impossible to tell how many there would be if his wishes should prevail and the internal-revenue tax removed and free raw whisky allowed to the people.

Mr. Chairman, there is but one more correction I will make in the comedy of errors presented by the distinguished gentleman, but it is a very important one, and I believe he will be surprised when he sees the sunlight of truth.

He said, speaking of Kentucky:

It is a melancholy truth that to speak of her as a leading State, a progressive State, or even a prosperous State, would be to indulge in bitter irony.

Suppressing my fervid feelings for a State which I love so well, and passing without comment her genial climate, unexcelled for healthfulness in any part of the Union; the diversity and fertility of her soil, which will produce an abundance of almost anything that can be grown in any other locality; her rivers, which equal if they do not exceed in number, navigability, length, and supply of water-power, those of any other State; her area of coal lands, which exceed those of any of her sister States; her coking coal area, the largest in the Union and the nearest to extensive deposits of high-grade Bessemer-steel ores; her iron ore, her building stone, and vast forests which have hardly felt the ax of the woodman, I confidently assert that her progress, her prosperity, her possibilities, and her position are fully up to the highest average that can be established for the respective States of this Union.

I gather from the United States census reports and from other reliable and official sources the following facts:

Kentucky is seventh in population among the States of the Union. Instead of being stagnant, as he alleges, her population increased in the decade between 1870 and 1880, 24.8 per cent., being greater than that of thirteen of the other States, including Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, as the ratios of their increase were respectively, 19.99, 17.71, and 21.18 per cent.

The number of miles of railway completed in Kentucky in 1886 was 2,158, while according to the last report of the railroad commissioners 501 additional miles are under contract.

She levies and collects the heaviest school tax collected by any State in this Union, and gives more than one-half of all the taxes collected for general purposes to the education of her children.

She is first in the production of tobacco, producing last year 36 per cent., or over one-third of all the tobacco produced in the United States, and she is unequaled for her flocks and herds and horses. Among the Southern States she stands first in the value of property assessed, and she is first in the production of corn, first in the production of wheat, first in value of farms, first in capital invested in manufactures, and first in value of products of manufactures.

Among the States of the Republic, she is sixth in the production of corn, thirteenth in the valuation of all property, and tenth in the valuation of farms.

In one respect only Kentucky appears to be a laggard and in rear of the procession of States, and far behind Pennsylvania, and that is in her State debt, for she is practically without a State debt, while Pennsylvania heads the list of States with $19,084,288 of indebtedness.

The report of the inspector of mines in Kentucky shows that the output of coal from all the mines in the State in 1870 was only 169,120 tons. Now the annual output averages 1,500,000 tons, giving employment to about 4,500 persons, and putting in circulation in our mining regions at least $1,500,000 per annum.

The report of the Bureau of Statistics shows that prior to 1870 the product of iron in Kentucky was insignificant. In 1860 it amounted to only $804,204. The product in 1885 was $17,331,237, with an invested capital of $6,156,431.

The governor of Kentucky, in 1887, said in an address:

The latest report upon the internal commerce of the United States, made by the Bureau of Statistics at Washington, shows that the amount of capital invested in mining and manufacturing industries in Kentucky during the two years ending December 30, 1885, was $46,707,200; $20,022,200 more than in Alabama, notwithstanding all that has been said of her remarkable progress; $33,253,200 more than in Arkansas; $3,558,240 more than in both combined, and with the exception of these two $7,336,400 more than all the other Southern States together, and that the increase in 1885 was $10,100,800 greater than in 1885.

The same authority shows that the increase in the value of products manufactured in the State from 1880 to 1885 was $16,109,000 greater than the increase for the preceding decade.

While the increase in the sales of leaf-tobacco in the great market at Louisville was 22,279 hogsheads, or 54 per cent. for the ten years from 1870 to 1880, the figures for the following five years was 42,399 hogsheads, or 65 per cent., reaching the enormous amount of 107,670 hogsheads in the single year 1885, while for the same year, the last one reported, we had an increase upon the one preceding of 8,124 mules, 11,156 horses, 28,196 cattle, 334,000 bushels of wheat, 18,680,000 bushels of corn and 17,455,000 pounds of tobacco.

If this information does not remove the melancholy which the gentleman from Pennsylvania states depressed him, and convince him that Kentucky is somewhat of a leading, progressive, and prosperous State, he is hopelessly ill.

Mr. Chairman, I was surprised that the gentleman from Pennsylvania should devote nearly one half of his speech, that lasted nearly two hours, to an arraignment of Kentucky, but I could not let that speech go into history and remain in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD unanswered, and I was unwilling that my friend from Pennsylvania should not understand the facts about my native State. I hope I have convinced him that he was mistaken.

His assertions were so bald and pointed that I have been compelled to go into details to disprove them, but I have not intended to say a word to wound the sensibilities of any man or that was not indicative of the courtesy which I should extend to the distinguished leader on the Republican side who has been a member of Congress for twenty-seven years.

I give him credit for telling one fact and throwing a ray of sunshine on the blurred and blotted picture he had painted. He said:

> Central Kentucky is the seat of a more refined and cultivated pastoral community than I have ever been introduced to elsewhere, unless it was in the southern counties of England. * * * That the soil and native growths of this region of the State contr bute, in an exceptional degree, to the physical development of the human race and that of domestic animals is attested by the grand and harmonious development of its men and women, as well as by the almost unchanging superiority of its highly bred flocks and herds and studs of horses, which are the pride of the State.

His arraignment of Kentucky was for the purpose of showing what a blight the internal-revenue tax and the chief article embraced in it had been to Kentucky, and what a blessing the tariff had been to the whole country.

In other words, the purpose was to show that we should have free whisky, free tobacco, and free beer, but the tax should remain high on the necessaries of life.

I can not indorse that doctrine, and as long as I have health and strength my voice shall be raised in defense of Kentucky when her good name and fame are assailed.

THE BILL.

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Ways and Means labored hard for months, and the result of their wisdom and industry is the bill now under consideration. It may not come fully up to the wishes of all, but it is a movement in the right direction.

All legislation is the result, more or less, of compromise. The vast and varied interests of our country require concessions to the sentiments, industries, and productions of the different sections, and under all the circumstances which surround us, I am willing to accept the bill reported by the committee.

I can see no evil that can result from a conservative diminution of the taxes as provided by the bill.

The contest is not between tariff and free trade, as some have alleged, but it is between a high tariff and a reasonable tariff.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's hour has expired.

Mr. LANHAM. I move that the time of the gentleman from Kentucky be extended.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope the time of the gentleman will be extended ad libitum, and that he may be allowed to proceed until he has concluded his remarks.

Mr. MCCREARY. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for his courtesy.

Mr. KELLEY. I have interrupted the gentleman a great deal myself, and I hope this privilege will be extended to him.

Mr. LANHAM. I will modify my request and ask that the gentleman be permitted to proceed until he has concluded his remarks.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. MCCREARY. I thank the members of the House for extending my time until I conclude my remarks.

Mr. MCCREARY (resuming). The bill under consideration proposes to reduce, not abolish the tariff.

It takes $1,756,000 off of earthen and glass ware; $12,330,000 off of woolens; $878,000 off of chemicals; $1,480,000 off of sugar; $331,000 off of provisions; $227,000 off of cotton goods; $3,000 off of books and papers; $3,121,000 off of other articles, and adds salt, tin-plate, wool, and other things to the free-list, amounting to $22,189,000, making in all a tariff reduction of $53,720,000.

It proposes to make a reduction in the intereal revenue, including tobacco, of $24,455,000, leaving out cheroots, cigars, and cigarettes, or a grand tariff and internal-revenue reduction of $78,176,000.

	Per cent.
Present rate on dutiable goods	47.10
Proposed rate on dutiable goods	40.00
Present rate on articles affected by bill	54.16
Proposed rate on articles affected by bill	33.36

The bill also prohibits revenue officers from destroying property seized by them, which they suppose had been used in illicit distilling, until after presentment or indictment of the owner, and trial and judgment before a proper tribunal.

It repeals all laws which prevent the producer of tobacco from selling it to whom he pleases and in any form except cigars, cigarettes, and cheroots.

It places wool on the free-list, the duty on wool now preventing nearly all the better classes of wool from coming into this country.

The home product can supply only about one-half of the amount reired for home consumption.

quThe statistician of the Agricultural Department estimates the domestic production for the year 1887 at 275,000,000 of pounds. It requires about 600,000,000 pounds of wool and other fibers manufactured with it to supply the annual demand of home consumption, which is more than double the product of our country.

The statement of the committee is so strong on this point that I give it in full, as follows:

> We say to the manufacturer we have put wool on the free-list to enable him to obtain foreign wools cheaper, and send them to foreign markets and successfully compete with the foreign manufacturer. We say to the laborer in the factory we have put wool on the free-list so that it may be imported and he may be employed to make the goods that are now made by foreign labor and imported into the United States. We say to the consumer we have put wool on the free-list that he may have woolen goods cheaper. We say to the domestic wool-grower we have put wool on the free-list to enable the manufacturer to import foreign wool to mix with his, and thus enlarge his market and quicken the demand for the consumption of home wool, while it lightens the burdens of the tax-payer.

Salt is also made free. The salt manufacturers of this country are protected by a duty on imported foreign salt equal to about 100 per cent. This has had the effect of building up a number of wealthy and powerful companies.

Salt is a raw material in cheese-making, butter-making, and in meat-packing—three interests that exceed the salt-making interests ten-fold—but our tariff policy forbids our dairymen and meat-packers from buying cheap imported salt, and compels them to buy from the protected home manufacturers in New York, Michigan, and Ohio, at a price which is nearly doubled by the tariff duty.

Hon. R. Q. MILLS, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, very aptly and forcibly illustrated in his speech the effect of the bill when he said:

> I find in the report one pair of 5-pound blankets; the whole cost as stated by the manufacturer is $2.51. The labor cost he paid for making them is 35 cents. The present tariff is $1.90. Here is $1.55 in this tariff over and above the entire labor cost of these blankets. The poor laborer who made the blankets gets 35 cents, and the manufacturer keeps the $1.90. The bill takes off 90 cents of the tariff duty.
> Here is a car-wheel weighing 500 pounds. Cost, $13. Labor cost 85 cents. Tariff rate is 2½ cents per pound, equal to $12.50 to cover a labor cost of 85 cents.
> Here is a coarse wool suit of clothes, such as our workingmen wear in their daily toil in the shop and field. Whole cost is $12. Labor cost is $2. The tariff is $6.48 to cover $2 of labor.

These are fair illustrations of the effect of the present high protective tariff.

This so-called great "American system" is often said to protect laborers, but it is so perverted that its beneficence stops in the pocket of the employer and leaves the poor laborer to get what he can in the open markets of the world.

OBJECTIONS TO THE BILL.

What are the objections presented to the bill?

The principal objections presented are:

First. That the passage of the bill will paralyze the industry and enterprise of the people and destroy the prosperity of the country.

Second. That the wages of laboring men will be lessened.

When only 2,623,089 persons are engaged in industries which are benefited by the tariff, and there are 57,000,000 people in our country who derive no benefit from the tariff, but are oppressed with its burdens, it is difficult to understand how the industry and enterprise of the people will be paralyzed or the prosperity of the country destroyed by the fair and conservative reduction, both of tariff duties and of internal taxes, provided in the bill.

Indeed, the marvel of the nineteenth century is the success with which less than one-twentieth of the people of our country have controlled legislation for years, in their own interests and to the prejudice of the great multitude.

One of the hobbies of protectionists is the growth of our country in the last twenty years. They point to this and then say, "behold the results of a tariff."

I admit that the vast and varied and wonderful progress, improvement, and advancement of our country in the last twenty years is remarkable, but it has not been because of the tariff, but in spite of it. It should be remembered that there is no country on earth which has the resources, the attractions, the facilities, the opportunities, and the possibilities of ours; that our people are brave, energetic, and intelligent; that we have the most fertile lands in the world, which are freely given away for homesteads; that here we have free speech, free press, free religion, and free suffrage: that ours is the leading nation in the world in education, in inventions, in transportation, and in agriculture, and that it is our great and unprotected agricultural staples, such as cotton and breadstuffs, whose growth has been the greatest, and but for the great volume of export of these staples our foreign commerce would make but a poor show and the balance of trade would be against us all the time.

During the last fiscal year our total imports amounted to $692,320,000 and our total exports amounted to $703,022,923, and of this total $523,073,798, or 74.41 per cent., were agricultural products, while only $136,735,105, or 19.45 per cent., were products of manufactures.

I have statistics taken from the United States census reports and from other reliable sources, which show a greater progress and improvement in our country from 1850 to 1860, a low-tariff period, than from 1860 to 1880, a high-tariff period.

As I have said before, the average tariff rate in 1850 was 27 per cent. I leave off decimals. In 1857 it had been reduced to a little over 18 per cent. on dutiable goods. It was raised to an average rate of 40.29 between 1862 and 1866.

Our population in 1850 was 23,191,876. In 1860 it was 31,443,321; an increase of 35.57 per cent. in this decade.

From 1860 to 1870 the population increased to 38,558,371, a gain of 22.62 per cent.; and from 1870 to 1880 to 50,155,783, an addition of 30.07 per cent. Thus the per cent. of increase of our population under a low tariff was greater than under a high tariff.

How has it been with railroads? There were 9,021 miles of railroads in the United States in 1850. The mileage in 1860 was 30,635, an increase of 239.6 per cent. during the low-tariff period. In 1870 there was a mileage of 52,914, a gain of 72.72 per cent. These figures had increased to 93,349 in 1880, a gain of 76.41 per cent. Therefore there was a gain of 239.6 per cent. in ten years of low tariff, from 1850 to 1860, and a gain in mileage of only 204.7 per cent. in the twenty years of high tariff, from 1860 to 1880.

How has it been with our foreign commerce?

In 1856 the value of the total imports and exports of the United States amounted to $641,604,850, of which American vessels carried $482,268,274, or a little over 75 per. cent. of the whole. In 1887 our total imports and exports reached the sum of $1,408,502,979, of which there was transported in American vessels $194,356,746, or only a fraction over 13 per cent.

Twenty years ago our flag, emblematical of American freedom, prosperity, and power, was seen in every port. Now it is rarely seen in any.

I read a published statement not long ago that of the thousands of vessels that passed through the Isthmus of Suez last year not one carried the American flag, and a traveler lately from South America told me this winter that during his travels for nearly a year in that country he did not see the flag of his country on any vessel except one, and that was a Government vessel. This destruction of our foreign carrying trade is the result of the prohibition of American registry to foreign-built ships and the high price of material caused by the tariff.

The effect on ship-building has been equally disastrous.

In 1855 we built in this country 400 vessels for the foreign carrying trade. In 1879 we built but 35. In 1857 the tonnage of sail and steam vessels of the United States engaged in foreign trade was about 3,000,000 tons. After twenty-six years of high tariff it has been reduced to 989,412 tons.

Mexico and the Republics of Central and South America are connected to our Republic by land, and form with the United States part of the western hemisphere. Their governments are fashioned after ours. They have much we need and we have much they need, yet the same system which has driven our flag from the ocean and nearly destroyed our tonnage has nearly destroyed our trade with the countries south of us.

Great Britain sold to the people of the Argentine Republic, Brazil, and Chili last year, $74,000,000 worth of goods, while we sold them only $13,000,000 worth.

As I have shown the effect of the tariff on our population, our railroads, our commerce, now let us see its effect on the long-suffering farmer. No class deserves more consideration than that engaged in agriculture. Our farmers control the largest landed interests in the world, and their possessions should be the pride and glory of our citizens. They are engaged in the oldest and largest industry of our country, and 52 per cent. of our entire population are farmers or are directly dependent on them for support. They furnish food for our whole population, and they send abroad three-fourths of the entire exports sent from the United States to foreign countries. They create one-half of the wealth of our country and receive as their share only about 4 per cent. on their investment, and are required by the protective-tariff system to pay an increased cost on the articles they use of four hundred millions to four hundred and fifty millions of dollars annually.

No protective tariff benefits the farmer. On the contrary he is compelled to sell his crops at prices fixed in the great markets of the world. These markets have the whole world from which to draw their supply, and he is compelled to compete with all kinds of labor. The farmer asks no tariff protection, but he is asking in thundering tones for equality under the law.

The census reports tell the difference between the situation of the farmer under a low tariff and a high tariff, as follows:

By the census of 1850 the estimated value of farms in the United States was $3,271,575,426. In 1860 the value was estimated at $6,645,045,007, showing an increased value during this decade of $3,373,469,581, or more than 100 per cent. In 1870 the value of the farms was esimated at $9,262,803,861, showing an increase during the decade of $2,617,758,861, or less than 40 per cent. In 1880 the value of farms was estimated at $10,197,096,776, being an increase during this decade of $939,292,915, or only a fraction of 9 per cent.

The value of the live-stock in the United States in 1850 was estimated at $544,180,566. In 1860 it was valued at $1,089,329,915. The increase during the decade was $545,149,349, or over 100 per cent. In 1870 it was estimated at $1,525,276,547, being an increase during the decade of $435,946,542, or less than 40 per cent. In 1880 the live-stock was valued at $1,500,464,609, being a decrease during the decade of nearly $25,000,000, or more than 1½ per cent.

There seems every reason to believe that between 1850 and 1860 there was a very rapid increase in wealth. In the general prosperity of the country the great farming community appears to have fully participated. Then, as now, it comprised about one-half of all our people. Starting in 1850 with less than $4,000,000,000, they increased their wealth by more than an equal amount in ten years. But since 1860, with far more than twice as much capital, and added millions of persons employed, they have scarcely been able, even by the highest estimates the census officers could possibly make, to add as much to their wealth in twenty years as they did in the preceding ten.

In 1860 farmers owned half the wealth of the country. In 1880 they owned but a quarter. By the census estimates the other half of the community between 1860 and 1880 increased their wealth by more than $23,000,000,000. But farmers, starting with an equal capital, increased their wealth during the same time only a little more than $4,000,000,000.

WAGES.

The next question to answer is, "Will the wages of laboring men be lessened by the passage of the bill?" I think it is clear that they will not. The reduction of tariff duties is so conservative that even if wages were affected by the tariff I do not think the passage of the bill would have any appreciable effect on wages.

The fact is, wages are not governed by the tariff, but by the supply and the demand for labor and by the facilities and opportunities afforded by the country. France has a protective tariff, and yet wages are lower in France than in free-trade England. Germany has still higher protection, and yet wages are lower than in France, and far below what they are in England. I append to my remarks tables which are conclusive on this point.

If the tariff makes wages high Germany and the United States should be the paradise of laboring men, but this is not the case. We find that free-trade England and our tariff-walled Republic, with identical conditions as regards capital and machinery, lead all other nations in the wages of laboring men. No people on earth have been more deluded and humbugged than the workingmen of our country have been by monopolists and manufacturers who have continually demanded a high protective tariff for the benefit of American laborers, but who have always pocketed the receipts and let the workingman take care of himself.

Did any one ever hear of a manufacturer going out to hunt a high-priced laborer when he could get a low-priced laborer who would perform the same work as promptly and as skillfully? Did a protected manufacturer ever call his laborers around him at the end of the year and propose to divide with them his enormous profits? No; the millionaire manufacturer gets his labor, like the railroad king, in the open markets of the country as cheap as possible.

Not only that, but sometimes Pinkerton detectives are placed at steel works, as was done a few days ago at the Edgar Thomson Steel Works, in Pennsylvania, for the purpose of protecting Hungarian immigrants who are going in there to work, while the native American workmen on a strike are at the point of the gun and pistol kept out. Not only that, but on the sacred anniversary of our country's liberty in 1864 an act known as the "contract labor law" was passed, which not only encouraged but legalized the importation of pauper labor from Europe to compete with American labor, and authorized a species of servitude in our free Republic which was as disgraceful as it was despicable. [Applause.]

I read the second section of the act:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all contracts that shall be made by emigrants to the United States in foreign countries, in conformity to regulations that may be established by the said Commissioner, whereby emigrants shall pledge the wages of their labor for a term not exceeding twelve months, to repay the expenses of their emigration, shall be held to be valid in law, and may be enforced in the courts of the United States or of the several States and Territories; and such advances, if so stipulated in the contract, and the contract be recorded in the recorder's office in the county where the emigrant shall settle, shall operate as a lien upon any land thereafter acquired by the emigrant, whether under the homestead law when the title is consummated or on property otherwise acquired until liquidated by the emigrant; but nothing herein contained shall be deemed to authorize any contract contravening the Constitution of the United States or creating in any way the relation of slavery or servitude. (United States Statutes at Large, volume 15, 1863-'65.)

A Democratic House of Representatives repealed this entire act in 1885, and a Democratic President approved an amendment to the act repealing it, which made the repealing act more effective in prohibiting the importation and migration of foreigners and aliens under contract to perform labor in the United States.

I hope the day is not far distant when the laboring men will shake off the thralldom which monopolists and manufacturers have so long imposed upon them. They should be as free and equal before the law with their employers as they are before their God.

Capital and labor should stand together as twin sisters, recognizing the fact that united they will stand and be prosperous, divided they will fall and be injured, if not destroyed.

Stupendous efforts first gave freedom of thought. Then in the blood of saints and martyrs religious freedom was obtained. Then political liberty was achieved in our great Republic. The full measure of human liberty will be obtained when we also have real industrial freedom. [Applause.]

DOES THE TARIFF PROTECT LABOR?

The last census shows that there are 17,392,099 of our people engaged in all kinds of industries. Seven million six hundred and seventy thousand four hundred and ninety-three are employed in agriculture, 1,139,362 in professional services, 2,934,876 are laborers and domestics, 1,810,256 are employed in trade and transportation, 1,214,023 are carpenters, masons, blacksmiths. builders, bakers, plasterers, tailors, agricultural-implement makers, shoemakers, railroad employés, milliners, dressmakers, and other miscellaneous occupations, leaving 2,623,089 persons employed in such manufacturing industries as are claimed to be benefited by a high tariff.

Thus it appears that 14,769,010 persons who perform six-sevenths of the labor done in this country are thoroughly taxed and fleeced for the benefit of 2,623,089, but only a few thousand of the last-named number receive the profits of the tariff. They are the owners and lords of the factories, the nabobs of the "trusts," the "pools," and the "combines," who make often from 30 per cent. to 50 per cent. per annum on their investments.

The 2,000,000 laborers employed in manufacturing or mining are not protected by the tariff, because they must compete with 8,500,000 other laborers in this country and with all the laborers of the world (except the Chinese, who are prohibited from coming here), and in addition to this they are compelled to pay the increased price for clothing, shelter, food, and home conveniences produced by the tariff.

While there is a tariff on thousands of things, there is no tariff on labor. When we come to the poor laborer we find absolute free trade. The manufactures of Europe can not be shipped here without paying a high duty, but European labor, and often pauper labor, comes here without paying a cent of duty. The tariff does not protect American labor. It protects the article on which it is laid by shutting out or lessening foreign importations.

As, for instance, a tariff on iron protects iron, a tariff on blankets protects blankets, a tariff on silk protects silk, but a tariff on iron does not protect blankets or laborers. The tariff must be on the thing protected. As there is no tariff on labor, of course labor is on the free-list.

PROTECTIVE TARIFF OUTGROWTH.

Twenty-seven years of protection have produced strange offspring. Who ever heard of a tramp in our country twenty years ago? Now they are seen daily, and almost hourly, in the by-ways and in the public places. Who ever heard of strikes and lockouts in our Republic until our high protective tariff period?

The advance sheets of the third annual report of the Commissioner of Labor show, in the six years from 1881 until 1886, there have been strikes in 22,336 establishments. Of these 16,692, or 74.74 per cent., were in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Ohio, and Illinois, where protection is claimed to have wrought such wonders for the laboring man. There were lockouts during the same period in 2,182 establishments. Of these 1,981, or 90.8 per cent., occurred in the five States named. The number of employés striking and involved was 1,324,152. In addition to these there were 159,548 employés locked out, 31.22 per cent. of whom were females.

Of the 22,336 establishments in which strikes occurred, the strikes in 18,342, or 82.12 per cent. of the whole, were ordered by labor organizations; while of the 2,182 establishments in which lockouts occurred, 1,753, or 80.34 per cent., were ordered by combinations of managers.

The loss to the strikers as given was $51,819,163. The loss to employers through lockouts was $8,132,717, or a total wage loss to employés of $59,951,880. It occurred in 24,518 establishments. The average loss was $2,415 to each establishment, and nearly $40 to each person involved.

Will gentlemen say, after pondering these disturbances, that the tariff law makes our country an Eden for laboring men, or will they rather say its—

——— inhumanity to man
Makes countless thousands mourn?

Investigations started by the Agricultural Department and pursued by other inquirers have brought to light the mortgages held in Eastern States on the farms in the West. The South is not touched in the report, but the appalling statement is made that mortgages in ten States of the West reach the sum of $3,422,000,000, being three times the bonded debt of the United States, and these mortgages draw an average interest amounting to over $200,000,000 annually. They are held by Eastern men, and are distributed as follows:

Ohio	$701,000,000	Iowa	$351,000,000
Indiana	398,000,000	Nebraska	140,000,000
Illinois	620,000,000	Kansas	200,000,000
Wisconsin	250,000,000	Missouri	257,000,000
Michigan	350,000,000
Minnesota	175,000,000	Total	3,422,000,000

CONCLUSION.

Mr. Chairman, I have already occupied more time than I intended. The issues which I have been trying to discuss are the issues that are ringing throughout the length and breadth of our country. They are not new.

Nearly four years ago the Democracy in national convention gave solemn pledge to—Reduce taxation to the lowest limit consistent with due regard to the preservation of the faith of the nation to its creditors and pensioners.

And our brave and able President in his last annual message to the Congress of the United States declared:

The simple and plain duty which we owe the people is to reduce taxation to the necessary expenses of an economical operation of the Government, and to restore to the business of the country the money which we hold in the Treasury through the perversion of governmental powers.

Mr. Chairman, the question of taxation stands next to free government. I am glad to be a member of a Congress to which a President sent an annual message entirely on tax reform, and which is true to the principles and teachings of the Democratic party from its organization by Jefferson at the beginning of this century to the present time.

I am proud to live in a Republic which has a Chief Magistrate so brave and patriotic and so mindful of his obligations to the people as to be willing to do his duty and follow the dictates of his heart, let the consequences be what they may; and I rejoice that I live at a time when the questions of reasonable taxation for the economical maintenance of the Government and high protective taxation to make the rich richer and the poor poorer are to be fairly tried before the voters of the greatest republic on the earth. [Applause.]

There can be, in my judgment, but one result. There will be a reform of tariff duties. The people's money, heretofore piled up in the Treasury, will flow again into the channels of commerce and trade to gladden the hearts of laboring men and benefit the vast and varied interests of our land.

The party organized by Jefferson, whose principles have been so ably and honestly supported by Cleveland, will triumph, and with "Peace on earth, good will toward men" as a sweet benediction, our country will move on to the accomplishment of its grand and glorious destiny. [Great applause.]

The following are the tables referred to by Mr. McCREARY.

[See tables on following page.]

COST OF LIVING—MASSACHUSETTS AND GREAT BRITAIN.

Rents are 89.62 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain.
Board and lodging is 39.01 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain.
Fuel is 104.96 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain.
Clothing is 45.06 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain.
Dry goods are 13.26 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain.
Boots and shoes are 62.59 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain.
Groceries are 16.18 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain.
Provisions are 23.08 per cent. higher in Great Britain than in Massachusetts.

The above facts are taken from the report of the Massachusetts bureau of labor statistics for 1884.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I beg leave to ask unanimous consent of the committee to consume some ten or twelve minutes before the gentleman next to be recognized shall take the floor; in other words, I ask to have that much time in my own right.

Mr. McCREARY. I hope unanimous consent will be given the gentleman from Pennsylvania; and I ask that it be granted to him.

Mr. KELLEY. I thank the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. CHAIRMAN Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no apology to make to Kentucky or to her gallant sons for my description of the condition of affairs in that State; but I desire to correct what appears to have been a clerical error on a single point in my remarks.

On page 23 of my printed remarks I find that in speaking of Kentucky I used the following language:

> Her territory is contiguous to seven States, the population of which numbered in 1880 more than 14,000,000, which together include 307,925 square miles, and were intersected at the close of last year by 33,555 miles of railroad over which her travel and traffic might be connected with and enjoy the benefits of our entire system of local and transcontinental lines. Her area is 41,283 square miles. Her population—

And I call the gentleman's attention specially to these words—

Her population in 1880 numbered 1,648,690, and in 1887 there were 2,070 miles of railroad operated within her limits.

I also said that she had more square miles of coal than England ever had; that the coal fields of Kentucky exceed in extent and richness those of England as they came from nature. But the error which has been brought to my attention is that I used, in referring to the measure of illiteracy, the school figures and referred to them as representing the total population.

In comparison with Pennsylvania, the official record of the census in a general comparison of all the States, sent to the Hon. Albert S. Willis, of Kentucky, from the Census Bureau, shows that while Pennsylvania had but 3.41 per cent. of population who could not read, Kentucky had 15.66 per cent., or nearly five times the percentage of Pennsylvania.

Mr. McCREARY. From what paper is the gentleman reading?

Mr. KELLEY. From the report sent by George W. Richards, acting Superintendent of the Census, to Hon. Albert S. Willis, of Kentucky, in response to an inquiry addressed by him asking for a comparative statement on this subject.

Mr. McCREARY. I wish the gentleman from Pennsylvania would use the figures given by the United States census reports.

Mr. KELLEY. Why, this is from the Superintendent of the Census.

The total number of persons over ten years of age returned as unable to read in Kentucky was 258,186, or 22.2 per cent.; and the number returned as unable to write 348,392, or 29.9 per cent. My mistake was in not noting the fact that the latter total embraced the former, while I added them together.

Of the white persons of the age of ten years and over the total number is given at 973,275, of which number, as I have said, 214,497, or 22 per cent. were unable to read. But of the native white population of Kentucky ten years old and upward, numbering 914,311, there were unable to write, according to this table, 208,796, or 22.8 per cent., showing a considerably increased percentage of illiteracy amongst the native white population as compared to that of the total white population. That fact is accounted for in this way. The total foreign-born whites in this State were 58,964. The number of them who were unable to write was 5,701, or of foreign white citizens 9.7 per cent. against 22.8 per cent. of the native white population. I shall correct the figures in my printed paper if it can be done.

Now, I desire to say that I made no statement reflecting upon the condition of Kentucky that could wound any sensibility that I did not utter in the course of my remarks in the Louisville opera house when I was addressing the assembled business men of the State of Kentucky.

Mr. McCREARY. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, I desire to state that in my remarks I wish it to be understood distinctly that what I said was prompted by the kindest motives and with no intention to wound the feelings or offend the sensibilities of anybody.

Mr. KELLEY. I believe that; and appreciate the gentleman's courteous manners.

Mr. McCREARY. I only desired to correct the mistake which I thought the gentleman from Pennsylvania had fallen into, but had not deliberately made.

Mr. KELLEY. And I want to say to the gentleman that I received authority for all my statements in the conference of business men of Kentucky, which I had been invited to address; and that I produced in support of my statements here extracts from my address to that body taken from the Courier-Journal of the succeeding morning. No, sir; I said nothing here that I had not said to my hosts in the opera house at Louisville. So I repeat if I have slandered Kentucky, the business men of the State, in conference assembled, crammed me with the slanders which were printed next morning in the Courier-Journal with no intimation that they were slanders.

Mr. McCREARY. I wish to say, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me, that in answering his remarks to-day I did not refer to anything in his speech delivered in Kentucky. The extract I made is taken from the speech he made here the other day, and not from the speech he made at Louisville, which he incorporated in his remarks.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman is mistaken. It was from that address the phrase "laggard" came. I never used it but on that occasion. I did then speak of Kentucky as a laggard, and said to the gentlemen of that convention that as I sat and listened to them it appeared to me "that they were crying aloud to each other, if not to the Almighty, what shall we do to be saved?"

Mr. McCREARY. I hold in my hand the printed speech sent out by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and in that speech, not in what is taken from the Kentucky speech, but in the portion in larger type, I find this:

> Mr. Chairman, my suggestion that there was something wrong in the condition of Kentucky and my inquiries as to what caused her to be a laggard even among the Southern States, etc.

Mr. KELLEY. What page are you reading from?

Mr. McCREARY. Page 29. I have the extract marked, and it is what you said on the floor of the House.

Mr. KELLEY. If you will look above a little you will see that I was quoting my Louisville speech. I quote it now:

> There is something wrong in Kentucky or these stories could not be circulated about her without contradiction.

And I am repeating what I said to that convention, and it is in close type.

> Why, years ago Kentucky was selling nails to Pennsylvania; the first machine for cutting and heading nails was invented and constructed in Kentucky. Yes, Lexington for many years shipped nails to Pittsburgh; but the trade has gone now; you do not do it now; you have not tried to do it. What is the secret of the failure?

That was quoted in my recent speech from the Courier-Journal report of my Louisville address. A distinguished gentleman of Kentucky took me to the city of Winchester, and being there he and others said to me: "You are now in a city in which no house was built during the last half century." I was then taken by a party of Winchester (Ky.) Democrats to see the house which was the last one that had been built in more than fifty years before the spirit of the new South came into Winchester, and under the impulse of which many dwelling-houses, a Methodist college, and two normal schools were being built.

Mr. McCREARY. I know the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him to ask him a question which brings out the success of a city which entertained the gentleman so handsomely. Will he tell this House how many houses have gone up there within the past two years?

Mr. KELLEY. I do not remember the number, but I eulogized the enterprise of Louisville all through my address. I told my hearers that Louisville holds the same relation to the expanding Southwest that that marvel of commercial growth, Chicago, bears to the great Northwest. They did not understand me to be offensive, nor was I, in the tone of any of my remarks.

Again, one of the most distinguished men of Kentucky said: "You can better estimate the condition of the mountaineers of our wealthy coal regions by a little prayer uttered by one of their ministers, of which I will give you a copy."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to read the prayer referred to, as I sympathize with its humane and Christian spirit. It was as follows

> O Lord, may the time soon come when the jingle of the sang hoe and the grate of the gritter may be heard no more forever.

If gentlemen want to know what the "grate of the gritter" and the "jingle of the sang hoe" are they can get the information by extending my time two minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROUT. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended for two minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLEY. I was told by an eminent Kentuckian, who has given me much valuable information by his reports as well as in my pleasant social intercourse with him, that this prayer illustrates one department of agriculture and one department of culinary service. The "sang hoe" is a small hoe of domestic manufacture, with which the people dig ginseng root, which is the only agricultural staple of a portion of the mountain district in Southeastern Kentucky.

Mr. McCREARY. Is that the Republican district you are referring to?

Mr. KELLEY. It is a Kentucky district; and the fact that Republicanism prevails there shows that poverty, however terrible it may be, can not obliterate all of the best impulses of humanity.

So much for the "sang hoe." Now, what is the "grate of the gritter?" That is heard in kitchens. The "gritter" is a piece of castaway tin or sheet-iron, through which holes have been punched with a nail, so as to throw out the surface on one side and make it rough. In its use it is what we would call a grater. It is used by good Kentucky women, in the midst of such wealth of minerals and timber as Pennsylvania never had, for rubbing the green corn from the cob in order to cook it for a family meal. So that now you know what the "jingle of the sang hoe" and the "grate of the gritter" are. The spirit of the new South will probably substitute better implements for both of them.

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Chairman, since I have been a member of this House, during almost every session at which I was present, I have heard gentlemen denounce and condemn and breathe out fiery invective against the protective system of this country. I have listened to messages and documents read from the Clerk's desk, inveighing in the most bitter terms against the tariff. Gentlemen, otherwise calm, suave, and dignified, I have seen when this subject was under discussion become satirical, abusive, censorious, captious—almost common scolds. I have heard the tariff characterized as "vicious, inequitable, and illogical," cruel and merciless—in fact the whole vocabulary of invective and scold words have been hurled at it, in season and out of season—in order and out of order—until I almost fancied and was made to believe that every manufacturer in the country was a being of whom it could be said—

> Through life's dark road his sorded way he wends,
> An incarnation of fat dividends.

Nay, more, I came to fancy and almost believe that the tariff was another Minos to whom the people paid tribute, that the manufacturers were the Minotaurs who devoured the tribute, and that the only Theseus who could deliver us from this galling thraldom was the star-eyed deity of free trade. Nor was this all, for my imagination has, at times, been so wrought upon by the glowing and fervid eloquence of these gentlemen that it painted every consumer a Sinbad, and the tariff an old man of the sea that clung to the consumer as closely as the shirt of Nessus. But it was only fancy and imagination, which, like a morning mist, fled at the first touch of the sunlight of truth and investigation.

How much does this great burden figure up in dollars? What is the weight of this old man of the sea which each person in the United States has to bear? The revenues of the United States from all sources during the year 1887 were $371,403,277, or about $6 per capita. Of this $154,116,364 came from internal revenue, land sales, and miscellaneous sources. There is no complaint made about this tax. Just at this time temperance fanatics, if they happen to be free-traders, benignly smile upon and lovingly caress the florid face of old John Barleycorn. The balance, $217,286,893, came from customs duties, and is the bone of contention. It is upon this tax that the vials of wrath have been so unsparingly poured. It has been computed by very careful statisticians that of the customs tax only about $85,000,000 are collected from articles of prime necessity. I do not include in this estimate sugar, because the committee has seen fit to leave it practically untouched. They treated it, whether they so regarded it or not, as a purely revenue commodity.

Now, if it were admitted that the $85,000,000, which is collected from articles of prime necessity, is added to the cost of home-made articles of similar character to the imported articles upon which it is laid, still the burden would be only about $1.25 per capita, or about what we now pay for pensions. Here, then, is the incubus—the old man of the sea—the mountain of oppression and iniquity which is crushing and paralyzing the farmer and the consumer—$1.25 per annum. But I propose presently to show that scarcely a dollar of this $85,000,000 is added to the cost of home-made articles of the same kind as those upon which it is laid. But I desire to first call attention to the fact that the committee do not appear to have had, when they framed this bill, a very alarming conception of the burden which is fastened with "relentless grasp" upon the people. I take it that the committee knew what they were doing and that they honestly endeavored to meet the "condition" with which we are confronted. This "condition" is an annual surplus of nearly $60,000,000. The duty of the committee, supposing of course that their only object was to meet the "condition," was to frame a bill that would prevent any further augmentation of this surplus. Have they done so? If this bill is passed will the "condition" disappear, and if so, will it, like Banquo's ghost, rise again to haunt and plague those who are responsible for its attempted taking off? Let us see. The bill places upon the free-list articles which in 1887 yielded a revenue of $22,189,595.

This reduction we are sure of, as well as a reduction of internal taxation to the amount of $24,455,607 if the bill should pass; but these two items will only reduce the revenue $46,645,202, leaving us still about $15,000,000 away from the "condition." Oh, but, say the committee, we have carved and butchered this "vicious, inequitable, and illogical" tariff, we have so badly wounded and crippled it that it will not yield during the coming year within $31,530,941 as much as it did in 1887; that is, we estimate a still further reduction of over $31,000,000 because of the cutting, slashing, and carving we have done. But there will be no such reduction, and these gentlemen know it. In groping through the labyrinthian corridors of the tariff, their footsteps must have been guided by the light of the lamp of experience. Possibly the distinguished chairman may have snatched a ball of woolen thread from the industry he proposes to ruthlessly destroy, and thus have performed the feat of Theseus by the aid of this woolen Ariadne—at least wool and its products seem to be the pivot upon which the wheel of the scheme revolves. But to the point. I venture the assertion that should this bill pass, within three years from the date of its passage the customs revenues will be greater than they are to-day. I base this assertion upon the experience of the past. By the act of July 14, 1870, the free-list was enlarged $2,403,000, and an estimated reduction from the dutiable list of $23,651,748 was made. This was a total reduction of over $26,000,000. The revenue from customs during the year 1870 was $194,538,374. The revenue from this source during 1871, instead of being $26,000,000 less, was $206,270,408, or nearly twelve millions more than it was the year before the estimated reduction was made; during the following year, 1872, the revenue rose to $216,370,287. This is the way the reduction of duties reduces customs revenue.

The act of May 1, 1872, placed tea and coffee upon the free-list. The revenue derived from these articles amounted to $15,893,847. By the act of June 6, of the same year, the free-list was still further enlarged to the extent of $3,345,724, and reductions were made from the dutiable list, which it was estimated would amount to $11,933,191. These two acts made a total reduction, free-list and estimated, of $31,172,762. The customs revenue for 1872 was $216,370,287. The revenue for 1873 amounted to $188,089,523, nearly $4,000,000 more than it was estimated to be by reason of the reductions of the previous year. By the act of March 3, 1883, the free-list was still further enlarged $1,365,999, and reductions were made upon articles on the dutiable list, which it was estimated would still further reduce the revenue $19,489,800, or a total reduction of $20,855,799. The customs revenue during the year 1883 was $214,706,497. During the years 1884–'85 there was a slight falling off in the revenues from this source; but during the year 1887 the customs revenue amounted to $217,286,893, or nearly three millions more than it was during the year 1883, when an estimated reduction of over $20,000,000 was made. In 1866, the first year after the war, the customs revenue amounted to $179,046,652. By the acts of July 6, 1870, May 1, 1872, June 6, 1872, and March 3, 1883, the customs revenue was reduced by free-list and reductions upon articles on the dutiable list $78,083,309 annually, and yet, notwithstanding this enormous reduction, the revenue derived from customs during the year 1887 was $32,240,241 more than it was during the year 1866, before these reductions were made. In the light of this experience, what reason have we to hope that this bill will permanently reduce, in any appreciable degree, the present customs revenue?

The revenue from this source was greater last year than any year since the close of the war except 1882, when it was about three millions larger than it was last year. How is this increase accounted for? It can be accounted for in no way except by increased importations, and these increased importations, made possible by the reductions of duties, are so great that they largely overbalance the free-list, which has been increased from time to time. It seems to me that in the light of this experience, or of these facts, there is nothing clearer than that a reduction of the customs duty upon any article which is now in competition with a home product, will increase the importation of that article so largely that notwithstanding the reduction of duty the revenue will be largely increased. It may be claimed that the increase here shown is due to the increase of our population. I do not concede this; but grant that it is true, how will that help us out of the difficulty? The President says we are confronted by a "condition," the surplus. The facts I have here stated demonstrate beyond controversy that we can not meet this "condition" upon the lines marked out in this bill.

There are only two ways of meeting the "condition" and preventing a further accumulation of surplus, and that is by the reduction of internal-revenue taxation or by enlarging the free-list to an amount equal to the annual surplus, to do which would wipe out and forever destroy the whole American protective system. I am loath to believe that the gentlemen who framed this bill did not understand what effect previous reductions of duty had upon the amount of revenue collected or goods imported. They certainly must have been aware of these things, and I am therefore reluctantly and much against my will compelled to believe that the projectors of this bill were governed, rather by a desire to cut and slash the tariff than to honestly meet the "condition," which the President of the United States expected them to meet, and which the best interests of the country demanded they should meet, and that is, to prevent an unnecessary absorption of the circulating medium of the country and prevent its being hoarded in the Treasury and taken from the channels of trade and commerce. But what does this bill in reality accomplish? A reduction of a little over $46,000,080, $24,455,607 of which is taken from tobacco. Of this tobacco tax the gentlemen who have so vigorously in times past denounced the tariff never complained, so that the only reduction the committee saw fit to make from the "vicious, inequitable, and illogical" tariff that could be applied to meet the "condition" is the $22,189,505 which constitutes the free-list provided for in this bill. Notwithstanding the vehement and fiery eloquence and vindictive aspersions with which the tariff has been assailed upon this floor by members of the House, and by the President and some members of his Cabinet, yet the committee did not dare to enlarge the free-list beyond $22,189,505; and this is in reality the only reduction which this bill, if passed, will make in customs taxation.

It therefore seems to me that this bill is a humiliating confession that all the evil things which these gentlemen have said concerning the tariff are not true. Twenty-two million dollars is about 6 per cent. of the total taxation of the United States, or about 35 cents per capita. Thirty-five cents a year, then, in the estimation of the committee, is the terrible burden that has weighed down the farmer and consumer—this is the heavy load that has curved the spine and paralyzed the energies of the laborer for lo! these many years. In view of all these things I am irresistibly driven to the conclusion that this measure is intended rather as an attack upon the protective system of America than an honest attempt to reduce the annual surplus.

Mr. Chairman, watch any gentleman while advocating this bill—mark him well, for some time during his discourse his face will become transfigured—

> While shakes his ambrosial curls, and gives the nod,
> The stamp of fate, and sanction of the god.

Behold! He strikes an attitude, such as the old masters gave Jove when launching his thunderbolts; there is a terrible glitter in his eye, which is "in fine frenzy rolling," and there bursts from his throat, like a shell from a cannon, these words, which appal the ear and strike terror to the heart as they bellow through the vast and boundless recesses of this Hall: "Shall the blanket of the poor man be taxed and whisky be free?" These words have been ringing in my ears, dancing in my brain, until in the wild delirium of a fever-racked imagination I heard some millions cry, "Whisky! whisky! Open, ye stills of Kentucky, and pour the mighty deluge and flood a thirsting world! Ye earthquakes, split the globe, the solid rock-ribbed globe, and lay all bare its subterranean spirit rivers and fresh-whisky seas!"—while other millions I did see, blanketless and shirtless, shake and shiver and "wallow naked in December snow."

From this mental mirage I turn to the stern realities of hard facts and figures. I find that in the estimation of the committee this "vicious, inequitable, illogical" tax which forces the consumer to "wallow naked in December snow," amounts to $17,720,635. That is the amount of free-list and estimated reductions on wool and woolen goods.

Many of the gentlemen who have of this tax sung such sad refrains as would draw "iron tears down Pluto's cheek" and cause every farmer to think himself a "child of misery baptized in tears," fought like valiant knights, and lengthened a day into a week, in a bold attempt to take from the Treasury just about that amount of money. The direct-tax bill carries just about the amount the committee thinks the consumer pays on woolen goods. Year after year, upon this floor, gentlemen who shed scalding tears because the poor man's blanket is taxed, vote without a heart pang or qualm of conscience for river and harbor improvements about as much money as the committee say the consumer is unjustly taxed on woolen goods. Seventeen million seven hundred thousand dollars, then, is the amount, after all, that is wrung "with relentless grasp" from the consumer by this tax. This is about 4½ per cent. of the entire tax the people pay, or about 29 cents per capita.

Twenty-nine cents, then, is the monstrous sum which this "cruel and merciless" tax wrenches from a single man every year. What an enormous hole this fabulous amount must leave in his income. Is it any wonder that the young men of the present day can not afford to marry? How could they afford to marry and also pay a tax of 29 cents a year? Adopt female suffrage and the party that would dare to continue this burdensome tax would be swept from power with the rapidity of the red-winged lightening.

Free whisky? I have not the figures, but I venture the assertion that the tax on the alcohol that is used in the manufacture of drugs and on the liquors used in the sick room, amounts to as much as the tax which the committee say is unjustly wrung from the consumer on woolen goods. Why did the committee, if the love they profess for the poor man is genuine, not endeavor, at least, to give him cheap medicine? Will any gentleman of the committee answer? In these comparisons I have admitted, for the sake of the argument, that the claim of the free-trader that the duty is added to the cost of the home-made article is true. The protectionist claims it is not true; but suppose we concede the free-trader to be half right, for the sake of further comparison, and then take into account the fact that poor men do not buy as much woolen clothing as the wealthy or middle classes, and where do we find ourselves? That the wool and woolen tax amounts to scarcely 12 cents per capita. Surely there has been, on this subject, a great deal of cry and very little wool. But why should the farmer and the manufacturer be placed in antagonism? Are they not correlatives in the operations of nature? Then why should they not be correlatives in the operations of human industry? When the farmer and the manufacturer are separated by long distances is not the middleman, the trader, the agent, and above all the transporter, a severe tax upon the energies and activities of both? When they are brought together, as they are by the protective system, this tax is to a large extent removed.

I think I have some personal knowledge of this subject. I was born in a farm-house and hoed my own row on a farm. I remember how the farmer prospered under the ad valorem tariff of 1846. It was in reality a free-trade tariff, as is always an ad valorem tariff that does not contain provision for the forfeiture of falsely invoiced goods. Under the operations of the tariff of 1846 the farmers of my native county sold their cattle and surplus products to drovers, traders, and agents, who had them transported to New York on the Erie canal and on the Erie road after it was built. For the farmer, in those days, there was mighty bad sledding on the road to Hard Scrabble. He was fleeced by middlemen, and frequently ruined by wildcat banks and depreciated currency. We did not, during those halcyion days of free trade, lay awake nights lest the nightmare of a woolen tax would freeze our blood. There was no such tax to annoy us. Our mothers spun the wool we sheared from the sheep we raised on the farm and wove the thread into cloth on a hand-loom. This was the only woolen cloth we wore. Last fall my county celebrated the centennial of its first settlement, during which time I revisited the glimpses of my childhood. Fancy's magic wand could not create a more striking change than I beheld—beautiful farms, neat and substantial buildings furnished with all modern improvements everywhere greeted the eye. In twenty-five years the thriving manufacturing towns of Binghamton and Owego, Susquehanna and Great Bend, have grown until their population is nearly 100,000. These towns are either in or upon the borders of my native county. The middleman has disappeared, the consumer and the producer, the farmer and the manufacturer are side by side, and both are prosperous and happy; and this is the condition of things in every State where has been adopted the American policy of bringing into proportionate and harmonious relation the four great branches of industry—agriculture, manufacturing, commerce, and transportation. Need I say more; can more be said upon this phase of the question?

The eminent gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] in presenting this bill to the House undertook, with an ardor and persistency worthy of a better cause, to show that the high rate of wages paid in the United States is not due to the protective system. The gentleman well knew and fully appreciated the fact that if it was admitted that the protective system enhanced the price of labor it would be extremely dangerous to in any way mutilate or injure that system. He is well aware that labor is the pivotal point around which this discussion centers. The main portion of his argument, therefore, was intended to demonstrate that the high rate of wages paid in the United States is due to coal, steam, and machinery. He says:

> It is these three powerful agents that multiply the products of labor and make it more valuable, and that high wages means low cost of product.

I admit that a high rate of wages means a low cost of product. That is an economic axiom half a century old. Having established this fact, and I do not deny it, the gentleman asks why it is that while the labor cost is lower in the United States while the rate of wages is higher, yet England produces her goods at a total cost lower than ours. His answer to this question is that labor does not cause this difference, but that it is caused by the cost of the material; that England has cheaper machinery and cheaper raw material than we have, and therefore the total cost of any given product is lower in England than in the United States, notwithstanding the higher rate of wages paid by us. Upon this point I take issue with the gentleman from Texas. He seems to have overlooked the all-important fact that capital is cheaper in England than it is in the United States. England has been able, quite recently, to fund her entire national debt at 2½ per cent. Four per cent. has been the lowest rate at which we could fund any appreciable amount of our public debt for any considerable length of time. In old, wealthy countries money is always cheaper than it is in countries comparatively new and poor. Money is cheaper in New York than it is in Chicago, and cheaper in Chicago than it is in Kansas City. The farther you go from the moneyed centers the dearer money becomes.

Now let us apply this quantity to the Mills equation and see if the answer to the problem will not be different. Suppose, for instance, that a plant costing a million dollars is to be erected in Pennsylvania or Ohio. The capital stock of such a plant could not be sold upon our markets unless a dividend of at least 6 per cent. was guarantied, and for the reason that the money of capitalists is now earning that amount or more. Capital to establish a similar plant in England could be easily procured for 3 per cent. The interest cost of the American plant would, therefore, be $60,000 a year, while the interest cost of the English plant would be but $30,000 a year; so that it will be seen that the American plant would have to withdraw from its earnings $30,000 a year before it would be upon the same plane as the English plant. This $30,000 added to the total cost of the American product will perhaps account for most of the difference in the cost of producing goods in each country. Let me quote against the distinguished free-trader from Texas a distinguished English free-trader. Mr. J. E. Cairnes is an eminent English publicist and writer of the free-trade school. His works are clearer and more incisive than the writings of either Adam Smith, Ricardo, or John Stuart Mill. Mr. Cairnes, in his work on Political Economy Clearly Expounded, in discussing this very question, and the question that a high rate of wages means a low cost of product, says, in speaking of the United States:

> How happens it then that, enjoying industrial advantages superior to other countries, they are yet unable to hold their own against them in the general markets of commerce?

This in substance, though not in form, is the identical question asked by the gentleman from Texas. I have given the answer of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. Now hear the answer of the distinguished and eminent English free-trader. This is what Mr. Cairnes says is the answer:

> What it means, and what it only can mean, is that they are unable to do so consistently with obtaining that rate of remuneration on their industry which is current in the United States. If only American laborers and capitalists would be content with the wages and profits current in Great Britain, there is nothing that I know of to prevent them from holding their own in any markets to which Manchester and Sheffield send their wares.

At last the cat is out of the bag. According to Mr. Cairnes—and he is an authority as great and as distinguished, let me say it with all due deference, in my opinion as the gentleman from Texas—according to Mr. Cairnes there is nothing to prevent us from holding our own in any market to which Manchester and Sheffield send their wares, provided our capitalists and laborers are content to take the wages and profits paid and received in Great Britain. Could this proposition be more tersely stated? It can be and it is more tersely stated by the same author in the same chapter. Speaking of the inability of America to compete with the pauper labor of Europe, he says:

> They can not do so and at the same time secure the American rate of return on their work. The inability no doubt exists, but it is one created, not by the drawbacks, but by the exceptional advantages of their position. It is as if the skilled artisan should complain that he could not compete with the hedger and ditcher. Let him only be content with the hedger and ditcher's rate of pay and there will be nothing to prevent him from entering the lists, even against this rival.

Yes, indeed, the American workman can compete with the English workman if he will be content to take the English workman's pay, and the American capitalist and manufacturer can compete with the English capitalist and manufacturer if he will be content with the same profit that the Englishman realizes upon his investment. Here is the whole case in a nutshell. Pass this bill and the American workman will be compelled to compete with the English workman and receive the English workman's pay, or starve.

I fully appreciate the anxiety displayed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] when he discussed this phase of the question; and I am inclined to believe that he felt while he was discussing it that it was the rock upon which his scheme would be wrecked. The gentleman said, farther along in his argument, that our prosperity was due to the intelligence of our labor and the unrestricted movements of our exchanges among sixty millions of people at home. Again, he seems to have forgotten to state the reasons why our labor is intelligent, and why we have exchanges to move unrestrictedly among sixty millions of people. But I anticipate. I will discuss this phase of the question farther along. As bearing upon the question of the relative cost of production in England and the United States, let me quote for the edification and information of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] from a report made to the House of Commons on the condition of the mining district in 1854. Among other things the report says:

> The large capitals of this country are the great instruments of warfare against the competing capital of foreign countries, and are the most essential instruments now remaining by which our manufacturing supremacy can be maintained.

Even as early as 1854 the statesmen of England became convinced that they could neither wheedle nor force other nations to adopt their free-trade policy, so they admitted that their immense and colossal aggregations of capital were the great instruments of warfare against the competing capital of foreign countries. Please mark the word and heed it well—warfare. I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] may now well understand why England can manufacture goods at a lower cost than the United States, and why it is vitally essential that American workmen should be protected, not only against the cheap labor of England, but also against its gigantic accumulations of cheap capital, which are used, as they themselves admit, to make war upon the industries of other nations. And shall other nations not protect themselves by measures sufficiently restrictive to at least counterbalance this warfare? Whenever revenue measures are discussed upon this floor the commercial policy of England is approvingly and ostentatiously paraded. Why?

Are we to adopt free trade because England has done so or because England wishes us to do so? What is the commercial policy of England? Before answering let us glance at some of the conditions which led to and aided in creating her present policy. Ninety-five per cent. of all the land in England is owned by less than 5 per cent. of the people. These land owners are mostly titled noblemen—lords, dukes, counts, and marquises. These lords of the land have converted the most fertile portions of England and Ireland into deer parks, pleasure parks, sheep walks, cattle ranches, drives, and lawns. The amount of land in England and Ireland withdrawn from agriculture and devoted to idle, non-productive, and useless purposes is simply enormous. Meanwhile the population of the kingdom steadily increased. The inevitable result followed. England could not feed her people with the productions of her own soil. Bread and meat had to be procured abroad; and when this condition of things was reached, when because of the dead weight of a useless and blighting landed aristocracy, population began to press upon subsistence, England was forced to abandon her protective policy, which for five hundred years had promoted and fostered her manufactures, and throw her ports open to the world, primarily in order to procure cheap breadstuffs. The corn laws which protected British agriculture were removed, because cheaper food became a vital necessity.

Nearly all the old restrictive or custom laws were repealed or greatly modified in order to induce, by the example, other countries to open their ports to British goods. To-day the settled policy of England is to have all the nations of the earth compete in her market for the sale of their raw material, so that through such competition she may be able to fix the price of what she wishes to buy; and in addition to that it is her policy to have all nations compete in her home market for her manufactured goods, to the end that through that competition she may be able to fix the price of what she has to sell, and thus become mistress not only of the seas, but of the industries and commerce of the globe. In pursuit of these aims and in establishing this policy England has been aggressive, unscrupulous, dishonest, and brutal. She laid a heavy hand upon the manufacturing industries of Ireland and they withered and perished from the face of the earth—labor became a drug in the labor market—the island being densely populated, the soil, the most productive in the world, was unable to feed the large extra manufacturing class that was thrown upon it—bad seasons and consequent failure of crops produced famines, and the people of Ireland melted away by starvation and expatriation almost as rapidly as the hosts of Sennacherib melted and withered before the breath of the angel of God. Six hundred and fifty years of the most barbarous cruelty and oppression, of bayonet rule, of rapine, plunder, bloodshed, and murder; six hundred and fifty years under the iron heel of the ruthless invader, under the domination of the most rigorous and prescriptive penal code ever known, at the mercy of incarnate brutality, under the shadow of the great robber nation of the world, and yet the spirit of the Irish people remained buoyant and unbroken.

But what all the engines of torture, the ingenuity of tyrants could devise, failed to do, the free-trade policy of England quickly accomplished, and poor, blasted, ruined, desolated Ireland weeps to-day, the Niobe of nations. What more? Laissez faire, laissez passer is inscribed upon the commercial banners of England; liberty for exchange, liberty for commerce, liberty for work, but no liberty for the human bodies she holds in hopeless bondage. Laissez faire, laissez passer—let us pass. Liberty for trade, and she blew Sepoys from the mouths of her cannon with as little compunction as the soldier discharges grape and canister at the advancing foe. Liberty for trade, and the Indian slave pays the transportation upon his raw cotton to England and the transportation upon the manufactured product when it is returned. "Liberty for commerce," she cried, while she forced the helot of Hindostan to eat unsalted, putrid fish because he was unable to pay the enhanced price of imported British salt, salt that he might have manufactured for a mere trifle at his own door. Laissez passer, and the shotted guns of England's war ships are turned upon the villages of the untutored, savage African, and the vilest, deadliest compounds, miscalled gin and rum, are forced upon these naked savages, and thus a deeper darkness throws a blacker shadow over the dark continent. Laissez faire, and the boom of England's cannon and the screech of bursting shells were heard in the ports and cities of China, and India's poisonous drug, the seductive opium, in the name of liberty, was forced down the throats of the resisting Chinese.

Let commerce be free—laissez passer—but in the early years of this century, when American ships were transporting the products of our country to French ports, our ships were seized, our citizens impressed, and our commerce destroyed by this same power that forever cries, "Liberty for trade, liberty for commerce." Laissez passer, and in the name of liberty for trade, this same robber nation passed up the Potomac and with a fiendish barbarity and unheard-of brutality sacked this city and applied the torch to this Capitol. This act of vandalism was perpetrated not eighteen hundred years before, but eighteen hundred years after the birth of Christ.

Laissez faire—liberty to work, to manufacture, but only for England, say her capitalists and manufacturers when they reduce prices and run their factories and works at a loss, as they have frequently done, in order to strangle and destroy the industries of other nations.

The war of 1812 closed our ports and forced us to manufacture goods we had previously imported. When peace was declared, England, in the name of liberty for trade and commerce, systematically began to cripple and strangle these new industries. In 1815, shortly after that war, Lord Brougham said:

> It was well worth while to incur a loss on the exportation of English manufactures in order to stifle in the cradle the foreign [American] manufactures.

Laissez passer, let commerce pass, let it be free, said England, during the late war, when she built with her own money privateers, manned them with British crews, and, under the flag of the Confederate States, launched them upon our merchantmen and drove our commerce from the seas.

Laissez faire, indeed. Whenever any nation establishes a new industry or one that enters into competition with an established English industry, England will be on hand offering the same goods at cheaper prices.

> Wherever God erects a house of prayer
> The devil always builds a chapel there.

In every great crisis of our history as a people, whenever our liberties were endangered, whenever the existence of our institutions was jeopardized and the life of the Republic hung in the balance, let us not forget that England was and has been our most aggressive, active, dangerous, and deadly enemy. Her Canadian dependency is a menace to our prosperity and peace, and always will be so long as England's flag floats over that country. The military system of Canada is as perfect as British craft and experience can make it; nor should it be forgotten that the railway system of Canada, fostered and aided as it was and is by England, was projected as much with a view to future strategic military as present commercial purposes. A glance at any map of the United States and Canada will convince the casual observer of this fact. The vapid vaporings of the Anglomaniac about kinship of race, even if re-echoed in England, do not deceive the American patriot. Every thinking man knows that the ruling classes of England are hostile to this Republic—ever have been, always will be. The English press and English statesmen favor the bill now under discussion, and this in itself furnishes a reason, a very strong and cogent reason, why the American Representative should give it grave, thoughtful, and prayerful consideration before he decides to support it or vote for it.

Having glanced at the policy of England, let us turn our attention to our own country. What is, what ought to be our national policy? It seems to me that our policy should be to develop to the highest attainable limit, within our own boundaries, and as far as possible bring into proportionate and harmonious relation, the four great branches of industry—agriculture, manufacturing, commerce, and transportation.

> No pent-up Utica contracts our powers,
> For the whole boundless continent is ours.

There are but few things which contribute to the happiness and comfort of man, and the creation and growth of great national life that can not be found in our mines or grown from our soil. Our climatology is as varied as the wants of man are diversified. There is no reason why we can not, if we so desire, become a distinct, independent people. It certainly ought to be our policy to create such industrial conditions, that if occasion demanded it, we could supply our people with every commodity in the whole range of human desires from within our own borders.

Why should we throw our markets open to the foreigner? It has cost us an incalculable amount of capital, an immeasurable aggregate of human exertion, besides great sacrifice of life, to transform the American forests and wilderness into the most opulent and powerful of nations and to maintain and preserve the most beneficent institutions known to man. And shall the alien and the enemy be given a share in the results of all our toil and effort without paying therefor a single cent? That would be to discriminate against our own citizens in favor of the foreigner. Nay, more; it would be permitting the alien, favored by cheap labor and cheap capital, and the industrial experience and development of six or seven centuries, to subject our people to the blighting competition these advantages would give him in our markets. This may be free trade, sugar-coated into "fair trade," but it is not fair treatment or fair play, nor is it common sense. Place upon the country, which by nature or adventitious circumstances is given special advantages over other countries in some particular line of trade or commerce, a restriction sufficient to counterbalance the special advantage, and you simply follow the great law of human existence, self-preservation.

But the doctrine of protection is in theory as sound and tenable as it is in practice beneficial and salutary. Let me not be misunderstood. I do not take shelter behind the doctrines of List that there is a distinction between the theory of values and living forces—that is, between wealth and its causes; nor do I pin my faith to the distinction between cosmopolitan and national political economy. I do not look longingly forward to that visionary, mythical illusion, the millennium, to furnish me an excuse and pretext for being a free-trader. I am an advocate of the industrial protective system because I believe in it. Free-traders claim a preponderance of argument over protectionists in all discussions upon this question. This is often apparently true, but it is due to the misleading and imperfect way the protective idea or case is presented. The free-trader, to be at all successful in argument against the industrial protective system, must attack that system in detail; and if by joining issue on each particular customs duty he shows what appears to be an injustice against any particular class of citizens, he loudly proclaims the injustice of the whole system. This is neither fair nor honest discussion. The fact is, the protective system stands as a whole, and if it is to fall it must fall as a whole.

The strength of the system lies in its entirety—in its ensemble and completeness as a system. When the free-trade lawyer, for instance, claims he is unjustly taxed, for the benefit of others, on the clothing which he wears, he is attacking the system in detail, and makes an apparent case against it. But when it is remembered that the retainer of the lawyer and the fees of all professional men rise and fall as the rate of wages rises and falls, it will be seen that the protective system works no injustice to them, because under that system the rate of wages being higher, their fees are relatively and correspondingly higher, and their abilily to pay slightly more for what they consume is thereby assured. The manufacturer of iron can not justly complain that his clothing is costing more than it would under the free-trade system, because the manufacturer of cloth could retort that he was paying relatively more for the iron and machinery he purchased. The farmer may say to the manufacturer that he is paying more for his agricultural implements and clothing than he would if foreign articles of the same kind were admitted free; but the manufacturer replies that the farmer has a home market created for him, and is paid more for the productions of the field than he would receive if he had to transport these commodities thousands of miles to some foreign market; so that, as M. Alby very pointedly puts it, we find that—

> As we run successively the entire circle of industrial and agricultural production with each new industry that we take account of, the era of the apparent injustice will be continually narrowing till we end by finding ourselves in the presence of a series of people paying dearer for what they purchase, but making others pay dearer for what they sell.

This is the industrial protective system in its completeness as a whole, in its ensemble. It is a great patriotic national system of assurance against the unjust and ruinous competition of the pauper labor, cheap commodities, cheap capital, and cheap men of foreign countries. Man's power over matter is but imperfectly developed by perfection in any single industry. Agriculture subdues the earth in one direction only, and its highest degree of perfection depends upon the aid it can receive from the whole range of art and science. The degree and extent to which the people of any community can command the forces and services of nature indicates the degree of civilization attained by that community, and the extent to which a people have diversified their industries—the variety of their pursuits, gives the best test of their power to command the governing forces of matter.

The greater the diversification of industry in a State the greater is the degree of material progress and intellectual development attained by its people. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], in his remarks in presenting the bill under discussion, contended and insisted that the high rate of wages labor receives in the United States was not due to the tariff, but to labor-saving machinery, which vastly augmented the laborer's productive capacity. In his eager haste to score a point against the tariff, the gentleman admitted, unintentionally no doubt, the very converse of the proposition for which he was contending. Whence came this labor-saving machinery? What was it that stimulated the inventive genius of the country? Is it not a law universally recognized in economics that inventive genius is most active and efficient in that country where wages are highest? High wages then preceded invention and the highest types of labor-saving machinery and appliances, and high wages were the result of the tariff. Hence it will be seen that when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] claimed that high wages were the result of labor-saving machinery he was simply arguing in a circle. But let me quote an eminent and learned free-trader against the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. Mr. Henry George, in an article on Chinese immigration, in one of our cyclopedias, says:

> To apply to the machinery and industrial methods which are in one country (America) the outgrowth of high wages, the cheap labor which in the other country (China) destroys the incentive to improvement may for the time result in large profits to those who make the combination, but if the effect be ultimately to reduce the general rate of wages the result in that country is to check invention and lessen productive power.

Mr. George is an authority in the free-trade camp, and justly so for he is a close student and a deep thinker. He says the machinery and industrial methods of our country are the outgrowth of high wages. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] says the high wages are the outgrowth of the machinery and industrial methods. Both of these eminent economists belong to the same school; but then doctors will disagree. But there is in the extract quoted from Mr. George a suggestion which it would be well for the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to take into prayerful consideration. If the effect of free trade will be to reduce the general rate of wages in this country—and there can be no doubt upon that point—the result, as Mr. George says, will be to check invention and lessen productive power. It seems, then, that wherever we find great diversity of industry we find a high state of normal progress in all the essentials of intellectual and national life, including active and effective inventive genius. Consequently, then, the degree of inventive genius found in a State indicates very clearly the general progress of that State.

Let us now apply the test of fact and see if this assertion can be proven. The report of the Patent Office for 1886 furnishes some very interesting data. During the year 1860 there were issued by the Patent Office 4,778 patents and reissues. This was 1 patent to each 6,580 of the population of the country. During the year 1870, notwithstanding the terrible war we had passed through, yet under the stimulating influences of the Morrill tariff the number of patents increased to 13,333, or 1 to every 2,891 of population. And during the last year, 1886, the number increased to 22,568, or 1 to every 2,665 of population upon a basis of 60,000,000. These figures demonstrate beyond question that a protective tariff stimulates and quickens invention, and the great apostle of free trade, Mr. George, is authority for the statement that active invention is the result of high wages, which statement, if true—and it unquestionably is—emphasizes and accentuates the proposition that a high rate of wages invariably results from a protective tariff.

It may be laid down as a general proposition which is susceptible of accurate demonstration that purely agricultural nations, or nations having but few manufacturing industries are invariably poor. Ireland and India are notable examples.

Do we want to be placed in this category? If so, we have only to adopt the free-trade policy of England. But are agricultural communities invariably poor? Let us see what the facts establish in our own country. Take the New England States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut. These States have an area of only 66,465 square miles, but a population of 4,010,529, according to the census of 1880. The assessed value of the property of these States in 1880 was $2,652,011,532, or $660 per capita. Now let us turn our attention to the fourteen Southern States, including Missouri and West Virginia, which are not wholly agricultural.

These States have an area of 882,700 square miles, and in 1880 had a population of 14,425,723, and property assessed at $2,370,923,269, or a per capita of but $164. The contrast would be more striking still if those portions of Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont which are purely agricultural were subtracted from the calculation. But let us pursue this inquiry a little further. The Middle States, including Maryland, Delaware, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and New York, have an area of 116,460 square miles, and had, in 1880, a population of 11,578,549, and property assessed at $5,564,578,488, or a per capita of $480. The twenty-one Western States and Territories have an area of 1,883,975 square miles, and had in 1880 a population of 16,963,428, and property assessed at $6,187,266,625, or a per capita of $358. It must be remembered that the great manufacturing States of Ohio and Illinois and the semi-manufacturing State of Indiana aid in keeping up the per capita of wealth in the Western States. From these figures it is clearly seen that the States, like the New England and Middle States, which combine manufactures with agriculture, and in which the true patriotic American policy of bringing into harmonious and proportionate relation the four great branches of industry is pursued, are far more wealthy and prosperous than the States whose industry is confined almost exclusively to agriculture.

According to the census of 1880 Alabama had an estimated or actual per capita of $299, North Carolina $319, Wisconsin $737, while Massachusetts had $1,568, Pennsylvania $1,259, New York $1,499, and so on. These figures speak in thunder tones for the diversification of industry.

All human experience goes to show, and common sense would seem to indicate, that the farmer who has a home market, whose land is contiguous to the workshop and the factory prospers better and has a steadier and more stable market and receives larger prices than the farmer whose market is some thousand miles from the scene of his labors. The average wealth of the citizen of New England is four times as great as the citizen of the Southern States, while the citizen of the Middle States has a per capita wealth three times as large. This is wholly due to the manufacturing and greatly diversified industries of the New England and Middle States, and these industries have been created, brought into being, fostered, and promoted by the protective system, which this bill seeks to strangle and paralyze. To still further accentuate the striking difference between the States of but one industry and the States of many and varied industries, let us again look at the report of the United States Patent Office. During the year 1886 there were issued to Massachusetts 2,116 patents, or one for every 842 of her population. During the same year there were issued to the people of Minnesota but 288 patents, or only one to every 2,711 of her population. The contrast between these two States is striking. It shows that there is three times more inventive activity and industrial progress in Massachusetts than there is in Minnesota. I do not wonder that the latter State has a united free-trade delegation upon this floor. Men are practically what their environment and conditions make them.

During 1886 there were issued to New York a patent to every 1,233 of her population; to Pennsylvania, 1 to every 1,871; to Ohio, 1 to every 2,000; to New Jersey, 1 to every 1,225; to Illinois, 1 to every 1,711; to Connecticut, 1 to every 729; to Rhode Island, 1 to every 1,101. These, with Massachusetts, are the great manufacturing States. Now look at the West and South: Missouri had issued in 1886, 1 to every 3,165; Wisconsin, 1 to every 3,305; Nebraska, 1 to every 3,453; Alabama, 1 to every 21,398; Texas, 1 to every 5,984; Georgia, 1 to every 11,015; South Carolina, 1 to every 21,640, and so on through the list. The average shows from five to fifteen times more inventive ability and industrial progress and activity in the manufacturing States than in those devoted almost entirely to agriculture. It is, perhaps, natural that the latter States will, upon this floor, vote almost solidly for this bill, while the progressive manufacturing States will vote almost solidly against it.

In view of these practical results from following a single industry, what becomes of the claim that free trade will make the United States wealthy and prosperous? It vanishes as do the theories of the college graduate after his mind has been sharpened by the friction of the realities of practical life. But what of the theory? If free trade will make this country wealthy, why not all countries? Other nations will not permit us to grow prosperous at their expense. If all nations had protective laws, commerce would exist under the conditions these laws made possible. Wipe out these laws everywhere—inaugurate the reign of universal free trade—the conditions would immediately change, but when trade and commerce became adapted to the new conditions would the sum total of the wealth of the world be increased? Wealth is only created by labor, and to increase wealth the productive power of labor must be increased by opening up new fields for its activities and by the invention and use of better and more productive labor-saving appliances. Invention is stimulated by protective duties; new fields of labor are opened by them and by the diversification of industry; the results we have already seen

That we should not collect more money than is needed for an honest and economical administration of the Government no one denies. There is no question here to discuss; but when economy is carried to a parsimonious policy of Government expenditure, there is an issue. In a country having no large standing army and an honest administration, as this country undoubtedly now has, a high rate of taxation does not in the least alarm me; for it will be found as a general rule that a highly civilized and progressive community can not exist, nor can a high and advanced degree of civilization be attained and maintained, without a comparatively high rate of taxation. And why should objection be made to taxing goods and products? All taxes are necessarily added to the cost of production and are of course paid by those who consume products, at least primarily, for it must not be forgotten that after the process of diffusion, percussion, and repercussion by which taxes reach and fasten upon all visible species of property has operated, yet after all it is the men who earn the money that goes into the Treasury who pay the taxes. That being true, does it make any difference to them how they pay them? Certainly not.

But the claim made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] is that they not only pay the taxes but a bounty to the American manufacturer as well. If this were true and there were no compensating advantages, I would not only retire from the field of discussion, but apologize for having appeared upon it.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] made the extraordinary and startling statement that the laborer has to work twice the number of days under the protective system to earn the price of a suit of clothes that he would have to work under the free-trade system. This is indeed important, if true. It is the old claim that the duty is added to the price of the home-made article. But is it true? It may be laid down as a general proposition that when home production is small and competition slight, much of the duty is paid by the consumer, but as home production increases and home competition becomes sharper, as it rapidly does under the stimulating effects of a fair tariff, the amount of the duty which the consumer pays steadily diminishes, and when the home supply equals or nearly equals the home demand, practically all of the duty is paid by the foreign manufacturer and importer. If the duty is added to the price of the protected article it is beyond controversy that the reduction or repeal of the duty will reduce the price of the home-made article by the amount of the duty removed.

Three times since the close of the late war duties have been decreased, but has there been cited a single instance of a corresponding decrease in the price of the home-made article? Advantage has not been taken of these opportunities to prove this reckless assertion. In 1879 American steel rails were worth in the American market $40; the duty was then $28. If the theory of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] is sound, the repeal of the duty would have reduced the price of American steel rails to $12 per ton, although at that time the same grade of steel rails could not be purchased in the English market for less than $22 per ton. From 1846 to 1849 English iron sold in our market for $40 per ton. It cost the American at that time $60 per ton to produce like grade of iron. By 1851 the American furnaces were closed up and home competition no longer existed. The English iron immediately rose to $80 per ton. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] seems to forget that even if this wild, reckless statement was based upon even the shadow of truth, the laborer would be in no way benefited by the removal of the duty, for as soon as the foreign manufacturer obtained control of the home market, prices, even if decreased, would be again advanced.

It is a fact, and I challenge contradiction, that hundreds of protected articles can be purchased in our retail stores for the same price that they can be purchased for in England.

It must have been such absurd and extravagant statements as these made by Mr. MILLS that induced the First Napoleon to say that "if an empire were made of adamant, political economy would grind it to powder." The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] also claimed that the manufacturer does not pay the workman a fair proportion of the margins which protection gives him. In many instances this is unfortunately too true. I meet the charge fairly and squarely. I would rather create and maintain an industrial condition which produces manufacturers—ay, monopolies and trusts, if you will—who have the ability to pay remunerative wages but who do not, than to create an industrial condition under which the manufacturer could not exist. In the latter case the laborer would starve. In the former case he can oppose combination by combination and fight industrial trusts with labor trusts. These combinations which so alarm my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] have no terrors for me. The giant Cyclops, competition, will take care of the trusts. When profits become excessive or phenomenal in any line, outside capital will immediately rush in and it will be trust eat trust.

Even if outside capital does not rush in, excessive profits will cause a trust to fall to pieces of its own weight. The Knights of Labor organization is a vast labor trust, and this trust, with other labor trusts, will be able to prevent the industrial trusts from insisting upon unjust exactions. But right here I am reminded that the protective system is charged with the creation of these industrial trusts, another reckless assertion. The greatest of all trusts—in fact, the parent trust, the Standard Oil Company—does not owe its existence to the tariff; neither does the whisky trust, for whose welfare the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] is so very solicitous. Trusts are the result of social forces now operating in all industrial countries, whether under the protective or free-trade policy. They are simply one of the many phases which the evolutions of mankind present. Should they abuse the patience of the people to the extent my friend fears, it will certainly be bad for the trusts. There is a higher law than a written constitution, and it is sometimes evoked.

But again it is said the protective system produces tramps, that the country is swarming with idle, unemployed men, and that the tariff is responsible for this condition of things—another absurdity. If free-trade England is more prosperous than we are why are English laborers and mechanics constantly fleeing from that country and flocking to our shores? Since 1873 there have landed upon our shores 169,000 adult Englishmen, seeking better wages and better environment, and this immigration is increasing, not diminishing. There are almost as many Canadians in the United States as there are in Canada. The Dominion has encouraged immigration in many ways, but immigrants will not bide with her; they almost invariably find their way to this tax-cursed, tramp-inflicted land of ours. Mr. F. B. Sanborn, an eminent American publicist, says it costs the United States less than 50 cents per capita to care for our paupers, while it costs England $1.50 per capita, or three times as much. At the last official enumeration there were 1,017,000 paupers in the United Kingdom, 803,000 of whom were in England, 115,000 in Ireland, and 99,000 in Scotland.

France has a larger population than England, but has only 417,000 paupers. England is a free-trade country; the United States and France are not, yet England has three times as many paupers as France or the United States. How these base charges melt away when the light of truth is turned upon them. But let us be honest to our convictions of truth. Paupers and tramps would exist no matter under what policy the world's industries and commerce were carried on—to a much less extent under the protective system, as the facts show; but still they would exist, always will exist while human selfishness is the dominant factor of social progress. Their very existence is an ever present, eternal protest against that universal selfishness upon which the whole fabric of our civilization is based and buttressed. Ambition and selfishness have been the main springs of human activity, but the time is at hand when the good that these human impulses accomplish will have to be separated from the evil that necessarily accompanies them. Great material progress is commendable, but our ultimate aim must be higher. A progress along the line of matter becomes a curse and an evil unless along the same line there is a progress of soul.

Man is progressing along this line, too, but he advances slowly and moves on a calvary highway, but by his sufferings he is exhausting and consuming the evil of his environment. Great philosophic truths do not become popular as soon as discovered; they must be first humanized by suffering souls or so translated by some inspired genius that the multitude can understand them. The proposition that the reign of law and order and the security of life and property is best subserved by a juster and more equitable distribution of the productions of labor than now pertains ought to be regarded and acted upon as a great economic truth, but unfortunately it is not. We have not yet fully emerged from those social conditions which prompted Hobbes to say homo homini lupus; but who will undertake to say that the time is not fast approaching when man will find pleasure in being humane even to the wolf—homo lupo homo.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD] has called attention to the importation of pauper labor by capitalists and manufacturers. That was done, but I fail to see how the heartless cupidity and cruelty of these followers of Hobbes can be charged against the tariff. Let me vouchsafe to my friend some information of which he is perhaps not aware. When in the Forty-eighth Congress I was presenting to this House the merits of a bill which I had reported from the Committee on Labor, preventing the importation of pauper labor under contract, the word "demagogue" ever and anon floated to my ears in muttered whispers; and it was uttered and launched upon this not ambient but vapor-laden air by gentlemen who are now advocating and supporting the bill under discussion; and whatever opposition that measure received came from friends of the Mills bill. It came from gentlemen whose knowledge of the great labor problem was derived from tableaux and object lessons. Ring up the curtain. Behold the lights of other days, free-trade days; at the front of the stage an uncovered pine table, upon which is a lighted tallow candle, and farther back, in the shade, is a black man couchant and a white man and a rawhide rampant.

I do not say these things in bitterness; I only refer to them to show how very difficult it is to break away from the prejudices that are born with us, or to break through the environment of conditions that have influenced most of our lives. One of the greatest evils the curse of slavery brought upon our kinsmen of the South was the creation of a caste, because it has outlived all the other evils which flowed from this Pandora box. There is no despotism so cruel and harsh as the despotism of caste. It is supersensitive to any intrusion into its fancied realm, and anything whose tendency is to ennoble and elevate human dignity and independence always encounters its fiercest hostility. The caste of the South, by example and propinquity, caused and stimulated the birth of a Northern caste, which because of its lack of age and the fact that it is largely composed of parvenues and illiterate boors, who in many instances are the creation of fortuitous circumstances, is a hundred times more despotic and exacting than the Southern caste, which has the advantage of age, culture, manners, and refinement.

It is the castes who have created the new gospel which claims for the benefit of society the divine right of selfishness, and offers up with sardonic glee the poverty of the poor as an inevitable sacrifice to the Moloch of greed and competition.

It is the castes and the consuming desire to enter their charmed circle that has created and produced paupers and tramps in this country, as in England their presence is largely accounted for by the oppressions of the aristocracy. It is the reign of caste and the gross and brutal selfishness it creates that compels us to admit that, although the slave is no longer in the South or beneath us, yet he is among us. The barbarian is no longer away out upon the horizon of our vision; he is by our side. The shackles are laid away in the museum of the Limbo of the past, yet in reality slavery still abides with us. But these things do not deter me from looking hopefully to the future. The test of every system, political, religious, or economical, is the man it produces; and I know the protective system has produced better men and more of them for America than the free-trade system. The protective system gave the mechanics of the North better wages, more leisure, better schools, more of all the essentials of civilized life, and the result is that we frequently see mechanics and laborers, the sons of the humble and lowly poor, grow steadily in mental strength and vigor until, by their own exertions and the benefits derived from diversified industrial conditions, they become intellectual giants and suddenly burst through the fetters caste riveted upon them—burst through the disadvantages surrounding their lowly lives, and "flame like stars in the forehead of the morning sky."

The pauper question has led me into this digression, but before I leave the subject let me say a few words, not warningly, but rather advisory, to the people who live in the realm of caste. It must be always borne in mind that until the laws governing the distribution of wealth are changed, the great majority in every State must necessarily be comparatively ignorant, poor, and dependent, with but very little interest in the preservation of law, order, and government. It therefore follows as an inevitable sequence that the State is at the mercy of any accident or concatenation of circumstances which unchains the pent up passions of the multitude and lets slip the dogs of mobocracy; and if in such emergency law and order is overthrown, let us not forget that the catastrophe will be due to the harsh and cruel conditions which the castes blindly created for the State's existence. Society sometimes dances the stately minuet or the ravishing valse on the lava floor of a crater, unmindful of the fact that the volcano beneath slumbers only, and is not extinct or dead. Let every man do unto others as he would others should do unto him, and these evils will be averted, and tramps and paupers will exist in history only.

But to the point. Every gentleman who has spoken in favor of this bill has complained of the dearness of American goods. Cheapness, then, is the great desideratum to be attained. If I could I would expurgate the word "cheap" from all living languages. I hate it, and hate all inanimate cheap things as thoroughly as I despise cheap men.

It is said protection discriminates against the consumer in favor of the producer. If there be consumers who are not producers, it would be good policy to discriminate them out of existence. The citizen who consumes but does not produce is a curse to the community in which he lives; his sole purpose in life, the object of his existence, is to eat up the results of the producer's labor. This consumer, who is not a producer, can have no interest in the State, no interest in the welfare of his fellow beings, no interest in anything except to minimize the cost of all things which he consumes; cheapness is to him the sum of all earthly happiness. To have cheap sugar he would grind the negroes of Cuba and Louisiana into sirup; to have cheap provisions he would make the farmer a serf; to have cheap clothing he would pauperize and brutalize the laborers and mechanics of the country.

Low wages sends the pregnant mother into the factory and stamps upon her offspring the mark of premature age; low wages sends children into the shop, and dwarfs them physically and mentally; low wages prevents marriage and increases bastardy; low wages fills the brothel as well as the jail. Angels weep, while hell gapes and yawns, and demons dance and howl when Ricardo's low natural wage limit is reached, as it is, alas! too frequently in this country, but not because we have a tariff, but because of man's inhumanity and brutality to his fellows.

Cheap goods mean cheap labor, cheap labor means cheap men, cheap men mean poverty, ignorance, vice, brutality, and barbarism. Man's value to himself, to his family, to the state, is governed by his wages; his soul, his spirit rises as his wages advance—falls as his wages decline. Destroy a man's wages and you destroy the man. Destroy the high rate of wages paid American workingmen and our industries and liberties would be jeopardized. Do the advocates of this bill desire an era of general cheapness at this tremendous sacrifice? If they do their advocacy has wisdom and method in it.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I have reached a phase of this discussion which I would fain pass over in silence, but the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] will not have it so. He has proclaimed to the world, upon this floor and through the press, that this revenue bill involves Democratic principles and Democratic duty. In a letter written by the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee to the Iroquois Club of Chicago, the Cobden Club of America, he very clearly and emphatically declares that the Democratic party is not only pledged to the support of the policy involved in this bill, but that the coming Presidential campaign is to be contested upon the lines laid down in this measure. Against this assumption upon the part of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] I, as a Democrat, here and now enter my most solemn protest. In the letter referred to Mr. MILLS says:

> Our President has boldly plaated the colors on the field, and challenged our opponents to try results with us upon issue presented.

The President in his message to this Congress indicated most clearly that in his opinion the reduction of taxation, necessarto w ipe out the surplus and prevent its further accumulation should be made wholly from customs duties, and that the internal-revenue system of taxation should not be disturbed. My political reading and education lead me to believe that the policy of the Democratic party in the past, and in the present, was and is hostile to an internal-revenue system of taxation

Mr. Jefferson denounced this system more than eighty years ago. That great statesman said that this system of taxation covered our land with officers, opened our doors to their intrusions and domiciliary vexation. Samuel J. Tilden more than twenty years ago also denounced in unmistakable terms the system of internal-revenue taxation. I always supposed that Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Tilden were prophets in the Democratic party, whose utterances could be relied upon as enunciating principles of the Democracy in all their purity. If we are to take the utterances of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] for granted, we must take the position that free trade is a cardinal principle of the Democracy. I, for one, will not be driven into ny such false and ridiculous attitude. Mr. Jefferson, in his sixth-nnual message to Congress, nearly ninety years ago, pointedly and interrogatively said:

> Shall we suppress the impost and give the advantage to foreign over domestic manufactures?

Later on, in 1816, the father, not only of the Declaration of Independence, but the father and founder of the Democratic party, Mr. Jefferson, said:

> Experience has taught me that manufactures are as necessary to our independence as to our comfort.

The messages of Mr. Madison and Mr. Monroe fairly bristled with declarations and recommendations in favor of protecting American manufactures and American industries. In those early days our tariff laws were protective in character, and strange enough one of these laws protected and fostered into existence the immense cotton industry of the South.

The question never took a political shape until 1832. South Carolina, under the leadership of Senator Hayne and Mr. Calhoun, about this time discovered that free trade would be of more advantage to the South than protection. Senator Hayne perhaps accurately described the situation when he said, in 1832:

> We can not manufacture except as to a few coarse articles. Slave labor is utterly incapable of being successfully applied to such an object. Slaves are too improvident and incapable of that minute, constant, delicate attention and that persevering industry which are essential to the success of manufacturing establishments.

The fact is the South, because of the curse of slave labor, found herself at a disadvantage, as compared with the North, in diversified industrial pursuits. Slave labor was adapted to only one industry, agriculture, and that being the case it was of course to the advantage of the South, at least for the time being, to purchase those manufactured goods she needed in the cheapest market she could obtain, while she sold her staple products in the highest market she could obtain. It will therefore be seen that the free-trade sentiment in this country was the outgrowth of peculiar conditions and peculiar environment, and perhaps nowhere in the history of the world is the tenacity of prejudice more strongly exemplified than in the fact that this sentiment continues a quarter of a century after the conditions and environment which gave it birth have passed away and no longer exist. Many gentlemen upon this floor can not help being free-traders. They were born so. It is rather the result of congenital causes than conviction based upon research and investigation.

Prior to the first election of General Jackson, local sectional feeling, especially in the South, became quite bitter upon this subject. In his first message to Congress, President Jackson used these words:

> In deliberating therefore, on these interesting subjects, local feeling and prejudices should be merged in the patriotic determination to promote the great interest of the whole. All attempts to connect them with the party conflicts of the day are unnecessarily injurious and should be discountenanced.

Thus spoke President Jackson in relation to tariff legislation and the tariff in December, 1829. That President Jackson was a protectionist is clearly revealed in his messages, and especially in a letter written to Dr. Coleman, in which he says:

> The American farmer has neither a foreign nor a home market, except for cotton. Does not this clearly prove that there is too much labor employed in agriculture, and that the channels of labor should be multiplied? Common sense points out at once the remedy.

It seems to me that it would be well for those who are now endeavoring to apotheosize this bill, and who proclaim that it involves Democratic principle and duty, to occasionally refer to the teachings of the founders and fathers of the Democratic party. It would be especially well for them to heed the warning advice of President Jackson, that—

> All attempts to connect customs-revenue legislation with the party conflicts of the day are necessarily injurious and should be discountenanced.

I am well aware that about 1830 both parties began to trim somewhat upon this question. Even so great a protectionist as Henry Clay, who would "rather be right than be President," was in favor of a compromise upon the question of the tariff. Mr. Clay, as well as Mr. Jackson, wanted to be President, and, as Mr. Thompson very tersely puts it—

> The concealed magnet in the White House often makes the most honest compass deflect from the North Star of principle.

The electoral vote of the Southern States was a stake for which many good men sacrificed both honor and principle; and from the time of Van Buren to that of Buchanan the Democratic party in its onward march sometimes obliqued toward the side of free trade. Since the close of the war a school of Democrats, of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is a conspicuous example, have been endeavoring to lead the party back to the principles that controlled it from Jefferson to Van Buren, a period which covered over forty years. This school of thought prevailed in 1884, as the plank in the Chicago platform upon which Mr. Cleveland was elected demonstrates.

The tariff plank in the Chicago platform clearly suggests, if it does not positively declare, that the necessary reduction of revenue to prevent the accumulation of a surplus, should be made along the line of internal-revenue taxation. It certainly does not justify, in the light of any possible construction, the claim that this reduction must be made entirely from customs duties.

It is clear and emphatic that the necessary reduction in taxation can be effected, and it declares that it must be effected without depriving American labor of the ability of competing successfully with foreign labor; and it further declares that as high rates of duties shall be levied as will be necessary to cover any increased cost of production which may exist in consequence of the high rate of wages prevailing in this country. I know it has been said by advocates of the present bill that the Chicago platform was considerable of a fraud. Gentlemen who make this declaration seem to forget that if it is true, the present Administration was elected by fraud. In 1884, when I advocated the election of President Cleveland, I believed that my party, through the Chicago convention, proclaimed honestly its views upon the tariff question. I did not then, nor did any other speaker or newspaper, say to the people of this country, "This platform is a fraud; we do not mean what we here say about the tariff. Although we here proclaim that the surplus can be reduced by the reduction of internal-revenue taxation, and that American industries must be fostered and protected, we do not mean that, but the very converse of the proposition."

If the Democratic leaders took that stand, if the Democratic party in 1884 appealed to the people in that way, Mr. Blaine would now be occupying the White House instead of Grover Cleveland.

I have no objection to any gentleman entertaining upon this great economic question any views which his judgment dictates, but I do protest now, and will protest at all times and upon all occasions, against the false assumption and suicidal declaration that this so-called "Mills bill" involves a Democratic principle or a Democratic duty. As a measure for reducing the surplus and preventing a still further accumulation of surplus, it will, if passed, in my judgment, prove an abortive failure. I therefore oppose it for that reason as well as those already given. As a measure, as it now stands and as it is here presented, enunciating Democratic principles and Democratic faith, I not only condemn it, I repudiate and denounce it. I have heard gentlemen upon this floor tear a passion to tatters and declare in impassioned speech that they would vote for this bill, not because it was a just or wise measure, but because they were Democrats. I believe in Democracy, but there is no Democracy in this bill. I know of but one guide by which to shape my official as well as my private conduct, and that is the light which comes from my inner, moral consciousness—by this light my convictions of right and duty are formed; and if the time should ever come when party or any other kind of prejudice becomes stronger than my judgment, and I find that the courage of my convictions is departing from me, I will be ready to exclaim with Brutus in honest candor and sincerity—

> Be ready, gods, with all your thunderbolts
> Dash me to pieces.

A brief summary of the history of our industrial legislation and policy may not be out of place here. We had no manufactures before the Revolution. That war forced the people to manufacture articles of necessity at least. But after peace was declared in 1783 the country was flooded by English goods. England had the factories, the machinery, the skilled labor, and our infant industries were crushed and ruined in a short time. The old articles of confederation created a government too feeble and weak to remedy this and other evils, hence the Constitutional Convention and the Constitution, which owed its existence to commercial necessity more than to any other cause. The power to regulate foreign and domestic commerce which is clearly vested in the Constitution did not exist in the articles of federation, but was a power claimed and exercised by each State. The first Congress was literally besieged with petitions from the business men of the country praying for protection against the absolute ruin which the competition of the foreign manufacturer and trader had brought upon the country. The first tariff law was passed and signed July 4, 1789. It imposed "duties on goods, wares, and merchandise imported." This tariff was very low. January, 1790, Washington recommended to the adjourned session of the First Congress a protective policy, and a bill was passed August, 1790, really protective in character.

Strangely enough raw cotton was one of the first industries specially protected at this period—3 cents per pound or 10 per cent. of its value. This protected the South against India. In 1794 Whitney's cotton gin put the South ahead of competition and outside of the need of protection. The war of 1812 found the country still wholly unprepared for such an emergency. The country could not even make a blanket. The limited protection afforded was not sufficient to promote woolen or iron industries, and others of a like character, to render the country independent of foreign markets.

Up to 1824 the tariff laws, though protection in character, were inadequate to protect the industries of the country from the supremacy of foreign manufactures.

It was the policy of England then to keep this country in the position of colonial dependence. That is her policy to-day, and free trade would render us simply the producers of food and raw material for England.

In 1823 President Monroe for the second time urged the adoption of a higher tariff. The following January a new bill was reported. This was the first real protective tariff. Under it the country prospered as it had never prospered before.

In 1833 the tariff was modified by a gradual 20 per cent. reduction, which was to take full effect in June, 1842. This increased imports 75 per cent. The gradual reduction went on, and shops and factories closed up and disappeared as the reduction went into effect, until in 1837 the crash came—banks closed, and the country verged upon the point of bankruptcy. The imports fell away because the people were too poor to buy, and the Government had to borrow money to meet its ordinary expenses. The cry, "Work! give me work!" was heard everywhere in the land.

In 1840 the country was so thoroughly aroused that the Democratic party was defeated, and General Harrison, a protectionist President, was elected. The tariff of 1842 was still more protective than the one of 1823–'24 to 1828. Even the South did not now object, for it had been demonstrated that free trade was not the unmixed blessing it was claimed to be.

Next came the tariff of 1846. It was, strictly speaking, an ad valorem tariff, and therefore vicious, for ad valorem duties make the home market far more dependent upon the fluctuations of the foreign market, besides being more liable to permit and allow frauds and encourage perjury. The tariff of 1846 did not materially change the tariff of 1842 except by the adoption of vicious ad valorem methods.

This ad valorem tariff of 1846 lasted until 1857, to the ruin of many industries. In 1857 duties were reduced 25 per cent.; another great panic—collapse and ruin followed.

In 1860 the Republican party, with protection as one of its cardinal principles, carried the country, and for the third time Democratic supremacy was broken. We have changed our financial policy nine times in one hundred years, seduced always from protection to free trade by the seductive voice of theorists, but in every instance driven by hard and bitter experience back to protection. Are we going to repeat the experience once more? I ask again, are we going to be seduced from duty only to be driven back again? Will we ever learn anything? It might perhaps, taking an optimistic view of the matter, be well to try the free-trade experiment again, for the terrible lesson it would teach us would certainly settle the question for all time to come.

Mr. Chairman, that great doctrinaire and apostle of free trade, Robert J. Walker, in a report as Secretary of the Treasury in 1845, speaking of commerce and exchanges, said: "Let them alone." Those of our people who have followed this advice are surrounded by commercial inanition and industrial asphyxiation. This is an age of ideas, of thought, of active, rapid flight of mind onward, ever onward and upward; our faces are toward the noon-day sun of science, and the "Let them alone" dictum is far behind us. We let nothing alone. We recognize that mental activity is the supreme law of human destiny, and that the kingdom of matter must be conquered and subdued by the empire of mind; we push incessantly onward on the mighty track-way of civilization; we pierce the mountain-side; we span the river and the valley for iron roads on which trade and commerce forever flow; we organize the capital, the thought, the energies and activities of our people; we go down into the bowels of the earth, into the very arcana of nature, and tear out the heart of her mystery; we control and utilize the air, penetrate and investigate the secrets of the upper atmosphere and hoary ocean's awful depths; we touch every known element of nature with the deft fingers of art and the all-powerful hand of science; we apply to them living forces, the cunning but mighty hand of intellectualized labor, and change, transform, and transmute them into objects of use and beauty, to minister to our bodily wants and esthetical desires; we touch dull, inert matter with the wand of industrial genius, and sentient forces appear and become the slaves of our will; the electricity, which for cycles and ages only flashed its red glare in advance of the bellowing thunder, we have harnessed to the car of progress and utilized in an hundred ways to enhance the comforts and increase the potential possibilities of humanity; with it we annihilate time and space, propel machinery, decompose elements, chase away darkness, and send the human voice along the pulsing wires to points a thousand miles away. All this and vastly more have we accomplished, not by letting force and matter alone, but by applying to them the crystallizations of thought that we have inherited from the centuries of progress and human evolution that have gone before. [Great applause.]

Before the conclusion of Mr. FORAN's remarks the hour expired, and

On motion of Mr. SOWDEN, by unanimous consent, his time was extended to complete his speech.

Mr. O'FERRALL was recognized.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL] to yield me three minutes.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the gentleman who has just preceded me [Mr. FORAN]. I did not desire to interrupt him in his argument, but he has made two or three positive statements, and if those statements can be successfully contradicted it is perhaps well that the contradiction should go forth to the country with his speech.

He has said here, sir, that he was opposed to everything cheap. I ask him if the records of the manufacturing industries of this country and of the world for the past thirty years do not show that while the prices of commodities have depreciated from 25 to 50 per cent., the price of labor has gradually and steadily increased throughout Europe from 50 to 80 per cent.? I ask him, sir, if it is not true that under the protected industries of this country the census of 1850 shows the average percentage paid labor to the cost of the article produced in this country, was 23.3 per cent.; that under the census of 1860 it had fallen to 21.2 per cent.; that in 1870 it had fallen to 18 per cent., and that in 1880 it had fallen to 17.8 per cent.; while to-day in England the average amount labor receives to the value of the article produced is from 30 to 32 per cent.? I ask the gentleman to explain these facts, and further to explain why it is that the American wage-worker's percentage of earnings to the value of articles produced has steadily, steadily, steadily depreciated, while the prices of all commodities in the United States are higher than in any other country in the world, and who is it that is receiving the difference in cost and labor? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Chairman, it is very evident that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] did not hear the whole of my speech. When he reads the whole of it, as I hope he will, he will find all his questions fully answered.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Chairman, for four sessions of Congress I have sat on this floor and listened to the speeches which have been made upon the great and now absorbing issue of the tariff. For four sessions I have remained an attentive listener to all that has been said by the advocates of a tariff for protection and the advocates of a tariff for revenue, and have not opened my lips, except indirectly in advocacy of the doctrine of either school.

The time has come, however, when my sense of duty to the people whom I have the distinguished honor to represent in this branch of the legislative department of this Government impels me to speak, and in speaking, though my words may be simple and unadorned, they will be the words of candor and soberness. I have just listened with pleasure to the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN], but in my remarks I shall endeavor to be more practical and not so theoretical.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the farming and laboring classes of this country have never been brought to a full understanding of this question. The voice of the advocate of monopolies has been raised in every nook and corner, and his "league tracts" scattered as thick as autumn leaves in the highways and byways. Yet the advocate of the farmer and wage-worker has to a great extent bridled his tongue and curbed his pen.

Industriously indeed have the advocates of a protective tariff sought to impress the public mind with the belief that the tariff is a subject so difficult and intricate that only the most enlightened, those versed in statecraft and studying mighty governmental problems by the flickering light of the midnight lamp, could understand it, while the advocates of a tariff for revenue have failed to present and drive home the plain truth and immutable fact that a tariff is a tax, and the heavier the tariff the heavier the tax, and that the man who buys any manufactured article, from a knitting-needle to a thrashing-machine, a horseshoe to a ton of iron, a spool of thread to a silk dress, a pair of socks to a suit of clothes, a mustard plaster to a pound of morphine, whether manufactured in any foreign country or this country, pays this tax either into the Treasury of the Government, if he buys the foreign-made article, or the pocket of the manufacturer, if he buys the home-made article.

The advocates of a protective tariff with lusty lungs have sung the song of "Protection! protection!" to the farmer and laboring man, while the advocates of a tariff for revenue have failed to respond with the cry of "Oppression and robbery!"

It is high time, sir, those who stand in the position of representatives of the great mass of people of this land who earn their living in the furrow or at the bench, at the anvil or in the workshops, with the spade or with the hod, in the glowing light of the furnace or in the dingy darkness of the mines, by the music of the spindle and the loom, and by the many other avocations which fill the avenues of industry, should be awakening to the importance of the high duties devolved upon them, and no longer sleep at their posts when the wolf of protection is daily crying around the doors of the homes which they represent.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that so far as the Representatives on this floor from the Southern States are concerned there is some excuse for their past lethargy in this respect.

Mighty issues for years crowded upon them, which affected the very civilization of their States, and their minds were absorbed by questions whose importance was felt in the very marrow of their bones.

But the dangers which threatened have fortunately been dispelled, and lowering clouds have given way to bright sunshine; the sheen of Democracy has illumined the way, and each State in this Union of States stands out in the light of the Constitution as coequal and coordinate, and Southern Representatives can now direct their energies along with brethren of the North of the same political faith in correcting the crying evils of a system which is daily drawing from the people their hard earnings, and hoarding millions in the Treasury for the benefit of monopolies and favored classes.

I have declared as a truth that a tariff is a tax, and I repeat it in order to emphasize it. Now, sir, we must have money to meet the current expenditures of our Government, pay the interest upon the public debt, and comply with the demands of the pension-roll, now grown to enormous proportions, and the settled policy of the Government is to raise the money necessary to meet these purposes by a tariff, or more plainly speaking, a customs tax on foreign manufactured goods, wares, and merchandise brought to this country.

But on behalf of the tax-paying consumers of this country from Maine to California and from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from hill and dell, mountain and plain, I enter my earnest protest against a system which raises more money and imposes a greater tax than are required to provide sufficient revenues to meet the necessary wants and demands of the Government.

I enter my solemn protest against a system which has for its object, in imposing a heavier tax than the necessities of the Government demand, the fostering of certain men or classes.

All the citizens of this land are of right freemen; they owe no allegiance to any class and should recognize no task-masters. Under the chart of their liberties, under the law of high heaven, they are free and without shackles on their limbs or mortgages upon the fruits of their brain or muscles; they bow down before no prince, potentate, or sovereign, nor kiss the royal robes of any crowned head; they render homage only to their God and should pay tribute only to their Government. Such at least is the spirit of our institutions, the character of our written national compact.

But how is it in practice? Under this malign system for years the people have been made to submit their necks and receive the yoke of monopolistic oppression; they have been required to bend the knee at the shrine of monopolistic power, and in their extremity they have exclaimed, "Lord! Lord! how much demandest thou of me?" They have been compelled to contribute of their hard earning and sweat-drops for the support of their task-masters, that these task-masters may increase their dividends, roll in luxuries, and revel in wealth.

Freemen though they are by right, yet suffering an Egyptian bondage; living as they do in an atmosphere of boasted liberty, yet service-bound to a manufacturing oligarchy.

Mr. Chairman, in my own State I have met with gentlemen professedly of my own political faith who have have said to me: "Be careful; don't agitate the tariff question." With such timidity I have no sympathy. In such Democracy I have no confidence.

For five years and more I have proclaimed the doctrine of a tariff reform in almost every county, city, and town in Virginia. "Don't agitate the question." Ha! The people like serfs must still submit, like vassals still bend their necks, like slaves still work, work in the treadmill of protection! Sir, "Tariff for revenue" is the motto which I have tacked to the mast-head, and if I shall fall I shall fall with my face to the enemy still crying aloud against the oppression of my people. I intend to stand by, uphold and defend as far as God has given me the ability the underlying principle of Democracy upon this question. I may be a weak defender of the right, but I will at least be a bold one.

But I have no fears as to the result. The flag of tariff for revenue will soon float in triumph, and when victory is once inscribed upon it the child has not been born that will ever see defeat written over it.

I repeat, again, a tariff is a tax on foreign manufactured goods, wares, and merchandise.

Almost every article of foreign production, whether used upon the farm in tilling the soil, reaping the crops, or conveying them to market; almost everything that constitutes the common wants of life; almost everything that the humblest citizen wears, from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet, must pay a tariff tax as soon as it is landed upon our shores. This tax, then, being paid by the foreign manufacturer, is added by him to the price, and as he adds it to the price, the home manufacturer at once increases his price the amount of the tax, so that the consumer, whether he buys the foreign-made or home-made article, in the end pays the tax.

Let protectionists seek to their hearts' content to cover up the facts with their sophistries and theories; the plain and simple fact as I have stated it stands out in bold relief for the humblest man in the land to read and understand. He can understand that if he could buy a woolen suit of clothes, for instance, for $15 without the tax, and must pay $22.50 for it with the tax, that the tax affects and hurts him. It requires no literary training, no college breeding, no study of governmental science for him to understand that he is injured in purse when he is saddled with a tax of 50 per cent., or $7.50, on a $15 suit of clothes; and the man who seeks to convince him that this is done for his protection will bring his labors to an unhappy end.

Now, Mr. Chairman, so far as the necessities of the Government require taxation well and good, and every patriotic citizen will meet it with cheerfulness; but as soon as the Government imposes a heavier tax than the demands of the Government require, just for the protection of articles manufactured in this country, it is robbing me for the benefit of a class and establishing here in free America a favored class and building up and fostering an aristocracy of monopolies.

The little tax on tea kindled the flames of republican liberty, and a weak people of only 3,000,000 determined not to submit. But though the soul of every American glows with pride as he recalls this historical fact, we have now millions of dollars annually wrung from the people—not to support the Government, but to enable a favored few to carry on trade with heavy profits and sell their wares at prices largely in excess of what the foreign articles could be purchased if it were not for the tax, and largely in excess of the price at which these favored few could sell and make reasonable profits.

So that year by year, week by week, and day by day the fruits of honest toil go into the tills of monopolies rather than into the pocket of the toiler for his own benefit and that of those whom God in his wisdom has given him.

A few days ago in referring to the fact just alluded to, that the tax on tea awakened the slumbering spirit of liberty in the breasts of the colonists, I was met with the reply that it was taxation without representation that inspired the Revolution. I said then as I say now, that the tax was the match that lighted the fire, and that while the rulers of that day only imposed this small tax on the one article, the rulers of this day impose a tax on thousands of articles, and the tax imposed in 1776 was for the support of government while the tax of 1888 is made heavy for the support of monopolies.

Remember, Mr. Chairman, I do not mean to intimate that even the heavy burden of taxation under which the people are now resting would justify a resort to violence. Oh, no. Peace reigns supreme throughout our borders, and the people have their remedy in the ballot, the weapon of the Constitution, and with it a revolution will be prosecuted which will as effectually shake off the shackles of unjust taxation as the Revolution of 1776 shook off the shackles of British tyranny.

Sir, I cannot conceive upon what principle of right it can be maintained that the people of the United States should be taxed more than necessary to meet the demands of the Government. I do not understand upon what principle of justice it can be insisted that about $100,000,000 in excess of the requirements of the Government should be drawn annually from the people, taken from their pockets, withdrawn from the circulating medium of the country and deposited in the gloomy vaults of the Treasury.

No State would dare tax her citizens more than necessary to run her government and hoard the excess up in her treasury.

Wherein lies any greater right in the National than in the State Government in this respect?

I take it that greater right is claimed by protectionists to sustain them in their position of tariff for protection. It is the only ground, it seems to me, upon which they can in reason stand.

Is it tenable? Has the National Government the right to impose excessive taxation for the protection simply of certain industries and enterprises?

To admit the existence of such a right is to admit that it exists without limit and the extent of its exercise rests alone in the judgment, whim, or caprice of Congress. If the right to raise $100,000,000 in excess exists, why not $200,000,000; why not $500,000,000; why not all the earnings of the consumers above a bare subsistence? Where and when will gentlemen belonging to this school stop? Will they stop when the monopolies cry stop? If so, the millennium will have dawned when that cry comes. Will they stop when the industries of this country no longer regard themselves as "infants?" If so, when the voice of the archangel shall be heard and the last trump shall sound, some "infant," with hoary locks and a body plethoric with dividends and profits gathered from the tills of the poor and wrenched from the hard hand of labor, will stand upon the shores of time and cry for more protection.

"Infant industries!" Mr. Clay, the great apostle of protection, in his debate with Mr. Calhoun, when giant mind met giant mind, and the sparkles flew around like the corruscations from heated metal when struck by a Vulcan's hammer, declared only for a temporary tariff for the protection of our "infant industries."

More than fifty years ago this memorable debate occurred. For more than thirty years the immortal Clay has been in his grave, and the winds of more than thirty winters have sung a requiem to his memory, and more than thirty springs have shed the fragrance of their flowers over the place where inurned is his sacred dust. Childhood then has grown to middle age; middle age then has gone tottering to the grave of old age, yet the industries of which Mr. Clay spoke are still infants, still crawling and mewling, still in their swaddling clothes, still unable to stand alone, and still sucking the bottle of protection.

Sir, with all due deference, I say what an absurdity. If it were so, if these industries were still unable to stand alone, still required the supporting arm of the Government, still called for protection from foreign competition, as a citizen of the United States, in the face of the world I would be ashamed to acknowledge it. With natural advantages greater than those of any country on the face of the habitable globe; with every improvement known to this inventive age; with a climate of unsurpassed salubrity; with a population strong and sturdy, industrious and energetic, I would blush with shame to admit that we can not compete in our own markets and at our own doors with the fabrics and manufactures of other countries, transported at heavy cost hundreds and thousands of miles across the mighty waters that separate us, without the protection of a heavy tariff.

Standing forth as we do in the majesty of our national power, boasting of our strength, our advancement in the arts and sciences, and in all that goes to constitute a nation's pre-eminent power and strength and greatness, my national pride would be touched to the very quick if I were forced to admit that our furnaces, surrounded by mountains of iron ore sufficient to run an iron belt around the world, and coal in close proximity to smelt every ton of it, our spindles and our looms driven by the finest water-power in the known world, or by steam-power supplied with coal from mines almost at the doors of the factories, or by natural gas, our manufactories sharing all the blessings of a country upon which Heaven has showered its most gracious gifts, can not stand upon their own feet and assert their own independence in their own land against all foreign comers without being sustained and supported by the arm of high protection.

Sir, I am a protectionist, but not a protectionist of monopolies; I am a protectionist of my people. I ask again, if the policy of drawing more money than necessary to support the Government is adhered to, where will it end? Already tens upon tens of millions of dollars have been withdrawn from circulation, and, of course, if persisted in, it is only a matter of time when all the money, the entire circulating medium, will be withdrawn from the channels of business and locked up in the vaults of the Treasury. Then without money for the transaction of business and to meet the wants of the people something must be done; the money must flow back into the channels from which it was taken. How will this be done? Will the people whose earnings are represented by the hoarded millions be permitted to walk up and receive back their own, the dollars representing their hours and days and years of toil and labor, sweat and anxiety? Oh, no; but they must give of the substance left them an equivalent for every dollar; they must buy back from the Government their own. Like the highwayman who demands money from the traveler for the horse from which he has just been dismounted, the Government will demand a quid pro quo for the fruits of its robbery. It seems to me, sir, that view this question as you may you can find no haven of safety, no solid ground upon which to plant your feet except upon the firm principles of Democracy—a tariff for revenue, which means taxation only for the economical support of Government.

Mr. KERR. You say you are for a tariff for revenue. Do you not know that we have now one hundred and sixteen millions of revenue raised outside of the tariff, and would it not be wise to return to the policies advocated by all the early great statesmen of your State?

Mr. O'FERRALL. In other words, cheap whisky or cheap clothing—that is the issue. I favor cheaper clothing and cheaper necessaries of life as against the cheap whisky advocated by the gentleman.

Mr. KERR. I do not advocate cheap whisky. I advocate the prohibition of whisky. You advocate a policy that makes it a permanent source of our national revenue, incorporates it into our system as a permanency.

Mr. O'FERRALL. The gentleman wants the poor man to have cheap whisky, and at the same time to pay a high price for his clothing. Now, sir, no man need drink whisky, but every man must wear clothes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BUTLER. How are you on the tobacco tax?

Mr. O'FERRALL. I am for the repeal of the tobacco tax.

Mr. BUTLER. How are you on sugar?

Mr. O'FERRALL. I will determine that when the question is before the House.

Mr. BUTLER. Can you not say now? How are you as to the reduction of the tariff on iron?

Mr. O'FERRALL. I am for a tariff upon iron ore and upon coal.

Mr. BUTLER. How are you upon this bill as to the reduction of the tariff on iron?

Mr. O'FERRALL. I am for this bill as a whole. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I hope I have answered the gentleman.

Cut loose from this principle and you at once embark upon a sea without a pilot, compass, or rudder, to be dashed about and finally wrecked upon the shoals of confusion and anarchy.

Better, far better, confine ourselves to the powers of the Constitution and to the teachings of the fathers than follow in the wake of false prophets and teachers.

But passing on, let me say that the policy of protection is contrary to the principle of independent citizenship. The admitted theory of our Government is that he that sows shall reap the fruit of his own labor, and that it shall not be tolled by his neighbor; that while he must rely upon the means given him by God, whatever he may accumulate shall not be made to pay tithes to another.

Applying this principle, suppose instead of raising revenue by a tariff we were to do so by direct taxation on property, and instead of a custom-house collector we were to have a Federal direct-tax collector. Imagine this dialogue between a Federal tax-collector and a good, honest old farmer:

Collector: Good morning my old friend; how are you this morning?

Old Farmer: Well, just so so. I am not very well, but I have to keep going. My land is not very good and I have to keep scratching to make buckle and tongue meet.

Collector: Well, sir, I am around collecting taxes. Will it suit you to pay to-day?

Old Farmer: Well, money is mighty scarce, but I always try to lay by little by little to meet my taxes and pay my part of the expenses of the Government, and I reckon I might as well pay now as any other time. How much are they?

Collector: Let me see; there is a ticket for $50.

Old Farmer: All right; here's your money, give me the ticket.

And the old fellow draws a long breath as he sees his $50, representing many a sweat-drop, the heat and cold of many a day, many a jerk and twist of the plow-handle, and many an ache and pain disappear in the wallet of the collector; but as a good citizen he willingly paid his part of the expenses of the Government. He is about to return to his work, for time is precious with him—he "must keep scratching,"—when he hears the voice of the collector again:

Collector: Hold on, my old friend, I have another ticket against you.

Old Farmer (turning suddenly and nervously): What! another tax ticket against me? I thought I had just paid my part of the expenses of Government.

Collector: So you have paid your part of the expenses of Government; but this is a "protection" ticket of $16.66⅔.

Old Farmer: Protection ticket!

Collector: Yes, "protection ticket."

Old Farmer: Well, what sort of a ticket is that? I ain't asking any particular protection. Everybody around here is quiet; my neighbors are all good people, and I don't need any protection; this thing must be a mistake; tell them down yonder in Washington I don't feel afraid; I harm nobody, work hard all day; go to bed with a clear conscience, sleep well, and don't want any fellow around to protect me. Just take the thing back and tell the fellow that sent it out that I can take care of myself, and don't want any protection, and don't want to pay for any.

Collector: Old man, you don't know what you are talking about.

Old Farmer: Yes, I do, too.

Collector: No, but you don't; this is a tax which the Government says you must pay to protect the people who make the clothes you wear, and the wagon you drive, and the plow you use, and the reaper and mower you have, and your sewing-machine, and so on.

Old Farmer: Well, well; has it come to this in our country that things are getting so bad that these people must be protected at their work? Why don't the Government shoot a few of these bad fellows and stop this taxing of poor men to protect workmen against them?

Collector: You evidently don't understand yet. I will explain. You know there are a great many people up in Lowell and Boston, and all over New England, and out at Cincinnati and Chicago, and many other points, who are engaged in manufacturing boots and shoes, cotton cloth, calico, flannel, carpets, sewing-machines, wagons, reapers, mowers, thrashers, plows, brooms, buckets, and other things that you buy, and the Government thinks they do not make money enough out of their business, and says you must pay one-third as much as your tax for the support of Government is to help them. Do you understand now?

Old Farmer (red with anger): Yes, I understand what you say; but what have I to do with helping them? Who helps me? I have a hard time of it. I sell my corn for 40 cents when I ought to have 70 cents; I sell my wheat for 78 cents, when I ought to get $1; I sell my hay for $4.50, when I ought to have $8, and I get small prices for everything, and I can't see what I have to do with helping them. They don't help me. If they don't make money enough at their business, why don't they quit and try something else? That's the way people do around here. Oh, pshaw, you must be fooling me.

Collector: No, I am not fooling you; I am in dead earnest. It is my business to collect, and you must pay or I will have to levy on your horse.

Old Farmer: Well, this is a strange thing to me; but I am a law-abiding man and I suppose I must pay. So here is your money. Give me the ticket. But before you leave I want to ask you a question.

Collector: All right; what is it?

Old Farmer: Is this Democratic doings or Republican doings?

Collector: Oh, it is the doings of the G. O. P.—the grand old party—the Republican party.

Old Farmer: Just as I expected. Well, sir, I am a Democrat and have been voting that ticket for many a year, but if Mr. Cleveland and the Democratic party don't bring about the old-time way of doing things and let every tub stand on its own bottom, I don't expect to vote any more. Good day, sir. [Loud applause and laughter.]

Now, sir, this is simply a homely illustration of just what the Government is doing under the present high tariff system. After drawing money enough to pay the expenses of Government, it imposes a tax of one-third more for the protection of or to help and aid the manufacturing monopolies of the country increase their profits and swell their dividends.

Attempt to disguise it as you may, or to cover it up under all the fallacies of the protective idea, still it stands out in its hideous form of oppression and imposition.

Let me take another illustration. Suppose the laboring man, who delves day in and day out, from week to week and year to year, goes to a store to purchase clothing for himself and family. He buys a pair of boots at $6, and a suit of cloths at $18, shoes for his family costing $10, cotton cloth costing $3, calico and other necessary articles amounting to $13; aggregating $50. More than $20 of this bill is tariff tax and more than $5 of the $20 is protection tax—tax to protect the manufacturers. "Protection!" Protecting a man by taking money out of his pocket. What an anomalous proposition!

Men struggle and bend their energies in the pursuit of money; they strain their nerves, tax their muscle, and charge their brain to accumulate for old age or for days of sickness, that they may be protected from want; this is the rule of mankind; but the Government, reversing human rule, says to the poor man, we must take your earnings for your protection. I repeat, what an anomaly!

I will now, Mr. Chairman, refer to some of the arguments used by protection leaders to sustain their theory that protection increases wages, stimulates enterprise, enhances the value of property, furnishes home consumption of our products, and promotes the general prosperity of the country.

Let us refer to the statistics of the country—for there we find authentic facts to which we can not close our eyes.

Does protection increase wages?

Between 1850 and 1860, an era of low tariff, when the Government imposed a tax only for its economical support, wages increased 18 per cent.

During the next ten years, from 1860 to 1870, when a war was raging for four years of this time, and prices were inflated and protection was at high-water mark, wages increased only 7 per cent.

Does protection give a home market to the products of our soil?

In 1850, under low tariff, we raised 867,453,967 bushels of cereals; 851,502,312 bushels were consumed at home; 15,951,655 bushels were exported. All but 1.9 per cent., or less than two bushels in the hundred, of our entire cereal productions found a market at our doors. In 1860, when the tariff was still lower than in 1850, we raised 1,239,039,945 bushels; 1,216,084,810 bushels were sold in this country; 22,955,135 bushels were sent abroad. Only 1.8 per cent., even a smaller per cent. than in 1850, was forced to seek a foreign market.

Now look at the picture presented by the year of the highest tariff. In 1870 our productions amounted to 1,629,027,600 bushels; 1,571,737,179 bushels found home consumption; 57,290,521 bushels were exported. Three and a half per cent. was compelled to seek sale in other countries. Between 1850 and 1860 productions increased 45.1 per cent., while between 1860 and 1870 they only increased 31.4 per cent. Between 1850 and 1860 exports advanced only 43.9 per cent., while between 1860 and 1870 they advanced 149½ per cent. In 1860 we exported only a very small per cent. of our corn; in 1880 we exported a large per cent. In 1860 we exported only a small per cent. of our wheat; in 1880 we exported a large per cent.

And just here I will say that the wheat which was exported in 1860 brought remunerative prices, for it had scarcely any competitor in the market; in 1880 it was placed in competition with the wheat of India, raised by cheap labor and sold at sacrificing prices, and this was the result of the protective system which drove England from our shores with her manufactured articles, and forced her to develop the wheat-growing facilities of India, and brought our wheat in competition in the English markets with the wheat grown by the outcasts of India and the cheap labor of Russia.

Does protection increase the wealth of the country and add to its general prosperity?

Investigations will show that between 1850 and 1860 wealth was more than doubled, increasing 126 per cent., or more than 12 per cent. per annum, while between 1860 and 1880 the increase was only 6 per cent. per annum.

Mr. Chairman, I regard these statistical facts as full, complete, and indisputable answers to every argument which has been or can be adduced in favor of the policy of a high protective tariff. They are not the result of imagination or fancy, of prejudice or bias, but their truthfulness is vouched for by this great Government.

Protectionists say that protection increases the prices of the products of the farm. Let us see how statistics bear them out.

WHEAT.

For the ten years between 1850 and 1860 the price of wheat ranged from $1.32 to $1.84 per bushel.

For the ten years between 1870 and 1880 the price of wheat ranged from $1.13 to $1.66 per bushel.

A difference of about 20 cents per bushel in favor of the low tariff years.

CORN.

Between 1850 and 1860 the price of corn ranged from 66 to 93 cents per bushel.

Between 1870 and 1880 the price of corn ranged from 49 cents to 79 cents.

A difference of from 14 cents to 17 cents per bushel in favor of the low tariff years.

OATS.

Between 1850 and 1860 the price of oats ranged from 46 to 65 cents per bushel.

Between 1870 and 1880 the price of oats ranged from 34 to 53 cents.

A difference of 12 cents per bushel in favor of the low tariff years.

FLOUR.

Between 1850 and 1860 the price of flour ranged from $4.96 to $7.18 per barrel.

Between 1870 and 1880 the price of flour ranged from $4.25 to $6.60 per barrel.

A difference of 58 to 71 cents per barrel in favor of the low tariff years.

MESS PORK.

Between 1850 and 1860 the price of mess pork ranged from $14.31 to $19.75 per barrel.

Between 1870 and 1880 the price of mess pork ranged from $12.35 to $18.84 per barrel.

A difference of from 91 cents to $1.90 per barrel in favor of the low tariff years.

WOOL.

Between 1850 and 1860 the average price of wool was about 28 cents per pound.

Between 1870 and 1880 the average price of wool was about 31 cents.

A difference of 3 cents per pound in favor of the high tariff years.

So the wool-grower received $3 more on his 100-pound clip in 1880 than in 1860, and then paid many times that in tariff on woolen goods which he bought.

Now let us take the small farmer and see how he stood between 1870 and 1880 as compared with how he stood between 1850 and 1860.

Suppose he raised each year—

100 bushels wheat, he got for it between 1850 and 1860 20 cents per bushel more than between 1870 and 1880, or	$20.00 more.
300 bushels corn, he got for it between 1850 and 1860 an average of 15 cents per bushel more than between 1870 and 1880, or	45.00 more.
200 bushels oats, he got for it between 1850 and 1860 12 cents per bushel more than between 1870 and 1880, or	24.00 more.
5 barrels mess pork, he got between 1850 and 1860 $1.44 per barrel more than between 1870 and 1880, or	7.20 more.

RECAPITULATION.

Wheat	$20.00
Corn	45.00
Oats	24.00
Mess pork	7.20
		96.20 more.

To say nothing about his other products.

Deduct, then, from this, his higher price of $3 on 100 pounds of wool which he received between 1870 and 1880 than between 1850 and 1860, and the small farmer will see and read for himself that between 1850 and 1860 he was $93.20 better off annually upon the products to which I have referred than between 1870 and 1880; that these fruits of his labor brought $93.20 more annually under low-tariff Democratic rule than under high-tariff Republican rule.

If the products of a farmer were two, three, or five times as great as these I have given, of course, his loss under high-tariff Republican rule was two, three, or five times as great as in the illustration.

Protectionists say that protection improves the farms and makes them more productive and profitable. Let us see what statistics show in regard to this matter.

Average yield per acre of cereals.

1860	bushels	16.0	1885	bushels	21.4
1885	do	10.4	Buckwheat:
Corn:			1860	do	23.2
1860	do	37.3	1885	do	13.8
1885	do	26.5	Potatoes:
Rye:			1860	do	119.0
1860	do	18.1	1885	do	77.2
1885	do	10.2	Hay:
Oats:			1860	tons	1.42
1860	do	29.6	1885	do	1.12
1885	do	27.6	Tobacco:
Barley:			1860	pounds	1,019.0
1860	do	29.0	1885	do	747.8

Let us see how the farmer stood in 1885 as compared with 1860. Suppose in 1860 and in 1885 he had the same quantity of ground in cultivation and use, say 20 acres in wheat, 30 acres in corn, 5 acres in rye, 10 acres in oats. How would the account stand?

Products.	Area.	1860.	1885.	Difference.
	Acres.	Bushels.	Bushels.	Bushels.
Wheat	20	320	204	116
Corn	30	1,113	795	318
Rye	5	90½	51	39½
Oats	10	296	276	20

He puts the same labor and capital in and gets in return 116 fewer bushels of wheat, 318 fewer bushels of corn, 39½ fewer bushels of rye, 20 fewer bushels of oats.

If that is protection, well indeed can the farmers of this land exclaim, "God save us from such protection!"

These 65 acres would have brought him in 1860, as follows:

320 bushels wheat, at $1.55, lowest	$432.00
1,113 bushels corn, at 64 cents, lowest	712.42
90½ bushels rye, at 80 cents, lowest	74.49
296 bushels oats, at 37 cents, lowest	109.52
Total	1,328.34

Now, in 1885 what would they have brought him?

204 bushels wheat, at 88 cents	$179.52
795 bushels corn, at 40 cents	318.00
51 bushels rye, at 60 cents	30.60
276 bushels oats, at 27½ cents	75.90
Total	603.92

His gross receipts from the same acreage and crops dropped down from $1,328.34 in 1860 to $603.92 in 1885, or a loss of $724.42.

That is the kind of protection our Republican friends offer to the man who follows the plow.

Mr. KERR. Certainly the gentleman does not charge the tariff with having reduced the production of the soil so as to diminish the number of bushels raised.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Chairman, I am answering the argument of protectionists that high tariff brings general prosperity to the country, improves the farms as well as everything else. That is the position I am answering. If the gentleman yields that point, and that tariff has nothing to do with it, the purpose I had in view is accomplished.

Mr. KERR. The gentleman's statistics would go to show that farms are not as productive as formerly. Certainly the tariff is not responsible or that.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Yes, sir, I insist that the tariff is responsible to a very great extent. The farmer is so heavily burdened by tariff legislation that he has not money to keep up the fertility of the soil, and must cultivate it as best he can. That is one reason why the fertility of the soil has gone back.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. You are right.

Mr. O'FERRALL. That is the kind of "protection" our Republican friends offer to the man who follows the plow.

Mr. DINGLEY. Allow me a single remark at this point in order that there may be no misunderstanding of the facts. Statistics of this kind are apt to be deceptive. The gentleman has given the price of wheat in the city of New York for a decade before the war and for a decade since the war. Now, is it not the fact that in the decade since the war the farmer obtained more per bushel on his Western farm than in the decade before the war, and that the seeming decline in the price of wheat is due to the decline in the cost of transportation from the Western farm to the city of New York?

Mr. O'FERRALL. I might agree with the gentleman but for the fact that the statistics which I am giving are drawn from the census reports furnished by official heads of this Government. Most of the statistics I have cited are good Republican statistics, prepared under Republican administrations.

SMALLER CROPS AND SMALLER PRICES.

In 1860, under Democratic low-tariff rule, the average farm with 65 acres in cultivation would have brought $1,328.34, while in 1885, under Republican high-tariff rule, it only brought $603.92.

CHEAPER CLOTHING.

But protectionists, when met with these facts, and when told how agriculture has languished under the protective fallacy, fall back upon the assertion that the farmer buys his clothing at lower prices than he did in former years, and that this results from protection.

Mr. Chairman, he does buy clothing for less per yard or per article than in former years. But I assert that in the course of a year his clothes cost him as much or more than in former years.

The fabrics from 1860 back were substantial; they were good; they were honest as a rule, and they wore well. The fabrics of the present day are, as a rule, "shoddy," made to please the eye, mislead and deceive. Shoes with paper filling, woolen goods three-fourths cotton, pasteboard hats, with fur pasted on the outside, and lined with fantastic colors, calicoes that a new-born babe can tear, domestics that you could almost sift pebbles through, and cloth that a heavy dew will penetrate to the skin are all sold to the farmer cheap, and he is told to believe what protection has done for him.

O, what authority and show of truth
Can cunning protection cover itself withal.

But it is all show. In a brief season the farmer must return and buy again.

But, Mr. Chairman, protection has not given even these cheap, flimsy articles of wear. It has been the inventive genius of the age that has done it. They have sprung like magic from the brain of the inventor, just as in the days of low tariff, when the invention of the cotton-gin worked a revolution in the price of cotton. Protection seizes hold of everything and claims it as its own. It was protection, its advocates would have us to infer, that conceived the ideas that led to the important inventions of the last quarter of a century. It was protection, according to the idea of our Republican friends, that stimulated the brain of the geniuses of this country who have given to the world in the last two and a half decades the great adjuncts to manufactures, the revolutionizing improvements which have furnished the means of increasing the supply of fabrics for human wear.

Again, Mr. Chairman, protectionists insist that protection gives high wages to the mechanic and laboring man. They point to the fact triumphantly that wages are higher in the United States where we have a high tariff than in England where they have low tariff.

Now, sir, I propose to show the inconsistency of their position. Mark you, they claim that high tariff gives high wages.

Sir, in Austria, Belgium, France, Germany, the Netherlands, and Switzerland there is a high tariff. All of them are high-tariff countries. England is a low-tariff country. In high-tariff Austria, Belgium, France, Germany, the Netherlands, and Switzerland wages are low, while in low-tariff England wages are high as compared with other countries.

I will here give a table of the weekly wages in all these countries.

BLACKSMITHS.

Austria	$3.18	England	$7.37
Belgium	5.38
France	5.81
Germany	4.00
Netherlands	4.80
Switzerland	5.20

The average wages paid to blacksmiths in these six high-tariff countries is $4.06, against $7.37 in low-tariff England; a difference of $3.31 weekly and $172.12 annually in favor of the English blacksmith.

BRICKLAYERS.

Austria	$3.55	England	$7.56
Belgium	4.56
France	5.74
Germany	4.21
Netherlands	4.80
Switzerland	5.21

The average wages paid to bricklayers in these six high-tariff countries is $4.68, against $7.56 in low-tariff England; a difference of $2.88 weekly and $149.76 annually in favor of the English bricklayer.

CABINET-MAKERS.

Austria	$4.40	England	$7.68
Belgium	5.66
France	6.14
Germany	4.25
Netherlands	4.80
Switzerland	5.50

The average wages paid to cabinet-makers in these six high-tariff countries is $5.14, against $7.68 in low-tariff England; a difference of $2.54 weekly and $132.08 annually in favor of the English cabinet-maker.

CARPENTERS AND JOINERS.

Austria	$5.10	England	$7.66
Belgium	4.07
France	6.20
Germany	4.11
Netherlands	4.80
Switzerland	4.74

The average wages paid to carpenters and joiners in these six high-tariff countries is $4.84, against $7.66 in low-tariff England; a differ- of $2.82 weekly and $146.64 annually in favor of the English carpenter and joiner.

COOPERS.

Austria	$3.64	England	$7.50
Belgium	5.17
France	5.58
Germany	3.97
Netherlands	4.80
Switzerland	4.78

The average wages paid coopers in these six high-tariff countries is $4.66, against $7.50 in low-tariff England; a difference of $2.84 weekly and $147.68 annually in favor of the English cooper.

DRIVERS AND DRAYMEN.

Austria	$2.20	England	$5.37
Belgium	3.77
France	5.57
Germany	2.96
Netherlands	4.40

I have been able to find no statement as to Switzerland in this connection. The average wages paid to drivers and draymen in the five high-tariff countries named is $3.78, against $5.37 in low-tariff England; a difference of $1.59 weekly and $82.68 annually in favor of the English driver and drayman.

FARM LABORERS.

Austria	$3.50	England	$4.02
Belgium	2.72
France	3.10
Germany	3.06
Netherlands	3.44

I have found no statistics as to Switzerland in this connection. The average wages paid to farm laborers in the five high-tariff countries named is $3.12, against $4.02 in low-tariff England; a difference of 90 cents weekly and $46.80 annually in favor of the English farm laborer.

LABORERS.

Austria	$3.20	England	$4.70
Belgium	3.00
France	3.77
Germany	3.11
Netherlands	3.61
Switzerland	2.88

The average wages paid to laborers in these six high-tariff countries is $3.26, against $4.70 in low-tariff England; a difference of $1.44 weekly and $74.88 annually in favor of the English laborer.

PLASTERERS.

Austria	$4.01	England	$7.80
Belgium	4.66
France	6.34
Germany	4.43
Netherlands	4.00
Switzerland	5.03

The average wages paid to plasterers in these six high-tariff countries is $4.75 against $7.80 in low-tariff England; a difference of $3.05 weekly and $158.60 annually in favor of the English plasterer.

PRINTERS.

Austria	$4.85	England	$7.23
Belgium	5.94
France	6.64
Germany	5.09
Netherlands	4.80
Switzerland	6.78

The average wages paid to printers in these six high-tariff countries is $5.68, against $7.23 in low-tariff England; a difference of $1.55 weekly and $80.60 annually in favor of the English printer.

TAILORS.

Austria	$4.03	England	$7.23
Belgium	5.58
France	5.02
Germany	3.41
Netherlands	5.00
Switzerland	6.36

The average wages paid to tailors in these six high-tariff countries is $4.90, against $7.23 in low-tariff England; a difference of $2.33 weekly and $112.16 annually in favor of the English tailor.

TINSMITHS.

Austria	$3.70	England	$6.56
Belgium	4.40
France	5.46
Germany	3.55
Netherlands	4.00
Switzerland	4.40

The average wages paid to tinsmiths in these six high-tariff countries is $4.25, against $6.56 in low-tariff England; a difference of $2.31 weekly and $121.12 annually in favor of the English tinsmith.

I might pursue this comparison farther, Mr. Chairman, but this will suffice.

Now, sir, if, according to the theory of protectionists, high tariff gives high wages in America, why not in Europe?

If, according to the theory of protectionists, low tariff would bring low wages in America, why not in Europe?

We have heard already, and we will continue to hear during this debate, England abused because of her low-tariff policy, and in the face of the fact that she pays better wages than any country in Europe; but not one word has been said in denunciation of the high-tariff countries where labor is so poorly paid.

If low tariff enables England to pay from 25 to 50 per cent. better wages than are paid by her neighboring high-tariff countries, let us try the experiment of low tariff on this side of the water and see if we can not increase the wages of our mechanics and wage-workers.

We have strikes now all over our country. Who ever heard of a strike in the United States under Democratic rule and low tariff? Now under high tariff we have them every day. Why? I say it is because of high tariff, which has enabled wealth to be accumulated in the hands of a few, who use it to crush down the wage-worker, and then gaunt want, stalking at midnight like a horrible ghost through the precincts of his humble home, haunts his pillow and disturbs his slumbers, and in his desperation he strikes, as he believes, in defense of his rights and for food and clothing for his wife and children.

Mr. Chairman, as sure as there is a God above us there is something wrong in our country and in its policy. High tariff and high taxation in my judgment are the rocks upon which we are being dashed. Let us at least try the experiment of removing them. From 1881 to 1886, both inclusive, there were 3,903 strikes, in which 22,336 establishments were involved, and 13,443 were temporarily closed. The employés actually engaged in these strikes numbered 1,020,832, and those actually engaged with others involved aggregate 1,324,402. The strikes during 1886 numbered 1,412, or nearly one-third of the whole number. I gather this information from a table furnished by Hon. Carroll D. Wright, chief of the Labor Bureau, to Senator COKE.

If protection protects the laboring man and gives high wages, in the name of Heaven, tell me what has produced all this turmoil and trouble in the land?

Following a little farther the line of my remarks in regard to wages. I want to refer to the statement which is so frequently made that wages are better in this country than in England. In fact, if one of our protection friends were inadvertently to leave this statement out of his speech he would no doubt rise in his seat and "ask leave to print it in the RECORD."

I find that statistics show that the total average earnings of mechanics (family of five workers, including children) in Massachusetts are $803.47; in England, $517.47; a difference of $286 in favor of the Massachusetts mechanic. This is a good showing so far for the Massachusetts mechanic.

But there is another side to the picture.

I find, also, that the average total expenses of a family in Massachusetts are $754.42; in Great Britain $508.35; so it costs the Massachusetts family $246.07 more than the English family to live.

Now, let us make up the accounts of both of them and strike balances:

Annual wages of Massachusetts mechanic and family	$803.47
Deduct cost of living	754.42
Balance at end of year	49.05
Annual wages of English mechanic and family	517.47
Deduct cost of living	508.35
Balance at end of year	9.12
Balance of Massachusetts mechanic	49.05
Balance of English mechanic	9.12
Net balance in favor of Massachusetts mechanic	39.93

Mr. FUNSTON. Will my friend allow me a question?

Mr. O'FERRALL. Most assuredly. I am always glad to yield to my friend from Kansas.

Mr. FUNSTON. Is it not a fact that the laboring people in England live for less money because they do not live so well as the laborers in similar employment in the United States?

Mr. O'FERRALL. I think that is possible or probable. But if they live for less in England they do fewer hours of work during a day. The American mechanic works harder, works more hours, and expends more strength and energy than the English mechanic.

I am just reminded by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] that mechanics return to England from Rhode Island in order to get better wages; that they can make more and live better in England than in Rhode Island.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts. How many returned last year?

Mr. O'FERRALL. I have not looked into the statistics on that point, but my friend from Massachusetts, I have no doubt, can give the gentleman all the figures he may desire.

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman pardon me a question?

Mr. O'FERRALL. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER. Do not statistics show that in Europe the amount of grain consumed per capita by the laboring population (considering potatoes as grain) is 17.66 bushels annually, and in the United States 40.66 bushels; that in Europe the amount of meat consumed by the laboring population per capita is 57.50 pounds annually, and in the United States 120 pounds annually?

Mr. O'FERRALL. I must insist on the gentleman making his speech in his own time. I appreciate the compliment implied by his interruption.

Mr. WARNER. I trust the gentleman will not call it an "interruption." He gave me permission to ask him the question; and I do not want to be put in the position of having "interrupted" the gentleman.

Mr. O'FERRALL. It was an interruption nevertheless, though with my consent.

Mr. WARNER. I wish the gentleman would answer my question.

Mr. O'FERRALL. So we find that the advantage of $286 in wages in favor of the Massachusetts mechanic dwindles away to $39.93 after deducting his living.

In order to secure this little advantage he must work daily more hours and expend more of his strength than the Englishman.

The Englishman saves more in accordance with the time he works than the American.

Yet protection protects! Yet protection gives higher wages and more money!

Now, sir, the Massachusetts mechanic is loaded down with high tariff, the English mechanic is comparatively free. Take the weights of high tariff off the shoulders of the Massachusetts mechanic and let him stand on an equal footing with the English mechanic, and instead of having $49.05 at the end of the year, not enough to bury him decently, he will have much more.

He has $49.05 in spite of high tariff and high taxes; lower the tariff and lower the tax, put him upon the same plane with the Englishman, and then, with feeling, he can say, this is "the land of the free" as well as "the home of the brave."

Sir, I believe commerce between nations should be relieved as far as possible of all fetters and all restraints.

A distinguished son of the South years ago gave utterance to this eloquent truth:

> Why should we fetter commerce? If a man is in chains he droops and bows to the earth, because his spirits are broken; but let him twist the fetters from his legs and he will stand erect. Fetter not commerce! Let her be as free as the air. She will range the whole creation and return on the four winds of heaven to bless the land with plenty.

If the settled policy of this country is to raise money for revenue by a tariff, thereby fettering commerce to that extent, let us not fetter it except for governmental purposes, and not for class purposes. If the trade winds shall not carry the white sails of the world into our ports, dropping the riches of every clime into our lap in exchange for our products without let or hindrance, I insist that tribute shall be levied only for the expenses of the national household and not to fill the coffers of monopolies, classes, or individuals.

Referring now to the fact of which we boast that our system of government is more paternal than that of any other government; that it spreads the ægis of its protection over every citizen alike, treating all as children of a common parent, let us see if this is not an idle boast, unsupported by facts.

Paternal! oh, how much this word implies! There is no word in the English language that implies more of duty. Paternal duty implies equal maintenance and protection to every child that sprung from the same loins.

Unkind, indeed, would be the father who would, if he had the power, take from the earnings of the son engaged in tilling the soil to make more prosperous the son engaged in manufacturing pursuits; yet that is just what this paternal Government is doing and has been doing through the cycles of many years. It has been robbing the granary for the benefit of the manufactory; it has been hardening the hand of honest toil to soften the hand of idleness; it has been bronzing the cheek of labor to bleach the cheek of ease; it has been taxing poverty to make richer the rich.

That noble calling, agriculture, has been taxed and taxed until you hear on all hands the cry coming up from the farmers, "I was not made a horse yet I bear the burden of an ass."

This high and ennobling occupation is made the pack-horse of this system. It seems to have been forgotten that no craft would spread its wings to the ocean breezes; no spindle would delight the ear with its hum; no water-fall would charm with the music of its machinery; no mine would yield up its treasures; no furnace or rolling-mill would light the heavens with its lurid glare; no steam engine would penetrate our mountains and valleys and arouse their slumbering energies but for the plowshare turning up the soil and the husbandman sowing his seed for the sun and dews of heaven to quicken into life, bring to maturity, and ripen for the sickle.

Yes, it seems to have been forgotten that the husbandman stands pre-eminently the lord of creation; that before no human shrine should he bow; at no human altar should he worship; in no human presence should he cringe; to no human calling should he pay tribute.

Agriculture can live without manufactures; manufactures can not live without agriculture.

But, sir, while these things seem to have been forgotten, and the farmers, always slow to move, have been slumbering upon their rights for years, they are now awakening from their slumber, and I stand here to give warning of the gathering storm in the West, Northwest, and South, which will soon break and sweep over this country with the violence of a Western cyclone, carrying before it the last vestige of a system which taxes the many for the benefit of the few, burdens labor for the benefit of capital, and mortgages the muscles and energies of agriculture and labor for the benefit of manufactures and trusts. I do not want it inferred from anything I have said or shall say that I am unfriendly to the manufacturing interests. On the contrary, I am their friend and will promote their advancement in every legitimate way. I would oppose most vigorously any attempt to burden them for the benefit of agriculture or any other interest. I stand here as an advocate of the fundamental principle of "Equal rights to all, special privileges to none." I stand here as an advocate of the God-given doctrine, "Render, therefore, to all their dues."

It was in this school that I was raised. I was born and reared in a State which from the day-dawn of her existence as a State, in her hours of prosperity and adversity, through all the vicissitudes of her checkered career and the mutations of political parties has ever kept this principle inscribed in golden letters upon her tablet of principles; and to-day she stands as fully armed and as courageous in this battle for its maintenance as when the illustrious sons of her past stood forth in its vindication in debate with their scimeters bright and glistening. Sir, no greater truth was ever uttered than that contained in one sentence of the annual message of President Cleveland a year ago. He says that—

The vast accumulations of a few among our citizens whose fortunes rival the wealth of the most favored in anti-democratic nations are not the growth of a steady, plain, and industrious Republic.

Who are these immense accumulators? Are they found among the tillers of the soil or the wage-workers? No; they consist of a parasitic class who have lived and grown, thrived and fattened upon the body and thews, sinews, and muscles of the farmers and laboring men of this country. They consist of the manufacturing monopolists, who, under the sanction of law and through a protective tariff system, have enriched themselves and made each a Cresus by making the farmer and laboring man each a Lazarus.

In 1880, in the manufacture of iron the manufacturers laid away 21.57 per cent. upon their investments, and the woolen manufacturers put 35 per cent. upon their investment in their pockets. I speak for the farmers of the Shenandoah valley and Piedmont section of Virginia—sections possessing a soil as rich as any and a population as industrious and frugal as any—when I say that in the most prosperous years and most luxuriant seasons they fall short of 6 per cent., probably do not exceed 4, and in less favored sections agriculture is so depressed that but for stern necessity the soil would be abandoned and allowed to relapse into its virgin state.

With such enormous dividends as these to which I have just referred, it is no wonder that fortunes have been made in brief seasons which "rival the wealth of the most favored anti-democratic nations." Men count their millions now, when ten years ago they could not count their thousands. In the very nature of things I do not believe such fortunes could be made under a normal condition of affairs; it must be abnormal. I know that men may start even in a race, and some will prove to be swifter of foot and will shoot ahead, and even distance others in reaching the goal; but I do not believe any racer can reach the end before the others take the first step, if all had a fair start and equal advantages. Whether this be true or not, I favor as fair a race and as fair a start in life as the Government can make it. I protest against placing upon the farmer boy and laboring boy a saddle weighted down with the weights of protection and taxation, while the son of the manufacturer shall run the race without saddle or weights. Give them a fair start and if the one, no matter which, outruns the other, then let him claim the prize and receive that which he has fairly won.

The agriculturists of this country are looking, anxiously looking, for tariff-reform legislation by this Congress. Let us not disappoint them in their expectations. Let them feel when they look upon their wavy wheat-fields in their golden hue of harvest time; their long corn-rows ladened with their ears; their meadows carpeted in nature's green or dotted with their sweet-scented hay-stacks; their cattle grazing upon their hills and their sheep gamboling in their pastures, that these are their portion under the dispensation of their God, and that their portion, their possessions, their crops, their muscle and brain, sweat and toil shall no longer be taxed for the benefit of A's factory, B's foundery, or D's furnace. [Applause.]

The wage-workers, too, in the cities and in the country, when not compelled to speak with bated breath, demand the repeal of a system which, in the language of a prominent Knight of Labor, "has made more millionaires and more paupers in the last twenty-five years than were ever made in any other civilized country in the world in the same length of time."

The bill presented by the Committee on Ways and Means I indorse as a whole. It gives to the toiling millions cheaper clothes and cheaper necessaries of life. It will tend to lighten the burdens under which they have been bending for years. It will tend to raise up the drooping spirit of the tiller of the soil and inspire the wage-worker with new life and energy. It will tend to quicken the step of the farmer and brighten the face of the son of toil. It will tend to shed a halo of happiness over the whole land and convert fields of bramble into fields of grain, and reclaim the soil which has relapsed into its virgin state. It will tend to bring peace and comfort to the pillow of the laboring man and relieve his fevered brain. [Applause.]

It will, sir, give assurance to the whole country that the Democratic party of to-day is true to its pledges, true to its history, and true to its traditions.

In closing I desire to say for myself that in this contest I am for the farmer. Agriculture was man's first and original occupation.

The Lord God when he made man took him and put him in the garden eastward in Eden to work and to keep it.

I am for the mechanic. In the great temple of nature there is no ministry more exalted than that of the enlightened mechanic.

I am for the laboring man. From early morn to the settling of the dews of heaven he toils. Great beads of sweat appear upon his bronzed brow as he wields the ax or slings the sledge, handles the shovel or plies the pick, but with cheerfulness he pursues his task thinking of the cheery greeting he will receive when the sun is set and his day's labor is done.

Yes, I am for the farmer, the mechanic, and laboring man against the unconscionable extortioner, the greedy monopolist, and blood-sucking protectionist, and may God keep me steadfast to the end [Great applause.]

Mr. DORSEY. Mr. Chairman, as one of the Representatives of one of the great, progressive agricultural States of the West, I feel it my duty to oppose this bill on the ground that I believe it to be a measure injurious alike to the agricultural and labor interests of the country. In doing this it is my purpose to view the general rather than the specific aspect presented.

This bill has not been prepared upon any principle whatever, but is apparently an emergency or expediency bill, patched up by the Democratic majority of the Committee on Ways and Means without giving a hearing to those whose interests are vitally affected by the changes proposed.

The framers of this bill claim they have followed in the line recommended by the President in his recent message, in which he poses as the friend of the farmer, and we have presented to us a bill which, in my judgment, directly as well as indirectly injures every man engaged in agricultural pursuits in this country. It would directly injure one million of our farmers, because it proposes to put wool on the free-list, and it would indirectly injure every farmer in the country, because it proposes to reduce the duty or place on the free-list so many articles that are now manufactured here, and to destroy so many of the important industries of the country, and thus drive the operatives now engaged in manufactures to agricultural pursuits. In this respect this bill is the most vicious ever presented to the American Congress.

Before recurring to the general thread of my argument I propose to refer briefly to the history of the legislation affecting the wool interests of the United States.

It appears that sheep were brought to this country as early as 1610; that laws to encourage sheep-raising were enacted in Massachusetts in 1645, and as early as 1676 it was written that "New England abounds with sheep." In 1814 the first official estimate of the production of wool was made, and it was estimated at from 13,000,000 to 14,000,000 pounds. Wool was free until 1816, when it became subject to duty at 15 per cent. ad valorem as a non-enumerated article. It was not made dutiable by name until the act of May 22, 1824.

By this act unmanufactured wool, the actual value of which at the place whence imported did not exceed 10 cents per pound, was made dutiable at 15 per cent. ad valorem until June 1, 1825; thereafter at 25 per cent. ad valorem until June 1, 1826, and thereafter at 30 per cent. ad valorem.

In 1828 a still higher rate of duty was placed on unmanufactured wool, namely, 4 cents per pound and 40 per cent. ad valorem until June 30, 1829, and thereafter, annually, an additional duty of 5 per cent. ad valorem until such ad valorem duty should reach 50 per cent. On low-priced wool this rate was equal to 100 per cent. ad valorem. Wool on the skin was made dutiable at the same rate as other imported wool. Under these acts the production of wool in the United States had increased to 50,000,000 pounds annually, in 1831.

In 1832 another change was made, and under the provisions of this act unmanufactured wool of the value, at the place of exportation, not exceeding 8 cents per pound, was admitted free of duty. All wool exceeding 8 cents per pound in value was dutiable at 4 cents per pound and 40 per cent. ad valorem.

This provision for the free admission of the lower grades of wool was continued in an act passed in 1833, while all wool above the value of 8 cents per pound was made dutiable at 4 cents per pound and 38 per cent ad valorem, the latter duty to be gradually reduced to 26 per cent. ad valorem in 1842.

It will be seen that our legislators were not then reckless enough to propose a sudden abandonment of all protection on wool. From the time of the reduction of duty the production of wool seems to have decreased, and the amount of the annual product in 1840 was 42,802,114 pounds, instead of 50,000,000, as it was estimated in 1831.

The act of August 30, 1842, imposed a duty on coarse unmanufactured wool of the value of 7 cents per pound, or under, of 5 per cent. ad valorem, and on all other unmanufactured wool of 3 cents per pound and 30 per cent. ad valorem. It was found that the act of 1832 making coarse wools free had worked great injury to our sheep husbandry, because the provision in regard to low grade of wools was freely taken advantage of by the introduction of large quantities of fine wool duty free.

Then came the so-called Walker tariff of July 30, 1846, which made all unmanufactured wools dutiable at 30 per cent ad valorem; Thibet and goat's hair at 20 per cent ad valorem. During this period of tariff tinkering but little progress was made in the production, the total production in 1850, as officially reported, being only 62,516,969 pounds, as against 50,000,000 in 1831, just prior to the act making coarse wools free.

The act of 1857 practically made wool free, for it included in the free-list all wool valued at 20 cents per pound or less at the port of exportation. Sheep husbandry struggled along as best it could under this adverse legislation, and the census of 1860 officially reported 72,571,343 pounds of wool as the product for that year. Here, then, is an increase from 1831 to 1860 of but 22,571,343 pounds, and during this whole period the tariff legislation was uncertain and adverse to home production.

In 1861 favorable legislation began again. A duty was placed on all unmanufactured wool, hair of the alpaca, goat, and other like animals, valued at less than 18 cents per pound, of 5 per cent. ad valorem; exceeding 18 cents and not exceeding 24 cents per pound, 3 cents per pound; and exceeding 24 cents, 9 cents per pound. In 1864 these rates were increased. In 1866 the following schedule was enacted:

Class 1. Clothing wools, unwashed, value 32 cents or less per pound, 10 cents per pound and 11 per cent. Value exceeding 32 cents per pound, 12 cents and 10 per cent.

Class 2. Combing wools, value 32 cents or less per pound, 12 cents and 10 per cent.

Class 3. Carpet wools, value 12 cents or less per pound, 3 cents per pound. Value exceeding 12 cents per pound, 6 cents per pound.

Class 1, washed, double duty.

All classes, scoured, treble duty.

Sheepskins, 30 per cent. to July 14, 1870, when they were made dutiable same as other wool.

In 1872, 10 per cent. was taken off above duties. In 1875, 10 per cent. was restored. In 1883, upon the report of the Tariff Commission, it was enacted as follows:

Class 1. Clothing wools, unwashed, value 30 cents or less per pound, 10 cents per pound. Value exceeding 30 cents per pound, 12 cents per pound.

Class 2. Combing wools, unwashed, value 30 cents or less per pound, 10 cents per pound. Value exceeding 30 cents per pound, 12 cents per pound.

Class 3. Carpet wools, unwashed, value 12 cents or less per pound, 2½ cents per pound. Value exceeding 12 cents per pound, 5 cents per pound.

Class 1, washed. Double duty.

All classes, scoured. Treble duty.

Wool on the skin, same as wool.

The above is a complete epitome of wool legislation in the United States. Under the continuance of the protective legislation which began in 1861 the wool industry grew in twenty-five years to large proportions, representing a value of over $200,000,000 in sheep, and an annual product of over $70,000,000 in wool and $40,000,000 in mutton. Under an ample protective tariff the woolen industry acquired a steadiness and solidity of position unknown in former days, when the tariff was being violently changed from one rate to another and when a large proportion of foreign wools came in free of duty. The following table shows the increase in our flocks and in the production of wool under this tariff:

Year.	Sheep.	Total wool.
		Pounds.
1840	19,311,374	42,802,114
1850	21,723,220	62,516,569
1860	22,471,275	72,571,343
1870	28,477,551	120,102,387
1880	42,192,674	240,861,751
1885	50,360,243	308,000,000
1886	48,322,000	285,000,000
1888	44,000,000	261,000,000

The imported wools of the five years beginning with 1880 constituted nearly one-fifth of the quantity manufactured, and but a little more than a tenth of the value of wool manufactured. At the same time the price was not increased to the consumer, as is shown by the following table, which gives the total average prices, in gold, of domestic fine, medium, and coarse washed fleece wool for each year from 1859 to 1888:

	Cents.		Cents.		Cents.		Cents.
1859	49	1867	37	1875	43	1883	39
1860	48	1868	33	1876	37	1884	33
1861	39	1869	37	1877	40	1885	31
1862	45	1870	40	1878	38	1886	33
1863	52	1871	48	1879	36	1887	38
1864	43	1872	62	1880	49

Mr. Chairman, it will be seen from these facts that under an ample protective tariff the wool interest has increased as it never had done under an insufficient tariff, while there is, literally speaking, no precedent for free wool, for never since 1816 has wool entered the ports of the United States free of duty. Why should this great interest of the farmers be suddenly taken out of the protective system and placed upon a free-trade basis? There is no good reason for it. The product has increased by leaps and bounds. The quality, as shown by most competent statisticians employed under a Democratic administration (Messrs. Tichnor and Tingle and Mr. J. R. Dodge), has also improved to such an extent that whereas under a low tariff the weight of the fleece was not more 2½ pounds, now it is about 6 pounds.

Now, I do not wish to be understood as asserting that the tariff has done all this, but I do assert that a protective tariff has stimulated our farmers to improve the breed of their sheep, and hence the quality of the wool, and will continue to do so. And while it is true that under these influences the price of wool has steadily decreased to the consumer, at the same time the increase in production and in the yield in weight per sheep has amply compensated the farmer.

It will be noticed by the foregoing table that the production of wool has steadily decreased since 1884. Two causes have operated to bring this about; the first, the reduction of duty on wool and woolen goods in 1883; secondly, the monkeying attempts at horizontal reduction in the Forty-eighth Congress, and the efforts made in the Forty-ninth Congress to put wool on the free-list. The business interests of this country demand stability.

Turning now to the consideration of the effect of the protective tariff on the farmer, I will briefly call attention to the agricultural progress of the country under a protective tariff. Before doing this I wish to quote the following paragraph from the report of the Department of Agriculture for 1884, page 471:

The settler in new communities, the pioneer in cultivation of wild areas, who avails himself of his opportunity to select the choicest lands naturally and rightfully expects to be benefited in the future by increase of values. He may hope that his children will derive further advantage. His reasonable expectations are sometimes fulfilled; often they are disappointed. If the soil proves to be less fertile than more favored regions, or railway facilities are denied, settlement will be slow, roads poor, schools half supported; with such conditions prices of lands will advance with provoking tardiness. If the soil is rich and settlement rapid till all the land is occupied, while there are no industries beyond the line of agriculture, no families dependent on their neighbors for food supplies, no mines or mills, a certain level of moderate values may be reached, but no high prices of land or products will result. This is proved by the census and other reliable facts and by similar facts in the history of every country in which varied industries flourish. The statement that "other industries increase farm values" is, therefore, axiomatic rather than theoretical.

The same facts and similar data in all industrial history show that mere increase of population does not produce the highest values. Industry, not population, creates wealth. Prices are not enhanced by the presence of paupers. Increase of farmers advances prices in new settlements. Beyond a certain limit numbers may diminish prices, as in parts of India and other countries. Dense population, all employed in agriculture, can never raise prices or produce prosperity as the same population judiciously proportioned among productive industries. The increment will ever be "proportionate, not to numbers, but to productive forces in action, degree in skill, persistence in labor."

The above was written by Mr. J. R. Dodge, the statistician of the Agricultural Department, who, for more than a generation, has made a study of this class of statistics.

Mr. Chairman, what Mr. Dodge describes in that paragraph I have seen. I have lived long enough in the West to see the Western portion of our continent change from a region wholly given over to the production of meat and grain to States with diversified industries; towns that had heretofore been distributive points for goods of Eastern manufacture changed into centers of productive industry and distributing the manufactures of their own furnaces, mills, factories, and workshops.

It has been truly said that—

Every blast-furnace, every iron and steel plant, every woolen mill, every cotton factory, and every workshop, where skill and ingenuity are required, have the effect of promoting the entirety of the Northwest—of making the industrial organism more complete. Agricultural life has been supplemented with manufacturing life, each stimulating the other. That the result has been beneficial to the entire population of these States there can be no sort of doubt.

I have seen in the West the beginning of some Territorial governments, and watched the progress of communities there. Some of those Territories are now States of commanding influence. First came the cultivators of the earth, whose business it is to feed the many. Next came those whose occupation it is to clothe such workers and their families, and to shelter them. Then came the manufacturers of implements of all sorts, and, as a consequence of this diversification of industries, came improved homes for the people, schools, churches, and every instrumentality of a higher civilization.

The development of agricultural industries in the vicinity of hundreds of towns in our Western States, where manufacturing thrives, shows how beneficial to the surrounding country, and indeed to the State itself, such industries have proven.

There are hundreds of growing young cities throughout the West whose enterprising people are to-day offering to give to any firm or corporation that will establish a manufacturing plant within their borders both lands and money as a donation, thus to encourage the development of manufacturing industries. The representatives of those people are asked to support a measure in this Congress that will injure, if not break down, the manufacturing industries that we of the West are striving to build up. I now say to those enterprising citizens either stop trying to build up your cities, or vote down the party that will bring forth such a measure as the bill under consideration.

Why do we of the West desire to encourage manufacturing industries? Mr. Dodge, the statistician, has enforced this argument by dividing our States according to the number of their inhabitants engaged in agricultural pursuits. The first group has farmers to the extent of less than 30 per cent., and the land there is worth $38.65 an acre. In the second group from 30 to 50 per cent. are farmers, and the value of the land is $30.55 an acre. In the third group the farmers number from 50 to 70 per cent., and the land is worth $13.53 an acre. In the fourth group the States are chiefly agricultural, and 70 per cent. of the people are employed on the soil, while the land is worth an average of only $5.18 an acre. In the first group, moreover, the value of the products of the soil is $457 per capita to the cultivator; in the second group, $394; in the third group, $261; and in the fourth group the annual products fall to $160 per capita. I will not trouble you with the details of this investigation, but refer you to pages 472–474, Report of the Agricultural Department for 1884.

Thus we see that a protective tariff not only benefits the farmer in a direct way, by which I mean the direct protection which he gets; and, by the way, it is not generally known that one-third of the protective custom duties are raised upon agricultural products, but indirectly, as I have shown by the figures of Mr. Dodge, by increasing the value of his acres and the value of his products, and thus increasing his income; but it also increases the farm laborer's wages. The average wages per month were, in the first class above quoted, $24.14; in the second, $23.51; in the third, $19.51; and in the fourth, $13.67.

Much has been said by gentlemen on the other side in regard to the agricultural progress of the United States under the tariff, and some gentlemen have tried to show that agricultural progress and development was greater under a low tariff than under a high one. I beg to differ from them.

To explode this sort of argument, based on the flimsiest kind of statistics, I have only to quote the following table, which shows the comparative number of horses, mules, cattle, sheep, and swine at four decennial periods:

Stock.	1850.	1860.	1870.	1880.
Horses	4,336,719	6,249,174	7,145,370	10,357,488
Mules	559,331	1,151,148	1,125,415	1,812,808
Cattle	17,778,907	25,620,019	23,820,608	35,925,511
Sheep	21,723,220	22,471,275	28,477,951	35,192,074
Swine	30,354,213	33,512,867	25,134,569	47,681,700

It will be seen that the number of our horses increased from 7,145,370 in 1870 to 10,357,488 in 1880, an increase of 44 per cent.; the number of our mules increased from 1,125,415 in 1870 to 1,812,808 in 1880, or 61 per cent.; the number of our cattle increased from 23,820,608 in 1870 to 35,925,511 in 1880, an increase of 51 per cent.; the number of our sheep increased from 28,477,951 in 1870 to 35,192,074 in 1880, an increase of 23 per cent.; our swine have increased from 25,134,569 in 1870 to 47,681,700 in 1880, an increase of 89 per cent. This table includes only the stock of farms, exclusive of ranches. Were animals on ranches included, the cattle and sheep of 1880 would be largely increased, and those of 1870 slightly. At the other dates, the ranch interest was scarcely appreciable.

Nothing could be more erroneous than to declare, as some gentlemen have done, that even the value of our farm animals has decreased, because of course that might take place and yet the number increase; but the value has not decreased.

The values are as follows:

Horses	$946,096,154
Mules	174,853,563
Cattle	978,002,693
Sheep	89,279,926
Swine	220,811,082
Total	2,409,043,418

The above table is the estimate made by the Agricultural Department in 1888, and is undoubtedly within the mark. According to the census of 1870 the total value of farm animals was $1,525,276,457, this being the currency value; the gold value would have been $1,220,221,167, showing a gain from 1870 to 1884 of $1,188,822,251, an increase of nearly 100 per cent., and this calculation entirely omits the ranch cattle, which, if included, would add several millions to the total, and show an increase of over 100 per cent.

And yet gentlemen have heretofore had the effrontery to tell us on this floor that under a high protective tariff our live-stock has declined 1½ per cent. I do not pretend to be much of a statistician, but I do say that when a gentleman is obliged to estimate the value of the cattle in the United States on the greenback basis in 1870, a year when gold averaged $1.25, and then to estimate their value on a gold basis in 1880 and deduce therefrom the fact that the live-stock of the United States has decreased under a protective tariff, I say, with due respect to my friends, that when the cause of free trade has to be bolstered up by such inaccurate statistics as these, it is time to cry stop, and to examine the facts and figures of our agricultural progress in a fair spirit and with an honest purpose in view.

Now let us examine the progress in other branches of agriculture. The number of farms has more than doubled—2,000,000 in 1860 to 4,000,000 in 1880 and 5,000,000 in 1887. Their value has increased in that period from $6,000,000,000 in 1860 to over $12,000,000,000 in 1887. The production of cereals has increased under protection from 1,230,000,000 bushels in 1860 to 2,700,000,000 bushels in 1880, an increase of over 100 per cent. The value of live-stock has risen from $1,000,000,000 in 1860 to $2,409,043,418 in 1888, while the annual products of the farm in 1880 reached $3,000,000,000. The number of sheep, owing in part to the duty on wool, has more than doubled—22,000,000 in 1860 to over 44,000,000 at the present time. The home products of wool have increased from 60,000,000 to 275,000,000 pounds. In 1840, with a population of 17,000,000, the United States produced 616,000,000 bushels of cereals and exported but 13,000,000. In 1850 the population had reached 23,000,000; the production of cereals 867,000,000 bushels. The exports, however, had increased but little, being 16,000,000 bushels. In 1860 the population was 31,000,000, the production of cereals 1,240,000,000 bushels, and the exports only 23,000,000 bushels. In 1870 the population had reached 38,500,000, the production of cereals 1,630,000,000 bushels, and the exports something over 57,000,000 bushels. From this date the population of the country has increased something like 3 per cent. per annum, while the annual average production of cereals has averaged since that time nearly 2,000,000,000 bushels, and the annual average exports have been about 150,000,000 bushels, the average annual exportation of wheat alone being 111,000,000 bushels during the period from 1873 to 1883.

How is it possible, then, that manufacturers have in any way interfered with agricultural progress? My attention has been called recently to the second report of the royal commission to inquire into the depression of trade and industry in Great Britain, and I find there, on page 295, in the testimony of Sir James Caird, given on the 4th of March, 1886, some facts bearing on the decline of agriculture in that country. Forty years ago, when Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright were in their prime, they were advocating a policy of free trade for England, precisely as many of our eminent friends on the other side are now advocating a similar policy for the United States. England at that time was strong in manufactures, and the protective tariff was more particularly intended to help the agriculturists. In this country, at the present time, circumstances are reversed; we are strong in agriculture, though we are not strong enough in manufactures to compete with the world.

It was therefore necessary for Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright to use their persuasive eloquence (and Mr. Cobden was particularly eloquent and particularly persuasive about that period, for he had received direct from the English manufacturers the modest sum of $1,000,000 for his services in bringing about free trade—see Morley's Life of Cobden) to convince the farmer that he would be benefited by this step as well as the manufacturer. In one of his speeches that gentleman said:

I believe when the future historian comes to write the history of agriculture he will have to state: "In such a year there was a stringent corn law passed for the protection of agriculture. From that time agriculture slumbered in England, and it was not until, by the aid of the Anti-Corn Law League, the corn law was utterly abolished that agriculture sprang up to the full vigor of existence in England, to become what it is now, like her manufactures, unrivaled in the world."

Now the advocates of free trade on this floor are not only telling the wool-growers of the country that they will be benefited by free trade, but they are also telling the manufacturers the same thing. Is it not fair to ask if the prophecies of Mr. Cobden have been fulfilled in England? On the contrary, the agricultural population has actually decreased. One-third less persons are now employed in agriculture than formerly. Land is going out of cultivation. Already 1,000,000 acres have gone out of wheat cultivation in England, and 1,300,000 acres have gone out of grain and arable cultivation in Ireland.

But what does Sir James Caird say? He says that within ten years the landlords in England have lost 30 per cent., the tenants 60 per cent., and the laborers 10 per cent. of their income; and putting that into figures it brings into bold relief the fact that on $325,000,000 of rental for the United Kingdom the landlords' loss of 30 per cent. would be equal to about $100,000,000; and the tenants' 60 per cent., inasmuch as their income may be taken at half the rental, would be just the same, that is to say, 60 per cent. on half rental, is also $100,000,000, while it would be difficult to estimate the amount of reduction in the income of the laborers. It is estimated that the total loss in spendable income, owing to the decline of agriculture in England, per annum is $214,000,000, taken from the annual income of the landlords, the tenants, and the farm laborers.

Does any one doubt that if we pursue a similar policy to our manufactures and to some extent to our agricultural interests, as England has done, that the results will be the same? I think that they will be.

We have seen during the past twenty-five years a progress in this country, agricultural, mechanical, industrial, and commercial, which has been unequaled by that of any other country in the world. Our railroads have increased, our manufactories have multiplied, our farms have been improved, and the products of our fields and mines have increased at a more rapid rate than ever before. Gentlemen may come here and juggle with percentages and try to make it appear that this is not true. I affirm that reference to official statistical data, easily obtainable by those who seek the truth, shows this to be true beyond the possibility of contradiction.

How has the laboring man fared? He has been benefited in two ways, by the increase in wages and by a decrease in prices of all necessities. Let me call attention to the following table, which shows the difference between wages paid laboring men here and those paid in free-trade England:

Mr. Chairman, if the framers of this bill are so anxious to benefit those who wear woolens, use blankets and carpets, why were not the manufactured articles admitted free of duty? Why put the raw material, as wool is called, on the "free-list" and retain the duty on woolens? Does the distinguished chairman suppose the manufacturers will not take advantage of this omission and, while getting their raw material free, will they not demand the same price for the manufactured article as before? Does he suppose he can thus deceive the consumer?

He may hope to do so until after the next election, but if I am not mistaken the American people have already measured the depth and breadth of the injuries the passage of this bill would bring to them, and will not be deceived by the theorists who father it.

	Duty, ad valorem.
Wool free—flannels	40 per cent.
Wool free—blankets	40 per cent.
Wool free—clothing	45 per cent.
Wool free—cloaks and dress goods	40 per cent.
Wool free—carpets	30 per cent.

All in the interest of the manufacturer and importer, nothing for the consumer.

Is there any question as to the duty of the representatives of a progressive people? I think not; and in my judgment it is very fortunate for the country that Congress has never yet followed any recommendations made by the President in reference to financial matters. The country has not forgotten the letter written his party friends before his inauguration, and now he comes urging the reduction of the surplus and suggesting the mode of procedure, the bill under consideration being framed, as we are told, to meet the suggestions made in the message.

Let us dissect this message, as well as some others from the President:

Two years ago, in his annual message to Congress, he urged the suspension of silver coinage, declaring the many millions of silver then in the Treasury to be an "idle mass," and referred pathetically to "the ceaseless stream of silver" which threatened "to overflow the land." Fortunately, as the event has shown, Congress did not heed his advice, and there has since been added to our stock of silver an amount substantially equal to what, at the time his message was sent to this Congress, the President and his financial advisers treated as our Treasury surplus which they said should be given to the people to meet their monetary needs and avert the threatened financial disaster which might result from adding a few millions to it. If the President is, so far, right in this message, it seems evident that he was misled when he wrote the former one. The keynote of the President's recent message is that the country needs for monetary use all the Treasury surplus. This is doubtless true, but he devotes nearly the entire message to urging the reduction and abolition of tariff duties as practically the only proper means of preventing undue Treasury accumulations, and makes a special attack upon the tariff on manufactured articles and upon wool and other products which he calls raw material, and which, as I have shown, have been immensely increased in this country by means of a protective tariff.

He neglected the opportunity to mention the necessity for liberal expenditures for our much-neglected coast defense and for other important improvements which had been emphasized by Secretary Endicott, and devotes only a single paragraph of the merest reference to reports of the heads of Departments, seemingly quite forgetting that a considerable amount of Treasury surplus may be absorbed in the economical doing of the large amount of legitimate Government work, long neglected and now urgently required in the interest of over 60,000,000 of people. He fails to say that large appropriations for needed improvements may be in the line of the truest economy, but does not neglect to give a general warning against extravagant appropriations. This, however, is not inconsistent with his neglect to render operative by his signature many important bills passed by the last Congress. He aids Congress with no specific information or recommendations as to what reductions in tariff, falling short of the entire abolition of duties, on different lines and grades of manufactured articles will actually effect a reduction of revenue, although he must be aware that in some cases reduction of tariff might result in such increased importations as would greatly increase revenue.

That a large increase of importations in some lines of manufactured articles would result from any considerable reduction of tariff thereon seems as certain as that a reduction in the wages of workers would also ensue, and that many would be deprived of their accustomed employment. The President makes the omission to recognize this prospect more conspicuous by intimating that any reduction in the price of home manufactures may be made to affect only employers (who are, as he intimates, now making undue profit), which will seem as improbable to intelligent employés as to manufacturers.

Our home market is the best in the world. If we lose it in part, where, with the necessarily sharp competition with the products of lower priced labor abroad, shall we find compensation for that loss? It may be that the United States can now successfully compete with great manufacturing countries in making and selling palace cars and locomotives, but in many lines of staple goods such competition would only be made possible through such a reduction of wages as would make the wages paid here approximate to those abroad.

We are told that—

Millions of our people who never use and never saw any of the foreign products purchase and use things of the same kind made in this country, and pay therefor nearly or quite the same enhanced price which the duty adds to the imported articles.

This is a serious error if intended to apply generally to manufactured necessaries in common use, as a little attention to facts will show.

We are further told that—

The worker in manufactures receives at the desk of his employer his wages, and perhaps before he reaches his home is obliged, in his purchase for his family use of an article which embraces his own labor, to return in the payment of the increase in price which the tariff permits the hard-earned compensation of many days of toil.

If this were a common occurrence, as is intimated, it would be a serious matter. But what are the facts? What manufactures are chiefly consumed by "workers in manufactures?" Their food is for the most part necessarily of home production. The cost of meat and bread can be very little affected by the tariff. The tariff upon sugar is more considerable than that upon any other article of food and affects the cost of the living of wage-workers more than that upon all other food products combined.

But the tariff upon sugar is not noticed by the President, it being the production of a Southern State. Sugar is one of the few articles, consumed largely and produced sparingly in this country, upon which a heavy duty is imposed. The tariff upon it yields a revenue about equal to our estimated last year's surplus, $58,000,000, and more than 25 per cent. of all revenue from customs. But there seems to be no good reason for the President's omission to even mention the tariff upon sugar, which is an article of as common use as wool, especially as the percentage of duty as well as the total revenue derived from sugar is much greater than in the case of wool and woolen goods. My own opinion is that the duty should be removed from sugar and that a sufficient bonus should be given to our sugar producers to protect the industry and encourage production until the United States shall produce the sugar we consume.

The cost of furniture used by the "worker in manufactures" or by the farmers can generally be made only in a slight degree more expensive by reason of the tariff. His carpets may cost him a little more here than the same quality would, at the moment, if of English manufacture, imported free of duty. But the total wholesale value of all carpets, domestic and foreign, sold in this country, yearly, indicates a consumption, at present prices, of little more than 50 cents' worth for each person. Of course any enhancement of the price of common grades of home production, by means of the tariff, can be but a mere trifle for each family. But the worker has the satisfaction of knowing that the price of carpets has been greatly reduced within a few years, and is now much lower than it otherwise would be, by reason of our extensive manufacture thereof, made possible by the tariff. Doubtless the worker in manufactures also understands that if we should import one-half as many millions of yards of carpets as we now manufacture, the price of the foreign product would be enhanced by our greatly increased demand for it.

Evidently, the largest expenditure made by the average worker in manufactures for manufactured articles other than food is for clothing. It has often been shown by the testimony of experts that the grade of clothing usually worn by such workers costs but little, if any, more here than in foreign countries, although the higher grades of clothing doubtless do cost more here. The average wage-worker having received his wages "at the desk of his employer," does not on his way home buy a seal-skin coat. Such an article might, perhaps, cost the equivalent of the wages of several "days of toil" more here than in London. But such an article is a luxury, and the President says that he finds no fault with the tariff on luxuries.

May not a suit of clothes which costs from $80 to $100 be properly called a luxury also?

But the duty on the cloth in such a suit is not more than $5, which is hardly the equivalent of "many days of toil." It is needless to say that such a suit is seldom required by the "worker in manufactures" or farmers. There is a tariff amounting to about 40 per cent. on cotton goods. Some domestic cotton goods might, perhaps, at the moment be bought a little less were there no tariff.

The cost of other grades is no greater here than in England. If we make the probably all too liberal estimate that one-fourth in value of our entire consumption of cotton goods (including the finest imported goods) is enhanced to the full extent of the tariff upon corresponding foreign goods, the enhancement in accordance with such an estimate amounts to about 30 cents for each person. The cotton cloth used by the masses of our people can be bought here fully as cheaply as in England, thanks to the tariff which has helped to build up the great cotton manufacturing establishments, North and South.

From a somewhat careful survey of the field, considering consumption and prices of the principal necessaries of life, as well as the tariff upon imports thereof, it does not appear that the tariff possibly could both directly and indirectly affect the average necessary cost of living to each person in the country more than five or six dollars a year, even upon the President's unwarranted assumption that such things as domestic woolen goods, for instance, are enhanced in price to the full extent of the tariff on like foreign goods. As a basis for this estimate, furniture and household goods, as well as food and clothing and medicine, are considered. Liberal allowance is also made for sundries. In the case of woolen goods the domestic products are assumed to be enhanced in price to the full extent of the tariff on corresponding products, although the facts certainly do not justify the assumption.

The tariff upon such an article as wheat-flour is not considered as affecting the general price of flour in the United States to any appreciable extent, although the tariff upon wheat-flour is 20 per cent. and a few hundred barrels are imported. But wheat-flour is one of our important exports, and we always have a surplus. The theory which the President adopts, however, is that the cost to consumers of our domestic manufactures is enhanced to an extent substantially equivalent to the tariff imposed upon kindred foreign products. His reference to the extensive use of manufactured domestic articles by millions here who never see like foreign products, coupled with his statement that—

> Those who buy imports pay the duty charged thereon into the public Treasury, but the great majority of our citizens who buy domestic articles of the same class pay a sum at least approximately equal to this duty to the home manufacturer—

Seem to clearly refer to such manufactures as flour as well as woolen goods, as both are imported to a greater or less extent, and both are largely produced here. If the theory were well founded, or had any general application, as it apparently has in the mind of the President, it would follow that the tariff upon wheat flour, which in the census of 1880 is classed among our most important manufactures, enhances the wholesale value of a year's product of flour in the United States more than eighty millions of dollars, as the value of our product in 1880 is stated to have been over $500,000,000. The wholesale market value, of course, includes any possible enhancement effected by the tariff. It seems apparent that, with our present home supply and foreign demand, any possible imports of wheat flour, in the absence of a tariff thereon, would now affect the general price of flour in the United States about as little as a few hundred barrels of water might the general level of the ocean.

Were there no tariff on wheat flour the Canadian miller would get our price for the flour he sends over the border. As it is, he pays tribute to our Government for the privilege of selling his surplus flour here. The same might be said of other things which we import to a limited extent and produce largely.

The tariff upon wheat, however, may be of great benefit to our Western farmers when the great Manitoba wheat belt shall produce hundreds of millions of bushels of wheat, as it is destined soon to do. The fact is the tariff raises the cost of all the daily necessaries of life consumed by workers in manufactures and others far less than many suppose, while there is abundant evidence that the cost has in many cases been greatly reduced owing to the establishment of manufactures here, which would have been impossible without the tariff.

Computations based upon the President's assumption as to increase in price of leading domestic products, of which woolen goods furnish the President a striking example, are so made simply to show how small, even upon such an unwarranted basis, would be the tax imposed as compared with what the President seems to think it is.

> the radical reduction of the duties imposed on raw material used in manufactures or its free importation.

He tries to convince the very small wool-grower, who keeps not more than from twenty-five to fifty sheep, that he, at least, will not suffer from the removal of the tariff on wool. He says in substance that the protection furnished such a farmer augments his yearly receipts not more than from $18 to $36; and that—> the increase in price upon a moderate purchase of woolen goods and material to clothe himself and family for the winter—> as a result of the tariff scheme, more than sufficient to sweep away the whole amount.

The fact is, that the small farmer, who by reason of the tariff realizes $36 more than he otherwise might from the sale of wool, leaving out of the question the number of his sheep, would pay, his family being of the average size and his expenditure for woolen material for their clothing being also average, certainly not more than about $8 a year, or a little more than $2 for each person, on account of the extra cost of all such family purchases imposed by reason of the tariff, even if the price of all domestic woolens were increased to the extent of the average amount of the duty imposed upon foreign woolen goods. It ought to be unnecessary to repeat to intelligent people that the price is not so increased.

The value of our total production of all woolen and worsted goods, including carpets, was in 1880 equal to a little more than $5 for each of our population. If production has kept pace with increase in population prices have fallen, so that it is doubtful if the wholesale value of the product in the last year was equal to more than $4.50 per capita. For the year ending June 30, 1887, the value of the imports of woolen goods, including the duty paid thereon, was about $1.11 for each person, from which it is inferred that the wholesale value of our entire consumption of woolen goods can not now exceed about $5.60 per capita. This average consumption, it should be remembered, is based upon an estimate which includes the most expensive goods as well as those of modern price. Even if the present wholesale price of all domestic woolen goods, including carpets, covered an average increase of 60 per cent. by reason of the tariff, the extra cost so imposed on each person would be little more than $2.

Probably no necessary of life, aside from food, costs either the average farmer or the "worker in manufactures" as much as woolen goods. Removing the tariff from wool would not obviate this, but lead to the slaughter of millions of domestic sheep, and the exportation of large sums to pay for foreign wool. After a temporary glut of mutton in our markets the price of mutton would doubtless be increased enough to offset any gain to consumers of woolen goods who are also consumers of mutton, which might follow the removal of the tariff upon wool.

Doubtless all will agree with the President that such articles as do not in any way compete with our own products should be placed upon the free-list. Probably we might safely, also, place upon the free-list some things which we produce to a very limited extent, but for any considerable production of which our soil, climate, or other conditions are unfavorable.

A well-known free-trader testified before the tariff commission in 1882 that he believed that a material tariff reduction would result in some reduction in wages; but he thought that the reduction of the cost of living would more than compensate therefor. This seems to be the President's theory also. The admissions of this free-trade witness as to the comparative condition of American and European laborers, which were elicited upon his cross-examination, are, however, worthy of some attention in this connection.

He admitted his conclusion, resulting from his personal observation in several countries, that the American laborer is able to have meat and carpets (which, however, the witness did not consider necessary), to dress his family more expensively, and to enjoy many luxuries practically unknown to the European laborer, and he also believed that the American laborers are able to make much larger savings-banks deposits than the English laborers can.

Representative Democrats who favor radical tariff reduction as relates to articles on the production of which some of our greatest industries depend—Democrats like the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT], admit that the President's claim that the tariff upon corresponding foreign goods affects our home products to the extent of the tariff rate should be discounted just one-half. It is but just to say that after examining the subject in the light of the best statistics relating to prices in this country, as compared with those in foreign countries, I am satisfied that the claim of these gentlemen should also be discounted at least one-half.

Let us use the surplus. Let us pay our debts. Let us call the Government bonds, and thus and in other legitimate ways furnish our people with not merely what the President treats as surplus, but with a much larger amount of our vast accumulation, which no sound policy requires us to keep locked up in the Treasury vaults.

But when this money shall have been made to pulsate like blood in the veins of our great internal commerce and to vivify our industries, let us not send it all out of the country to pay for foreign goods to take the place of what should be manufactured here, in order to gratify a few theorists at the expense of the well-being of the multitudes of our countrymen.

It is a favorite theory of some free-traders, who most loudly applaud the President's message, that but for the tariff we might import vastly more manufactured articles than at present, and that, such are our agricultural advantages, thousands of workers in manufactures might with profit "go to the soil" to develop its resources and produce the wherewith to pay for greatly increased importations. A witness who represented a free-trade league testified before the Tariff Commission to his belief that under the beneficent operation of free trade we might so increase our imports that by 1890 they might amount to about $1,500,000,000, or much more than double our present importations, the increase being equal to more than 12½ per cent. of the value of all our manufactures, estimating their value at about $6,500,000,000 a year.

Bearing in mind the President's opinion, that all the Treasury surplus is needed for monetary use among our people to prevent financial disaster and serious depression in our great industries, let us consider the probable effect of increasing our importation of manufactured articles to an amount equal to or even as little as 6 per cent. of our manufactures as a result of radically reducing the tariff on manufactured necessaries. Of course the importation of certain classes of goods would be increased to a much larger extent.

According to the last census the value of all manufactured products in the United States in 1880 was $5,369,579,191, to produce which the labor of 2,732,595 persons was required. If such products have increased correspondingly with our increase in population their value would now equal, at a valuation similar to that of 1880, nearly $6,500,000,000. A corresponding increase in the number of workers in manufactures would indicate nearly 3,308,000 such workers at the present time. Six per cent. of such value would be about $390,000,000, and 6 per cent. of such workers nearly 198,500. Should we increase the imports of manufactured articles to take the place of our own products to this extent and send 198,500 such workers "to the soil" with their dependent families; if they should consume as much of our agricultural products as now, and if, through some miraculous intervention, they might be able to produce as much as an equal number of trained agriculturists, the increase which we might export, to pay for the increase in imports, would evidently be very inadequate.

In 1880 there were, it appears, 7,670,493 persons engaged in agriculture in the United States. Three billion dollars has been considered a fair estimate of the value of our agricultural products for that year. It is several hundred millions larger than the census estimate for the preceding year. This estimate indicates an average production of about $391.10 for each person then engaged in agriculture. The greater production of each "worker in manufactures" is chiefly accounted for by the value of material used. If the manufactured articles were imported the material used therein would usually be produced abroad also. Thus other great industries in this country would be injured and more workers lose their accustomed employment.

Conceding the present agricultural product to be as large per capita as in 1880, 198,500 agricultural workers might, under the most favorable circumstances, be expected to produce agricultural products of the value of nearly $78,000,000, which might be available for export to pay in part for our increase of imports. But those who are now engaged in agricultural pursuits would necessarily lose in case of any considerable contraction of the home market for their products, as well as from the lessening of prices, which would follow a coincident increase in the volume of such products, and especially any attempt to export more than the foreign market demands. We are sometimes told that our agricultural exports might be vastly greater if we imported more manufactured articles, but there is plenty of recent historical evidence to disprove the assertion, unless it might result from greatly reducing the price of such exports.

Although our wheat crop was 74,000,000 bushels larger in 1886 than in 1881, and our corn crop 500,000,000 bushels larger, we exported but little more wheat and less corn in the year ending June 30, 1887, than in the year ending June 30, 1882, in spite of the fact that in the last twelve months our imports have actually exceeded our exports. How well this simple fact answers the recent statement of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky at Philadelphia, that we "can not send cargoes to foreign ports because we can not bring back cargoes to this protection-cursed country," I leave it to this House to judge. In the period covering the years 1879, 1880, and 1881 the balance of trade was largely in our favor. Our exports of wheat and corn were then vastly greater than now, although we still have plenty of surplus stock which we are ready to sell at a lower price than then. Among the causes which have operated to produce such results may be mentioned short crops abroad then, and large shipments of Indian wheat to Europe of late, as well as contraction in the volume of European metallic money, or, in other words, "appreciation of the purchasing power of gold."

Certainly it can not be said that any greater willingness on our part at that time to take European woolen goods contributed to the willingness of Europe to take our wheat and corn, as our imports of woolen goods are much greater now, owing doubtless, in part at least, to the reduction of the tariff on such goods in 1883.

If there should be no advance in the price of foreign goods, by reason of the increased demand for them, and if we could buy such foreign manufactures abroad as much less as the whole of the alleged enhancement in the value or price of domestic products by reason of the tariff, we might then obtain manufactures hitherto valued at $390,000,000 here, by exporting, in addition to about $78,000,000 worth of agricultural products more than at present, nearly $200,000,000 of gold. Should we pay for our foreign purchases, it would take a little more than three years for us to export all the gold in the country.

If, however, as would probably happen, we should pay for part and incur indebtedness for the balance, our exportation of gold would be slower, but not less certain. Our vast exports of specie in the period in which the low tariff of 1846 was operative (they were in ten years more than $200,000,000 greater than our imports), followed by the suspension of specie payments and the panic of 1857, should not easily be forgotten. Neither should we lose sight of the fact that in 1887 free-trade Great Britain, according to the Statist, imported merchandise to the amount of more than $400,000,000 more than she exported.

Under our present system the United States has been and is largely decreasing our indebtedness. Has free-trade Great Britain been as fortunate in this respect? The debt of the United States, per capita, was greater on August 1, 1865, than August 1, 1885, in the ratio of $84 to $24—250 per cent. An individual considers it a good thing to decrease his indebtedness. Is it different with a nation?

At this critical juncture, when European nations are clutching desperately at the gold they find slipping away from them, would it not be the height of folly for the United States to involve herself in monetary troubles to help Europe out of hers?

The claim made by some free-traders that we could with such a reduction in tariff, without lowering wages, export enough of our manufactures to pay for our increased importation of manufactures is not considered worthy of serious attention. This is a practical question with which we have to deal, and in the final outcome all the theories of all the free-traders in Christendom will not weigh a feather's weight against the practical common sense of the masses of our workers, even if such theories are adopted by Democratic leaders, who, professing not to be free-traders, eagerly promulgate nearly every free-trade absurdity.

Two propositions formulated by Mr. Robert J. Walker, Secretary of the Treasury under President Polk, have received much commendation from free-traders. The first, "That no more money should be collected than is necessary for the wants of the Government, economically administered," will be generally assented to, although there may and will be differences of opinion as to what may properly be considered economical administration. But the second, "That no duty be imposed on any article above the lowest rate which will yield the largest amount of revenue," would hardly be in accord with the serious effort which the President advises Congress to make to effect a reduction of revenue. In the case of woolen goods, for instance, raising the tariff 10 per cent. would be much more likely to effect a reduction of revenue than lowering it to the same extent, as lowering it would be sure to increase importations. If the tariff upon such goods is left as it is, it will be found that there is no lack of legitimate ways for disposing of all the revenue derived from it, after proper reductions are effected in other directions. Surely the time has not come for us to cripple our great wool and woolen industries and to strike a blow at others, by making vast exports of the money of the country to pay for what we may well produce.

Events of the past year, not less than the President's message, have called public attention to the necessity of avoiding monetary contraction. In considering the legitimate disposition of the surplus, the Government debt, amounting to many hundreds of millions, need never be forgotten until it is canceled. But it would be better to make even extravagant appropriations for great public improvements, to pay unwarrantably large pensions, to grant large bounties to encourage sugar culture and South American steamship lines, and to make large governmental appropriations for educational purposes in the States, of however questionable propriety the suggestions may seem, than to send like amounts out of the country to pay for what is now produced here. In one case the money would be distributed among our people, and would furnish a needed condition for general prosperity. In the other it would be lost to the country, and lead to the consequences which usually follow extensive monetary contraction. The President has received much praise in certain quarters for his courage in advocating radical tariff reduction. This Congress may well hesitate before entering upon a course fraught with such apparent peril, even if it fails to receive like approbation from the same source. In endeavoring to steer our financial bark from the Scylla of Treasury accumulation we should be careful to avoid wrecking it in the Charybdis of gold exportation.

Mr. Chairman, we all agree upon two propositions, namely, that the surplus should be reduced and that our revenue laws should be revised.

Then what is our duty? Should we not deal with these questions in a business-like manner? I think so. Then let us do those things which are for the best interests of the country, and at all times be guided by the experience of the past. Let us follow the course so plainly marked out, turning away from the seductive pleadings of the theorist and following the advice of the practical and successful business men of the country. Each member upon this floor has fixed opinions upon the questions under consideration, and probably no two could agree in all details as to what is the true policy. Notwithstanding this fact, it is the duty of every member to submit for consideration the views he may entertain and then try to reconcile the differences that may exist. In my judgment it is the duty of the President to at once expend the surplus now in the Treasury in purchasing and retiring our bonds.

Then Congress should authorize the disbursement of the one hundred millions of gold now held in the Treasury for the redemption of the legal-tender notes. The holding of this vast sum is the height of folly. Why should the Government be required to hold within its own vaults any sum to make good its promise to pay? Using the surplus now in the Treasury and the one hundred millions of gold he would at once put into circulation over $200,000,000 that are now hoarded, and the obligation of the Government upon which we are paying interest would be decreased that amount less the premium upon the bonds.

To prevent such accumulations in the Treasury in the future, we should have a fair, just, and equitable revision of our revenue laws. This should be done after a careful investigation and a patient hearing of all the interests affected by the changes proposed. The principle of protection to the interests that have been developed in this country should never be forgotten. If we could place lumber, coal, and salt on the free-list, and reduce the duty on sugar and molasses so the revenue arising therefrom should not exceed $10,000,000 per annum, and use the portion of that sum necessary to encourage sugar-growing in the country, the revenues would be reduced to the extent required and the people of the country benefited and no industry injured.

If we pass the bill under consideration, we strike down and destroy one of our most important agricultural industries, in which over one million of our people are interested; we will force a reduction of the compensation paid to over two millions of wage-workers in the different industries affected by the reductions in duty made in the bill; we give the Canadian farmer a market for his products, and place him upon an equal footing with our farmers of the North and West. Time will not allow me to show all the vicious provisions of this bill. It should and will be defeated. This country is not yet ready to take the first step in the direction of free trade. This Congress will not make glad the hearts of those who for the past thirty years have yearned for the markets of the great Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 7315) to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux nation of Indians in Dakota into separate reservations and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder;

An act (H. R. 1956) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Gros Ventre, Piegan, Blood, Blackfeet, and River Crow Indians in Montana, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 1805) for a public building at Greenville, S. C.;

An act (H. R. 4365) to authorize the construction of an arsenal for the repair and distribution of ordnance and ordnance stores for the use of the Government of the United States at Columbia, Tenn.; and

An act (H. R. 6894) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889.

H. B. WILSON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, returning without approval the bill (H. R. 19) for the relief of H. B. Wilson, administrator of the estate of William Tinder, deceased.

The Clerk began the reading of the message.

Mr. BURROWS (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, as the reading of this message can not be concluded before half past 5 o'clock, I ask unanimous consent that, without finishing the reading, the message be printed in the RECORD and properly referred.

Mr. MILLS. Let this communication be read in the morning. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 2, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a recommendation of the Supervising Architect that $18,000 be appropriated to complete approaches to the Santa Fé (N. Mex.) court-house; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, received yesterday from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. 2097) to authorize the construction of a bridge across Trail Creek, in the city of Michigan City, Ind.;

A bill (H. R. 7340) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Hickman, Ky.; and

A bill (H. R. 8343) to authorize the construction of a wagon and foot-passenger bridge across the Noxubee River at or near Gainesville, in the State of Alabama.

The bill (H. R. 2695) for the relief of Charles V. Mesler was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. 6232) for the relief of Nancy G. Alexander was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PROPOSED EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to give notice that immediately after the morning business is over I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents the petition of John Pope Hodnett, of Washington, D. C., praying for an investigation of his claims to payment for services as counsel for the workingmen of the District of Columbia in the investigation of 1874; which will be referred to the Committee on Claims, if there be no objection.

Mr. SPOONER. That subject was before the Committee on Claims at the last Congress, and by direction of that committee I reported it back to the Senate, asking that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, which was done. I move that the petition just presented be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of James Sumner, of Rockport, Spencer County, Indiana, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLODGETT presented a petition of ex-Union soldiers and sailors, citizens of the States of New Jersey and New York, praying for the passage of the per diem rated service-pension bill; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of vessel-owners, consignees, and business men of Atlantic City, N. J., and other citizens of New Jersey, praying that an appropriation be made for the erection of jetties near the entrance of the harbor at Atlantic City; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FARWELL presented the petition of John F. Ryon, of Paris, Ill., late a private in Company I, One hundred and twenty-third Regiment Indiana Volunteers, praying to be allowed an increase of pension for the loss of his right eye; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Concurrent resolution in relation to swamp land indemnity.]

Whereas the provisions of the act of Congress of March 2, 1855, as extended by act of Congress of March 3, 1857, granting indemnity to the States for swamp and overflowed lands disposed of by the United States, are held not to apply to sales and locations made after March 3, 1857; and

Whereas a large amount of land properly falling to the State and counties in Iowa under the swamp grant have been disposed of by the Government since March 3, 1857, thereby compelling the counties and their grantees to abandon their claim to such lands or litigate with the purchasers of the Government; and

Whereas on the 9th day of February, 1888, Hon. William McRae, from the Committee on Public Lands, made a report, to accompany bill H. R. 6897 in the House of Representatives in Congress, to extend said indemnity provisions of said act of March 2, 1855, and making the same applicable to sales and locations made since March 3, 1857, which bill is pending in Congress; and

Whereas, under the rulings of the Department, certificates, called scrip or indemnity scrip, issued for indemnity for swamp lands located with warrants can not be located on lands outside of the State, and there being no vacant land in Iowa on which scrip can be located, many of the counties in this State, after great expense, are unable to realize anything for their swamp lands so disposed of by warrant locations, and by that means are damaged to a large amount: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of Iowa (the House concurring), That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives in Congress be requested to use all proper and lawful means in their power to secure the passage of said bill H. R. 6897, or by the enactment in some other bill of provision substantially as herein contained.

Resolved further, That the secretary of state transmit to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of this resolution.

I hereby certify the foregoing concurrent resolution passed the senate and the house of representatives of the Twenty-second General Assembly of the State of Iowa.

[SEAL.] FRANK D. JACKSON,
Secretary of State.
By C. S. BYRKIT, Deputy.

Mr. DAVIS presented a petition of citizens of St. Paul, Minn., praying for the passage of a bill for the preservation of the Yellowstone National Park; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. STEWART presented the petition of James Walsh, a citizen of California, praying reimbursement for losses sustained on account of Indian depredations in Nevada County, California; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the petition of H. E. Proctor and 47 other citizens of Stoddard, N. H., and the petition of Jonathan D. Hale, of Stoddard, N. H., praying that reimbursement be made for moneys raised and expended by the town of Stoddard, N. H., during the late war between the States; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Jonathan D. Hale, formerly postmaster at Hale's Mills, Tenn., praying to be reimbursed the sum paid the United States Government in 1861, alleged to have been wrongfully exacted from him; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the petition of A. J. Stone and 12 other citizens of Vermont, praying for the passage of Senate bill 548, granting pensions to widows and minor children of pensioners; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of citizens of Junction City, Oregon, praying for the correction of the military record of M. J. Gilstrap, of that place; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PADDOCK presented a petition of citizens of Nebraska, praying for the repeal of that portion of the internal-revenue law which classes druggists as liquor dealers, and for a reduction of the duty on spirits; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report adversely the bill (S. 2470) to repeal section 714 of the Revised Statutes, allowing pensions to judges in certain cases. It may be placed on the Calendar, as my friend from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] desires to be heard upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 987) for the relief of the administrators of the estate of Isaac P. Tice, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 750) for the relief of Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, Tenn., reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Clara B. Davidson, praying for an increase of pension, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 2852) granting increase of pension to Clara B. Davidson; which was read twice by its title.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. EDMUNDS introduced a bill (S. 2846) to increase the pensions of soldiers and sailors in the war of the rebellion who contracted heart disease in the service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill (S. 2847) granting a pension to Albert F. Jones; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (S. 2848) granting a pension to Thomas B. Dearman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a bill (S. 2849) for the relief of Collin Adams; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 2850) granting a pension to Harriet M. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no resolutions, concurrent or other, the order of morning business is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate, pursuant to the order of yesterday, the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2458) to amend an act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River at the foot of Pennsylvania avenue east, with amendments in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 1161) granting a pension to Mrs. Jennie Stone, widow of General Charles P. Stone.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 1788) for the erection of a public building at Lancaster, Pa.; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the executive session be long?

Mr. SHERMAN. Only a few minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

Mr. FARWELL. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up Senate bill 2615, Order of Business 938.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes, being before the Senate, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2615) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to acquire and use real estate for railway purposes in the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLUMB. I will not object if the bill can be disposed of without debate.

Mr. FARWELL. If it leads to any debate I shall withdraw my request.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read.

Mr. GORMAN. I trust the Senator from Illinois will not press the consideration of the bill this morning. It has only been reported from the District Committee within a few days.

Mr. FARWELL. It has been on the Calendar since the 6th of April—almost a month.

Mr. GORMAN. I trust the Senator will not press the bill this morning, but will let it go over until to-morrow. I shall not object to its consideration at any time after to-day. I think there are some amendments that should be offered to it, and there are some reasons why the whole question as to the entry of these railroads into the city should be considered in the same connection.

Mr. FARWELL. I withdraw the request I made, so as to let the bill go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read, and the Senator from Maryland objecting to its present consideration, it will resume its place on the Calendar.

MRS. JENNIE STONE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the message of the House of Representatives returning to the Senate in compliance with its request the bill (S. 1161) granting a pension to Mrs Jennie Stone, widow of General Charles P. Stone.

Mr. SAWYER. I move that that bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HOAR. Why should that be done?

Mr. SAWYER. There is on the Calendar a bill from the House of Representatives covering exactly the same point, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having passed the Senate it can only be indefinitely postponed after reconsidering the vote by which it was passed.

Mr. HOAR. Let it lie on the table for a little while and I will look into it. My impression is that my honorable friend is in error in thinking that the bill which the other House has sent is to the same effect as the Senate bill.

Mr. SAWYER. It may be possible that it varies in amount.

Mr. HOAR. It varies in amount.

Mr. SAWYER. But it is for the benefit of the same person.

Mr. HOAR. Let this stand, and we may deal with them both at the same time.

Mr. SAWYER. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table.

EASTERN BRANCH BRIDGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2458) to amend an act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River at the foot of Pennsylvania avenue east, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 3, after the words "plan of," strike out "said bridge" and insert "the bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River at the foot of Pennsylvania avenue east;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to make such alterations in the plan of the bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River at the foot of Pennsylvania avenue east as will best accommodate the traffic over and under said bridge.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate concur in that amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the House of Representatives will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Add to the bill the following proviso:

And provided further, That one-half the sum hereby appropriated shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate concur in that amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIANAPOLIS POST-OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask the Senate to take up for consideration at this time Order of Business 1170, being House bill 1325.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that Senate bill 1430 be informally laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 1325) providing for the purchase of additional ground in the city of Indianapolis, Ind., adjoining the post-office site, and for the improvement of the building thereon, and appropriating $125,000 therefor.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. TURPIE. I move to amend the bill, in line 16, by making the amount appropriated $150,000 instead of $125,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 16, after the words "one hundred and," it is proposed to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty;" so as to read:

And for the purpose herein mentioned the sum of $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill providing for the purchase of additional ground in the city of Indianapolis, Ind., adjoining the post-office site, and for the improvement of the building thereon, and appropriating $150,000 therefor."

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ATCHISON, KANS.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be informally laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1726) to provide for the erection of a public building for the use of the post-office and Government offices at the city of Atchison, Kans. I think it will not elicit debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to laying aside Senate bill 1430 informally for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BERRY. I thought it was the intention to press the land-forfeiture bill at as early a day as possible. If that order is to be laid aside and other matters are to be taken up, I have no objection; but if the purpose is to go on with the land-forfeiture bill, I should be glad to have it proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The consideration of these bills is proceeding by unanimous consent only, and a single objection——

Mr. BERRY. I shall not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A single objection will require the resumption of the unfinished business.

Mr. PLUMB. It is common, I think, to ask the consent of a Senator who has charge of a measure that it be laid aside. That formality has been waived this morning, but I am willing to allow this bill to be proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has upon every occasion submitted the question whether there was objection to laying aside the unfinished business and proceeding to the consideration of the bill indicated.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Kansas will do me the justice to say that before making this request I consulted him on the subject.

Mr. PLUMB. I was speaking about his action as a Senator, not about his action as an individual.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill mentioned by the Senator from Wisconsin?

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 4, after the word "purchase," to insert "or acquire by condemnation proceedings, or otherwise;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to purchase, or acquire by condemnation proceedings, or otherwise, a site and to cause to be erected at the city of Atchison, in the State of Kansas, a suitable building for the use and accommodation of the post-office and other Government offices in said city, with fire-proof vaults extending to each story; the site, and the building thereon, when completed according to plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, not to exceed the cost of $100,000; and the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purchase of said site and the completion of said building.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WILMINGTON, DEL.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator from Kansas will yield to me to make a request for unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 1062, I should be much obliged to him.

Mr. PLUMB. Having myself opened the door in a certain way by letting in the bills of two or three Senators, I do not think I ought to object to the request of the Senator from Delaware, who has spoken to me about the matter privately. I shall not object to bringing up the bill that he seeks to call up if it does not lead to debate, but I shall not yield any further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware asks unanimous consent that the pending business be informally laid aside to enable him to move the consideration of the bill (S. 1062) to increase the appropriation for the erection of the public building at Wilmington, Del.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to increase the amount heretofore fixed as the limit of cost for the erection of a public building at Wilmington, Del., to $250,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 1064) for the relief of L. J. Worden; and

A bill (S. 2614) to authorize the Batesville and Brinkley Railroad to build a bridge across the Black River in Arkansas.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, each with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (S. 1828) to provide for a light-house at Newport News, Middle Ground, Virginia; and

A bill (S. 2506) for the establishment of a light-house, fog-signal, and day beacon in the vicinity of Goose Rocks, Fox Island Thoroughfare, Maine.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate bill 1430 will now be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. CALL.

Mr. PLUMB. Concerning the amendment of the Senator from Florida which is now pending, I will state that the Senator from Florida has agreed that he will not object to my motion to strike out all of the amendment after line 6. I therefore move to strike out that part of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 6 of the proposed amendment, strike out all after the word "laws" down to and including the word "acres" in line 14, as follows:

All lands affected by any grant where the granting act required a disposal by the Legislature of the State and there has been no legislative disposal by the State Legislature in the time required by the granting act are hereby declared subject to homestead entry and settlement; and in all cases persons in possession of lots in town-sites and of tracts of land shall have the preferred right of entering the same to the extent of 360 acres;

So as to make the amendment read:

SEC. 8. That all actual settlers on any of the public lands in the State of Florida affected by the grants, who made actual settlements on any of said lands after the time limited in the granting act for the construction of said road, shall have the right to perfect their entries respectively under the homestead or pre-emption laws.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I have accepted the modification of the amendment as suggested by the Senator from Kansas, and only wish to say that I do so because I desire the amendment to be adopted without any controversy. So far as it goes it protects the actual settlers now upon this grant. I have maintained and expect to continue to maintain (and the Senator from Kansas assures me that there will be a bill before the Senate in which that question may be considered) that the whole of these grants are now by law subject to homestead entry and settlement, and the only difficulty in the way is that the Interior Department, by some strange and wonderful fatuity, although there has never been any legislative disposal or any pretense of a legislative disposal of this grant, or any portion of it, and although the time has expired years and years ago, and all the acts touching upon the subject have been repealed, until there was an attempt in 1881 to give a portion of the grant to a road to be located after that time, differing entirely from the road and the railroad company originally projected, and having neither succession to it nor connection with it, the charter of which was repealed years ago—until that time there had never been to 1881, nearly fifteen years after this grant had expired, either a location of any line of road with the authority of the State or a disposal of any kind to anybody by the Legislature of the State of this grant. Now, as to the larger portion of it, these facts still remain. There has never been a pretense, even, not a word, not a syllable, in all the laws of Florida of a legislative disposal of the larger portion of this grant, and none of even a part of it, until fifteen years after the time fixed in the grant for its completion.

Notwithstanding these facts, at the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas, I accept the modification to the amendment, to the end that this much may be now accomplished, declaring my intention to continue my efforts to make all this part of the public domain open to the people for homes for themselves and their families, saving only to purchasers of limited portions reasonable protection, and confirming to purchasers of town sites the title to their lots.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands, then, that there is no objection to the proposed amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Florida. If there be no objection, it is agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move to insert, after the word "road," in line 5 of the same amendment, the words "and before May 1, 1888;" so as to read:

SEC. 8. That all actual settlers on any of the public lands in the State of Florida affected by the grants, who made actual settlement on any of said lands after the time limited in the granting act for the construction of the said road, and before May 1, 1888, shall have the right to perfect their entries respectively under the homestead or pre-emption laws.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. The amendment of the Senator from Florida as now modified provides that all actual settlers on any of the public lands in the State of Florida affected by the grants, "who made actual settlement on any of said lands after the time limited in the granting act for the construction of the said road, shall have the right to perfect their entries respectively." What I wish to know is whether any of the companies in Florida which received grants from the United States, and which did not complete their road or roads within the time required in the act, have since completed their roads or any portion of them?

Mr. CALL. There is no company in the State of Florida which has received any direct grant of lands from the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL. The company received the lands from the State?

Mr. CALL. The grant was to the State.

Mr. MITCHELL. It received the lands from the State?

Mr. CALL. The grant was to the State. There is no company that has completed any part of its line that has any grant from the State of the land embraced within the grant of the United States. There are companies which have been since chartered and which have constructed portions of their route since the passage of the granting act by the United States, and since the expiration of the time limited in the act, but there are no companies which have constructed roads under the authority of the Legislature of the State giving them any interest in the grant of 1856. That is the difficulty in this case.

The difficulty in this case is that the State of Florida received a grant from the United States to aid in the construction of certain lines of road, which was limited to ten years for the completion of the entire lines of road. That act required a legislative disposal of the grant. The Legislature never made any disposal of the larger portion of this grant, although the act of Congress expressly required a legislative disposal of the grant. The governor of the State in 1858, by a letter on file in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, notified the Commissioner of the General Land Office that there was no disposal by the Legislature of the State of this land to any railroad company, and that the reservation which had been made, upon the assumption that there had been or would be such a disposal, had never become effective or valid because of such failure of legislation upon the subject, and therefore that he could not accept as final or authoritative any selection of the lands.

Mr. MITCHELL. You claim, then, that the State never parted with the title; that it never transferred the title to any company in Florida?

Mr. CALL. It never did. I will show the Senator, if he will look at this map. [Exhibiting.] This grant embraced two lines, one from Jacksonville, on the St. John's, to Pensacola and the waters of Escambia Bay; the other from Fernandina to Tampa Bay, with an extension to Cedar Keys. There was a reservation made of the land from Fernandina to Cedar Keys and from Jacksonville to a point on the waters of Escambia Bay. The road was built within the time from Fernandina to Cedar Keys, but there never was a reservation made from Waldo to Tampa Bay until 1881, when Secretary Schurz, without any authority of the State Legislature, made such a reservation. In 1881 there was a new charter given as to the line from Chattahoochee to Pensacola, the old charter having been repealed in express terms as to the companies on both lines as to the uncompleted part of the line, and new companies created; and there was a charter given to a new company who projected another and a different line of road from Chattahoochee to Pensacola, Fla. This was in 1869–'70.

The companies authorized to build the road from Chattahoochee to Pensacola in 1869–'70, on one line, and from Waldo to Tampa on the other, both failed to build either line, and the charter of the I. P. & M. R. R. Company from Chattahoochee to Pensacola expired and was repealed; and in 1881, fifteen years after the grant expired, the State granted a charter to a new company and gave to it about 23,600 acres to the mile of the swamp and overflowed lands, and also gave to it whatever rights they had in the grant of 1856, so far as it lies along that line of road.

Mr. MITCHELL. Who gave the charter?

Mr. CALL. The State of Florida; and they said in the act as "to so much of this land as lay along their line of road whatever rights the State may have in this reservation we give under this act," or words to this effect.

Mr. MITCHELL. I shall not trouble the Senator with any further explanation, but what I wish to know is this: He has stated that the grant was originally made by Congress to the State with a proviso that the State should transfer it to some company or companies. He has stated further that his understanding is that the State never made any such transfer. Is it not a fact that this company or these two companies actually went on and built portions of these roads, claiming the grant?

Mr. CALL. No; that is not a proper statement. It is a fact that the Pensacola and Georgia Railroad Company under the authority of the internal-improvement act authorizing them to build any portions of that line, either the whole or a part, did construct before 1860 a line of road to the town of Quincy, near the Chattahoochee River. It is true that after the war the Legislature of Florida repealed that act, that they created a different system entirely and disposed of the swamp and overflowed lands which were to be the foundation of the fund for the construction of that road to other purposes. They never did therefore build any portion of that road, and the original companies are extinct to-day, without succession or privity to or with any other corporation.

Mr. MITCHELL. But is it not the fact that a company or companies built portions of those roads claiming this land, and do they not to-day claim the land that is proposed to be forfeited by this bill?

Mr. CALL. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Very well.

Mr. CALL. It is true another company has been chartered since that time and within a few years past, that has no connection whatever with the company which built the original portions of the line, having its origin within six or eight years past, long after this grant became extinct; but it is untrue that these companies have for the greater portion of this grant, except the part which I have indicated, any authority whatever from the Legislature of the State.

Mr. MITCHELL. That may all be, but now I wish to ask another question. Assuming for the sake of the argument that the title to these lands is in the company and not in the State, what I want to know, then, is whether or not this amendment would protect settlers who are located by the line of the road now completed.

Mr. CALL. Certainly; it would protect nobody if the title is in the company. If the title is in the company the amendment will not protect the settler.

Mr. MITCHELL. Why?

Mr. CALL. Because no act we can pass will divest the title that is already vested in a railroad company.

Mr. MITCHELL. I entirely agree to that proposition; but does not this amendment propose to do that very thing? That is the point I want to get at.

Mr. CALL. This amendment proposes to say that the settler upon this grant, there being no legislative disposal of it if that be a fact, there never having been a location of the line of road within the time required for completing the whole line, this amendment declares what the Supreme Court and every other court have repeatedly declared, that if during the life-time of the grant there has been no legislative disposal by the State of Florida of it and no road either located or built under it, then the settler shall have his rights protected, and the grant has never taken effect, and therefore the land has always been a part of the public domain, because an illegal executive act reserving public lands can confer no right on any one.

Mr. MITCHELL. I entirely agree with the Senator from Florida. If he is correct in his proposition to the effect that no legislative disposal has ever been made of this grant by the Legislature of the State of Florida, then this amendment is entirely proper, and comes within the authority of Congress as repeatedly declared by the Supreme Court of the United States; but if, on the other hand, the Senator from Florida is wrong in assuming that no legislative disposal of the grant has ever been made——

Mr. CALL. In the life-time of the grant.

Mr. MITCHELL. In the life-time of the grant, and that there has been a legislative disposal of the title so that it is vested in a railroad company, then I say this amendment is entirely beyond and without the principle declared by the Supreme Court.

Mr. CALL. Undoubtedly that is true, but we legislate on facts, and I have brought here half a dozen times the statutes of the State of Florida and read them to the Senate, and I have read from the message of the governor of the State in 1858, and from the resolutions and acts of the Legislature of the State, showing the fact that there was not then, and has not been since, until 1881, and then only for a small portion of this line, when there was this vague and indefinite declaration of the Legislature, which, after granting 23,600 acres to the mile of swamp and overflowed land to the railroad company to be selected anywhere in the State, they provided that whatever rights the State may have, if it has any, in the grant from Chattaboochee to Pensacola should be granted to the company.

Now, it is clear that the reservation made in 1856 on the verbal request of Mr. Yulee, the Senator, not being then nor afterwards authorized by the Legislature, and the road never having been built, the only right the State could have, even if the granting act of 1856 by the United States was still alive, was to select them in 1881 along the line of the road then for the first time authorized and located under authority of the Legislature.

Mr. MITCHELL. The point I wish to make is this: I think in view of the rule well settled now by the courts as to the want of power in Congress to declare forfeiture of any portion of a grant in præsenti that is adjacent to a road that has been completed, it would be a very great injustice to settlers for Congress to undertake to legislate upon that subject or to attempt to protect them. It would lead to "confusion worse confounded," and that is the very point I wish to get at, whether this amendment proposes to do that thing or not. Of course if the fact is as stated by the Senator from Florida, that there has been no legislative disposal of this grant, then the amendment is all right. Otherwise I think it is all wrong.

Mr. CALL. Now, Mr. President, the Senator and I differ as wide as the heaven from the earth in regard to the law and what the courts have decided. I understand that no supreme court has ever decided that there was no power in Congress to forfeit lands where the road was not constructed within the time required by the granting act. And I affirm furthermore, without undertaking to go into that discussion, that the proposition is untenable, without a shadow of reason, and can not be sustained in argument.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am utterly amazed at the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. Now wait a moment. I do not care to discuss that question with the Senator here. That has been discussed before. I only wanted to emphasize my dissent to his proposition. This matter of in præsenti grants, according to the decision of the Supreme Court, in my opinion, has no kind of justification, and some day in some other case will be reversed by the same court otherwise constituted. But be that as it may, the question presented here is whether or not a settler upon the public lands in the State of Florida, upon a reservation made without the authority of law, made upon the verbal request of a Senator of this body, so notified to the Department by the governor of the State, the location not approved by the State, and not made under any authority of the Legislature of the State, of a railroad company whose charter has been repealed, and which was never built and has no successor—whether or not that settler upon the public domain should be protected in his rights.

The Senator says he agrees to that, but if I am mistaken in my facts then there would be an invitation to the settler to occupy and improve land the title to which might be taken away by a court. What objection is that to his protection?

If the law has vested the title the railroad company will be sure enough to take advantage of it. If the law has not vested the title then the settler will have the protection of the courts. So this bill giving this right is simply a direction to the Interior Department, which has always leaned against the settlers and in favor of the corporations of this country, and when the settlers, the citizens, are poor and unable to litigate in the courts, and are dependent upon that Department alone for protection, it is an effectual denial of the rights of the settler not to legislate in his favor here. That is all I ask, I ask to give a direction and a status of right which will require the officers of the Interior Department to protect the settler upon that void reservation, made illegally upon the request of a Senator here and so declared officially in the records of the public land department.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to inquire who that Senator was.

Mr. CALL. Mr. Yulee, of Florida.

Mr. MITCHELL. Who was the Secretary of the Interior, or Commissioner of the General Land Office?

Mr. CALL. I forget, now; but I think Mr. Hendricks, and afterwards Mr. Wilson.

Mr. MITCHELL. What date was it?

Mr. CALL. In 1856. I have read it here. If I had my speeches here I could show it. I have the printed letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office—I believe it was in 1856 or 1857—declaring in express words that this reservation was made upon the request of Mr. Yulee, and upon his statement that there had been or soon would be some legislation which would authorize the construction of that line of road.

Mr. MITCHELL. I know nothing about the facts myself; but if the Senator is not correct, then I undertake to say that this amendment is simply holding out to the settlers on land adjacent to the completed road a false hope, and the effect of it will be to involve them in litigation that they otherwise might avoid.

Mr. CALL. They are upon these lands. They have their homes there; they have their improvements there; and these are the facts as presented to Congress. All that we can do is to give them the protection of the law and the benefit of the exercise of such power as we have. It is no objection to the proposition that it may be the courts may place some other and different construction of the law upon a different state of facts than those presented here.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator from Florida allow me to ask a question?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. DOLPH. I understand that the amendment proposed by the Senator has been modified by striking out all after the words "preemption laws," in line 6. Now, I state frankly to the Senator that I do not understand this amendment as it stands. It reads:

That all actual settlers on any of the public lands in the State of Florida—

I understand that where a grant has been made to a railroad company and no act of forfeiture has been had it is no longer a part of the public domain, and therefore settlers within the limits of the grant, either on the earned lands or the unearned lands, to use that term to distinguish lands situated adjacent to completed road and those which are adjacent to uncompleted line of the road, would not be (if that is the correct position) upon the public lands.

The next clause is—affected by the grants.

That is, you say "public lands in the State of Florida affected by the grants." Suppose that the land within the limits of the grant to a railroad company or to a State for the purposes of aiding in the construction of a railroad is public land and part of the public domain, what "grant" does the Senator mean? Has he made it plain so that the Secretary of the Interior and the courts will understand what grant is meant by "the grants?"

Then there follows:

who made actual settlement on any of the said lands.

If they were not public lands, if persons went on them without the authority of the Interior Department or of law and squatted upon the lands, are they settlers within the meaning that has come to be attached to that term under the land laws of the United States, or are they mere squatters, persons upon the land without authority? What does the term "said lands" refer to? Does it refer to the lands which are forfeited by the first section of this act? That seems to me to be the only thing to which it can relate.

I call the attention of the Senator to these suggestions in regard to his amendment. I do not understand in the first place what "the grants" means or "said lands" or "said road," because there is no road specified, there is no grant specified, there are no lands specified in the bill to which these words can relate unless the land forfeited by the first section of the bill.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I think that is all very plain. I do not think the amendment needs further amendment. I did first propose to include the words "the grants hereinbefore referred to." Here is one of these grants referred to in the language of the bill in the State of Florida:

All lands heretofore granted to any State or to any corporation to aid in the construction of a railroad.

In the State of Florida, the grant of 1856 to the States of Alabama and Florida will be shown by the laws to be the only grants affected by this act, because it is the only grant ever made to the State for that purpose. Therefore that is a sufficient description.

Now, the meaning of the term "said lands" used in that section of the amendment is plain. Of course "grant" and "lands" are the subjects respecting which the legislation is had; they convey the same idea; and we have very little difficulty in ascertaining what lands are referred to, the word "grants" having been used and the phrase "grants of lands," and the original bill referring in express terms to "all lands heretofore granted to any State." So I think there will be no difficulty in regard to that.

Now I will answer the Senator's suggestion in regard to what is meant by "settler." I mean, and I think the courts will sustain that construction, and if they do not (inasmuch as any act which we pass is subject to their construction) they will limit it according to the Senator's idea, to the term "actual settler" as used and recognized in the Department of Public Lands. Certainly the anomaly of our Government is that in any case of individual right before one man, termed a judge or a court, all the people of the United States and their Congress and executive department may enact and construe a law to mean one plain and clear thing, and the one man, the judge or court, may say it means another, and for that case his decision makes it so.

That is judicial power, and relates to this and to all our acts so far as individual rights or cases are concerned.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator will understand that there might be within that definition a settler on these railroad lands, because there was a time, as I understand, when as to some of these lands the Department held that they were subject to settlement, and persons went on and filed their certifications and made their settlements and complied with the law as far as they could at the time.

Mr. CALL. That may be so or it may not; but what I mean by "settler" is a person who is in occupation of the public land and who makes application for homestead or right of entry thereon, and that is the condition of much of this land in the twenty-five years during which there was never a pretense of the construction of a railroad, during which the State had repealed the only charter and the only act under which it had ever given a right to any corporation to build a road and prohibited it from proceeding, during which the land was unclaimed by any corporation or by the State, the State having passed a joint resolution asking Congress to revive the grant upon the condition that the company which had been authorized to build the road before the war should never have the benefit of any portion of it.

During the time in which Secretary Chandler decided wisely and with entire conformity to law that these grants had expired and the lands had become public domain, the people settled upon them, and have grown families of children upon them, and have their homes there. If this reservation made against the protest of the governor of the State on record in the Department, upon the verbal request of a Senator, stating that legislation would be had that was never had, no railroad built, no foot of a road built, no charter to any railroad company to build—all charters having been repealed up to 1881, and none now existing as to the larger part of the grant to any, yet it has stood there in the Land Department menacing the homes of these people, and many of them have been sold out, having no power to litigate this question in suits brought upon the pretended claim of a railroad company, chartered twenty-five years after the time of the passage of the act and seventeen years after the grant had expired. The homes of these people have been taken from them.

Now we only ask that this amendment be put in this bill in order that the actual settlers living upon these lands who have grown up their families there and sought to be allowed to enter their homes, who were invited to go there by the decision of Secretary Chandler, shall have the benefit of this remedial law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Florida as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. I offer an amendment.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to offer an amendment now, as I am obliged to leave the Senate?

Mr. SPOONER. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin withholds his amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I offer the following amendment:

Provided further, That this act shall not be considered to impair any rights, legal or equitable, now vested in any person or corporation to any of the lands herein forfeited.

Mr. BERRY. It seems to me that the object of the bill is to forfeit the title of railroad corporations to these lands, and yet the amendment says that it shall not affect the title of any corporation, either legal or equitable. The whole purpose of this bill is to forfeit these lands and restore them to the public domain. I suppose the Senator's object is to say that it shall not affect the title of a different corporation, a certain canal company that claims equitable rights in certain lands in Michigan.

Mr. DAWES. That is the object of it.

Mr. BERRY. That word "equitable" ought not to be inserted in the amendment. Whether or not the canal company has an equitable right is a question that perhaps the courts ought to pass on and will pass on. The point is whether the canal company has an equity which the courts would recognize. But the Senator from Massachusetts is seeking to establish an equity that can not be established in the courts of the country and to have Congress declare an equity which those who favored the amendment offered by the other Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] sought to establish the other day. This is seeking to do indirectly that which that amendment sought to do directly, and it was laid upon the table.

I think the amendment ought not to be adopted. If these persons have legal rights which they can assert in the courts, it is not necessary to put in a clause granting this right, because the law will take care of them, and if the Senator is seeking to give that canal company some kind of Congressional equity which does not exist in law, then I insist that the amendment ought not to be adopted after we have laid the amendment of his colleague on the table.

Mr. DAWES. If the purpose of the Senator from Arkansas is, when he knows that there is a technical defect in the title held by this canal company for which it paid a valuable consideration, to intervene for the benefit of an organization that put squatters upon its lands, telling them when they were put there that they knew the lands were not open to settlement, but when the time for forfeiture came they would be on the road to make good their claims from that date—if that is the purpose of the Senator from Arkansas, then it is proper to lay this amendment upon the table. If, however, the Senator from Arkansas desires to protect innocent purchasers for a valuable consideration of lands as to the title to which there is a technical defect simply because the title is in a railroad corporation who have not earned it, then he should be willing that the technical defect should be cured in a court that would recognize legal and equitable considerations. That is the whole of it.

Now, it is apparent that there is in this city an organization that has planned for this very hour, that has put upon this land men to whom it has said in its letters of instruction, "We know that you can not make a legal entry now because the legal title is in a railroad corporation, but whenever the lands are forfeited, you, knowing you were not there as honest settlers, will be there ready to perfect your claim." This canal corporation obtained this land through the State of Michigan, supposing, and everybody supposing, that the title was perfect, but finding but now by a subsequent decision of the Supreme Court that it has a legal and technical defect, if the Senator wants to forfeit that title and give it to these men, then he will lay this amendment on the table.

Mr. BERRY. I would say to the Senator from Massachusetts that the purpose of the Senator from Arkansas is to prevent the canal company from getting twenty-five or forty million dollars' worth of land for a canal which was never built; one that was a fraud, as shown by the testimony taken; one that selected this land in defiance of the laws of the United States—a company that never completed its contract. My purpose is to prevent a confirmation to that canal company of lands to which they have no title, and to prevent a confirmation which will deprive settlers who went there in good faith of their pre-emption and homestead claims.

There is nothing, however, in this bill that says these settlers shall have any preference whatever. The bill simply leaves them to their rights in the courts of the country, and if the canal company has superior rights in the courts under the bill the canal company is protected. But if the courts say, as the Secretary of the Interior has said, that the rights of the settlers who have homes there, who have raised families there, are superior, I do not wish by an act of Congress to take these people's homes from them and turn them and their children out, and give the land to this company for a canal that was never constructed, and that a committee of the House of Representatives before which the testimony was taken said was fraud, that it was not only a fraud in the construction of the canal, but a fraud in the selection of the lands, selected directly in the face of the law.

I hold that the bill as it comes from the committee does not protect the homestead settlers or any others unless they are protected under the laws of the land. If the canal company seek to assert its rights before the courts, and if the homestead and pre-emption settlers have no rights, then they will gain on showing their own right. If the canal company has the better right the courts will so hold. The bill does not give them a preference in any way whatever. But it is the Senator from Massachusetts who seeks by legislation to do what we know the laws of the land do not do—give this canal company lands to which they are not entitled, lands selected in fraud of the law, lands selected outside of the grant, and lands selected, I repeat, for a canal that is worthless as declared by the House of Representatives, and that the State of Michigan is trying to get the United States to take off its hands.

These lands are of immense value which it is proposed to give to them by legislation which they are not entitled to under the law. If they have equitable rights, I apprehend when they assert those rights in the courts of the country, the courts will say that as this thing was conceived in fraud, you can not come here and have this confirmation because you must come in with clean hands. If the courts do not say that, if they say they have legal rights, then so be it, and these settlers will have to give way.

In regard to what the Senator has said about there being men in this city hiring men to go there and settle, I know nothing of it; but I know the law to be that if men went there under a contract agreeing that any person should take a part of the homestead, the law of the land is that they can obtain no title whatever; they can not get confirmation. They would gain no benefit by it, because the law absolutely prohibits all such arrangements. That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I do not know what will be the effect of the pending amendment; but if it is considered as giving any advantage to the canal company to which reference has been made, it surely ought not to pass.

The appeal to the Senate is for consideration for that canal company which got these lands not alone in contravention of law, but in direct defiance of law and by nefarious methods. They had an honest man removed from the place of receiver at Marquette that they might procure these very illegal entries, as appeared in a report of a House committee which was read here the other day. The whole course of this canal company in the first selections of the lands which were illegal, in the wrecking of the original company by a conspiracy which was nefarious in itself, has been attended with fraud from the beginning to the end; and now they come in a pathetic manner before the United States Senate and ask that a technical defect be remedied. It was a defiance of the law in the first place, and it was a conspiracy to get these lands. I have a map here, and I can go over it again to-day as I did the last time the subject was up, and if called upon I will show the course of the canal company after the successors came into possession of the land, how they wrecked the original company. It is beneath the attention of the United States Senate to extend them any relief. Let them have their legal rights; but do not put anything into any of the amendments that will give them an advantage before the courts.

I do not believe that the Senators from Massachusetts have read the different reports in regard to this Portage Canal Company. If they have they must see that it has been attended with irregularity, if not fraud, from the beginning to the end.

If this is going to continue, and I imagine from the look of things that it is going to be the salient point of the discussion and probably will take up the time of the Senate all day, I shall send up some reports to be read which it seems to me will extinguish any claim in equity, right, or decency of the canal company to the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Let them be read. I should like to hear them.

Mr. PALMER. The Senator from Massachusetts says he would like to hear them read. If it would not bore the Senate, it would give me great pleasure. I dislike to trespass on their time. Will the Secretary read?

Mr. DAWES. Let me reply first.

Mr. PALMER. I yield before calling for the reading.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] says that if the canal company have a legal title to this land they can go into the courts and assert it. The Senator knows that if they had a perfect title to this land they would not be talking here, nor would anybody be representing them here. He has heard it stated over and over again just what the technical defect in their title is; and he knows (because he is a good lawyer) that the effect of this bill is to forfeit to-day their right and everybody else's right. The rights of the men who are on the land, whom he calls honest settlers, are forfeited to-day, whatever they are, and so is the right of the canal company.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him? The honest settlers do not consider their rights jeopardized at all by this forfeiture unless amendments are injected into this bill. They ask for no legislation.

Mr. DAWES. I understand that the settler who went there upon his contract with an attorney does not feel that he has the slightest trouble, and why? That is what I want to ask the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Michigan, why is he perfectly satisfied to have the canal company and himself cut off and this land forfeited to the United States? The Senator from Michigan lives in a Western country and knows just what is the condition of things there, that the man starts de novo as a settler. The canal company has no place, for whatever right, legal or equitable, it has has been forfeited to the public domain.

Mr. PALMER. Let me interrupt the Senator to ask him to explain how the canal company's rights are forfeited by this bill. Have they sailed along under the shelter of the grant to the Ontonagon and Brulé Company for the last thirty years? Have they sought to have that grant forfeited without any amendment asserting their own rights?

Mr. DAWES. Why, Mr. President, I suppose it is all my fault that I am unable to make the Senator see that the language of the bill is that every acre of the odd sections opposite unearned land grants is forfeited to the United States and made a part of the public domain as of to-day. Now, these 15,000 acres are of that kind, and therefore they will be forfeited as of to-day to the public domain if this bill passes, notwithstanding his own State conveyed them to this corporation and this corporation took its money and built this canal, because the technical title is in the railroad company and an act of Congress is necessary to take it out of the railroad company. Therefore the grant of Michigan to the canal corporation does not take effect.

Now, does not the Senator see what becomes of all claim of the canal corporation to these lands? And the same is true of any man who is on them. But he has this difference: The moment it is public domain he becomes a settler on the land from that day; no matter how he got in there, no matter how he came there, he is there to-day a settler, and that is his advantage. That is why the Senator comes in with amendment after amendment, which if they were drawn by these attorneys down here on the Avenue for the very purpose could not have been drawn in any different language from that which is embodied in the amendment of the Senator.

Now, I wish the Senator from Arkansas——

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. I believe I have the floor, however.

Mr. DAWES. No, I have the floor.

Mr. PALMER. I yielded to the Senator from Massachusetts, as I think the record will show.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator has the floor——

Mr. PALMER. I was going to say that the Senator from Michigan has no amendment to offer and would prefer to have this bill go through pure and undefiled; but when able lawyers, men whose lives have been passed in legislation, keep injecting amendment after amendment, when foiled at one point embody the ideas that they have been foiled in upon other amendments and keep shoving them in, it is time that the Senator from Michigan, who is a plain, blunt man, should have some one back of him that will tell him the force of legal language. It is David not only against Goliah but a whole host——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator has compared himself to David very much. He will remember that David was a victorious chieftain; I never heard that Goliah was, and I do not think he need be very much afraid.

Mr. PALMER. I hope that will be the result.

Mr. HOAR. I merely wish to correct one misapprehension of my honorable friend. He says some Senators here have been foiled in their amendments and have redrawn them and offered other amendments of the same sort. If that applies to any one, if the Senator has it in his mind as applying to anybody, it applies to me. I offered an amendment the other day and I was notified that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] had an amendment which contained my amendment and something else which he wanted inserted, a modification which he was going to offer. Thereupon there was a vote taken on my amendment and a few said "ay" and a few "no," and I did not even call for a division, supposing that the next thing that was to come up at that time was my amendment modified by the Senator from Wisconsin; and so I allowed my amendment to be declared voted down.

I had something more that I intended to say, but I thought I would let that go, so that the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin should be before the Senate. It turned out when I came to examine the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin that it did not contain mine. It contained merely his own provision, without mine. I never should have allowed that vote to pass without calling for a division or calling for the yeas and nays, and without having a further explanation. My amendment, if it was voted down, was voted down under these circumstances alone.

Mr. PALMER. I am not trying to cast discredit on either of the Senators from Massachusetts. They are fighting valiantly for what they believe to be the right. I believe them to be wrong. It is a question of ethics on which wise and great men may differ.

I do not think that I said that that was the state of the case, that Senators were coming in with amendment after amendment when foiled on previous amendments. I said that when that was the case it was time for a plain, blunt man to have lawyers to advise him.

I stand here for the homesteaders of the State of Michigan. This canal company never should have the land inside of these railroad limits confirmed. There is no doubt about that. Those lands were gotten in direct defiance of the law and by strategy, by getting one receiver removed and a pliant tool put in his place; and I think it is beneath the dignity of the Senate to have anything to do with confirming that grant, and that they should be relegated to the courts for any relief they may ask.

I will say further, that I was inclined to accede to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, but if it is going to be construed as giving a hold to the canal company by which they can further their schemes, I must oppose it. It all depends upon the construction of that word "equitable."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHACE in the chair). The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES].

Mr. DAWES. I understand the amendment to mean just what I understood the Senator to consent to early in the discussion. I stated publicly that if gentlemen would leave these 15,000 acres of land not affected at all by this forfeiture to be settled in the courts between the canal company and anybody else who set up claims thereto without forfeiting the land into the public domain, we should be perfectly content; and that is the whole purpose of this amendment. If the Senator prefers to put it in that language I will accept that language. I desire simply that this forfeiture shall not have the effect to make a new title of public domain to-day applicable to these 15,000 acres.

Mr. PALMER. I think that is eminently fair. I do not wish to take away from the canal company a single right they have, but I do not wish them to get any new right by legislation.

Mr. DAWES. I do not intend by this amendment to give them any new title. I merely try to let them maintain in court such title as they have got as against anybody else.

Mr. PALMER. It all turns upon the construction of that word "equitable."

Mr. DAWES. Is the Senator afraid of the equitable consideration of the equitable title?

Mr. PALMER. I am afraid of phraseology.

Mr. DAWES. I want to reply to what the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] has said about the fraud in this matter. The Senator says there was fraud in the selection. The Department says there was no fraud in the selection, and I will read what the Department says on that point. The Senator says there was fraud in the selection first because they selected lands not nearest the canal. I refer him to the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, from which the Senator from Michigan read, of date June 9, 1886, in which it is said:

> The grant of 1866, although additional to that of 1865, was not made subject to the conditions and limitations of the act of 1865, nor is there anything in the latter grant indicating any intention on the part of Congress to make it subject to such conditions and limitations. The conditions and limitations upon which each was made are plainly set forth in the respective granting acts, and differ in several essential particulars. The act of 1865 provided that the lands granted thereby should be selected from lands subject to private entry nearest the location of the canal; the grant of 1866 was of lands to which the right of homestead or pre-emption had not attached.
> The act of 1866 should, therefore, be construed as though it stood alone, without reference to the act of 1865. In this view of the case it follows that selections under said act were not restricted to the lands nearest the location of the canal, nor to lands subject to private entry.

The other charge of fraud made by the Senator from Arkansas is that they selected mineral lands. That was decided the other way by the Secretary of the Interior in a letter of June 6, 1863, in which he decided that these very lands were not the mineral lands that were excluded and that the company had a right to take them. I refer him to that decision. Now he says that they never built any canal. He has never been there and I have never been there. The act required that the governor of the State of Michigan should determine when the canal was completed. I read the other day the determination of the governor of Michigan that it was completed.

If there has been any other fraud the Senator has not suggested it that I know of. If he has, I have omitted to hear it. He says that he wants to forfeit all rights that this canal company have so that they shall not come into court at all. The Senator shakes his head. Then he does not want this bill. If there is anything plainer in the world than the words of this bill and their legal effect, I do not know what it is. The Scripture can not be made plainer than these words——

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator allow me one moment?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. The bill does not propose to forfeit lands granted to the canal company. The bill proposes to forfeit lands granted to railroad companies throughout the United States, what are commonly called the unearned lands, lands opposite that portion of the roads yet uncompleted. That is the object and purpose of the bill, and it is a worthy object.

Mr. DAWES. Then I am for it.

Mr. BERRY. This bill forfeits 15,000 acres of that land, the title to which was supposed to be in the Ontonagon and Brulé Railroad Company. Under the decision in Schulenberg vs. Harriman it is necessary for Congress to pass an act of forfeiture in order to divest the railroad company of that land. This bill does that. The canal company come and say they have some sort of title. This bill does not propose to forfeit that title, but unfortunately for the canal company they have no title, and it is proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts now to give them a title to these 15,000 acres, whereas the bill if it passes as it is will divest the railroad company of the lands, and then if the canal company have any legal right to them it does not affect it in any way whatever. If the homestead or pre-emption claimants have legal rights it does not affect them in any way whatever, but leaves them to settle those rights between themselves in the courts. The homestead settlers are seeking no advantage by legislation here to-day. They ask that the railroad company be divested of this title, and that the courts of the country may determine whether or not they have any title or whether the canal company has.

Now, in regard to the fraud. Under the second grant of 1866 I did not say they were required to select the lands nearest the canal. I said that it had been argued by able lawyers that such was the effect of it, because it must be construed with the previous act, which contained that restriction, and I said the original act required that they should so select lands; but they did select lands in fraud of that law, as the House report shows. That report shows that the canal was never constructed in the manner required by law.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask on what authority he makes that statement?

Mr. BERRY. I make it on the authority of a report made by Mr. Henley, of California, from the Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives in the last Congress.

Mr. HOAR. Now the Senator will allow me to make a statement, and I will give him my authority. The governor of Michigan, Hon. Henry P. Baldwin, lately a member of this Senate, as honorable a man as breathes on this continent, as many persons within the sound of my voice will testify, appointed an eminent engineer to report whether that canal was completed or not, and he reported that it was, and thereupon the successor of Mr. Baldwin, Governor Bagley, also an eminent and able man of high character, certified that it was completed; and the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE] has told me within five minutes that the canal was completed and was in constant use, and that he has been through it himself on the largest lake steamers a dozen times. I think that story ought to stop in the Senate.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. BERRY. One moment. I assert that here is a report made by a majority of the committee of the House of Representatives, which was made after thorough investigation. It was made after proof taken and after witness after witness was brought before that committee; and after long and mature deliberation that committee decided that the canal never was constructed according to the terms of the grant, that it had wholly failed to meet the conditions; and while I do not wish to impute any wrong to the governor of Michigan—I know nothing about him—I refer to the report of a majority of the committee of the House of Representatives acting under their sworn oaths after hearing the testimony of witnesses, including the same engineer, if I am not mistaken, of whom the Senator speaks—after his testimony was taken, and that of many others, the committee said it was not completed according to law. There is where I get my authority. I know nothing about it personally, but a majority of the Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives, who are supposed to be honorable and truthful men, acting under their oaths as members of Congress, after patient investigation so stated in their report; and it is on that authority that I assert it. If the Senator calls it a story I give him the authority on which that story originated.

Mr. HOAR. The minority of the committee decided otherwise.

Mr. BERRY. Yes, sir; but I rely on the majority report. There was a minority report also.

Mr. PLUMB. This debate threatens to go on indefinitely. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand the remark of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator will not do that.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not want it debated all day.

Mr. HOAR. There is no stopping the debate. The amendment may be offered again.

Mr. PLUMB. That is true, but this question has been discussed backwards and forwards, and having charge of the bill I feel some responsibility in the matter, and I wish to bring it to an issue as soon as I can. My idea was that we might get a vote on the proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] be laid on the table.

Mr. HOAR. I ask to have the motion withdrawn for a moment.

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw it.

Mr. HOAR. I have drawn an amendment which I have submitted to the Senator from Michigan, and which he prefers a little to the one which is proposed by my colleague, and it seems to me that it will answer what I understand to be the professed desire of both sides to this controversy.

As I understand the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands and the gentlemen who have discussed this question, they say that what they want to do by this bill is to make a general declaration of forfeiture of all unearned railroad grants, and that they do not want to go at this time into the question whether this, that, or the other railroad or person claiming under this, that, or the other railroad has got an equity which we ought to respect, but to let all such parties come to Congress hereafter if they require legislation, or let them go to the courts and present their case if they have a good legal title now, one which the courts may enforce.

That being the purpose, it seems to me—and I have submitted it to my colleague and others—that this bill as it is framed goes further than that, and that when these grantees come to Congress hereafter they will be met with the answer, "Why, Congress had that all up before them when this forfeiture bill was passed, and they determined that they would not make you an exception to any general forfeiture. Your question has been settled, and we will not reopen it." I suppose the honorable Senator from Kansas would agree that that would not be a fair result from this legislation to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts will suspend. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the regular order.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to complete this statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay the regular order before the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOAR. Now, if I may be permitted by unanimous consent to complete my statement——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there unanimous consent to the Senator from Massachusetts proceeding? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HOAR. To this amendment to the land bill the Senator from Michigan expresses his assent, and I desire to read it to the Senator from Kansas, and if I can get the assent of the Senator from Kansas it will save all trouble. It is in reference to this single canal company:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to prejudice any right of the Portage Lake Canal Company or any person claiming under them who applies hereafter to the courts or to Congress for any legal or equitable relief to which they may be now entitled.

I can not see that I give any human being an advantage.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator from Michigan is willing to agree to that, I shall not stand in the way myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is Senate bill 2083.

Mr. PLUMB. I want to say about this whole business, if I can have a moment, that this railroad forfeiture bill remained on the Calendar unacted on for a long time because of the fact that the Senators from Michigan desired to have some amendments made which would meet the situation in that State as they respectively understood it. In the hope that they would be able to agree on something which would meet with concurrence on the part of the Senate, and thus dispose of what has always been an active and acrimonious controversy, I did not ask the Senate to consider this bill as early as I otherwise should. The debate has now gone on substantially upon this proposition for days. I shall not as far as I am concerned agree to any further extension of it, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may come up to-morrow immediately on the conclusion of the morning business, and I will make every effort as far as I am concerned to reach a final vote before 2 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Did the Chair understand the Senator from Kansas to ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered to-morrow at 2 o'clock notwithstanding the regular order?

Mr. PLUMB. No; at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks——

Mr. HOAR. Is there anything else? Suppose this amendment should be adopted now, can not the bill be disposed of at once?

Mr. BERRY. I object to passing the amendment until we can examine it by to-morrow morning.

Mr. HOAR. Let the amendment be printed.

Mr. DAWES. I accept the modification of my amendment suggested by my colleague.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the other amendment is withdrawn and this substituted for it.

Mr. HOAR. I move that as an amendment, and ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection that will be done, and the new amendment proposed will be printed. Is there objection to the proposition of the Senator from Kansas that the Senate bill 1430 come up to-morrow morning at the conclusion of the morning business? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

WHARF AT FORTRESS MONROE.

Mr. PADDOCK. I call now for the regular order for the purpose of submitting some remarks on the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is Senate bill 2083, which is the unfinished business.

Mr. DANIEL. I desire to have a bill considered.

Mr. PADDOCK. I will yield to the Senator if it requires no time.

Mr. DANIEL. It will require no time. I ask unanimous consent to call up Order of Business 1155, being the bill (S. 2624) to provide for the enlargement of the dimensions of the wharf at Fortress Monroe. I would not ask this of the Senate but for the fact that there are public considerations why the bill should be acted upon immediately if at all. There is a wooden structure in process of erection, and the proposed change in it has been recommended by the War Department and by a report of the Committee on Commerce. I see the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] is in his seat, who is quite familiar with the details of this matter, and I should be very glad if he would supplement my remarks by making a statement.

Mr. FRYE. Probably there will be no objection made to the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia asks for the consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2624) to provide for the enlargement of the dimensions of the wharf at Fortress Monroe.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. CULLOM. I am instructed by the Committee on Interstate Commerce to report back several bills, being Senate bills Nos. 613, 291, 362, and 363, and to submit a substitute for them all in the shape of a new bill. I ask that the amendments to the original act which are made in this substitute bill be printed, so that they may be shown to be amendments to the law.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to my colleague on the committee that instead of encumbering his substitute with the original bill he should move to indefinitely postpone all of these bills and report an original bill, so that we shall have but the one bill to deal with.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to that. I presume it is the most regular way. I report the following bill from the committee.

The bill (S. 2851) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, was read twice by its title.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the other bills be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to, and the following bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 291) to amend the second and fourth sections of "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887;

A bill (S. 362) to be entitled "An act to amend the first section of the 'Act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887;"

A bill (S. 363) to amend the fourth section of the "Act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887; and

A bill (S. 613) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887.

Mr. CULLOM. I renew the suggestion that the new bill be printed, so that the amendments proposed to be made to the law as it now is shall be shown on the print.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the act be printed and the amendments printed with the act.

Mr. CULLOM. Let the section proposed to be amended be set out and then the amendments to that section here made. I want the amendments to be printed in italics so as to show the changes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be pursued if there be no objection.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. PALMER as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President, in the attempt to discuss some of the constitutional questions that naturally arise in the consideration of this subject in the presence of so many able lawyers I confess to no little embarrassment. The consciousness of my inferior learning in the law, and that the charge of presumption can be made good against me, coupled with the expectation that I shall be subjected to the criticism of "threshing over the old straw" of elementary principles in the hearing of those to whom they are as the alphabet, are not calculated to assure me. But, sir, this method seems to me to be necessary for the particular purpose I have in view, and the purpose itself being honest, I think I shall be cheerfully indulged by the Senate.

Of course, sir, there is no doubt nor question whatever that the National Government has absolute, undivided power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. All concede this. As to this great function of government the United States stand as a nation with a perfect, an indivisible autonomy. In the presence of this supreme authority State lines fade away and disappear. When the national arm is extended to strengthen, defend, "regulate" our commerce with foreign nations, it is the arm of the sovereign people, divided by no boundary lines of geographical or political subdivisions, but massed in all the majesty and strength of nationality. In the exercise of this great power the Federal Government may, when necessary to protect commercial intercourse, quarantine against ships from foreign ports at which a contagious disease is believed to have secured a foothold epidemically, and when there is a reasonable apprehension that such ships may be infected by the contagion thereof. It may, and it does, place restrictions on the importation of domestic animals that are believed to be afflicted with or to have been exposed to a contagious disease or to contagious disease-conditions.

It may prohibit altogether all commerce with a foreign nation which discriminates against ours in favor of that of another nation, or which may refuse to us fair, reasonable, and satisfactory regulations as to commercial exchanges—indeed it may do all things not inconsistent with international law "to promote the general welfare" by liberal or restrictive regulations for the protection and for the advancement of our interests through foreign commerce. But, sir, it will be remembered that the same clause of the same section and article of the Constitution which gives this supreme control over foreign commerce to the National Government, in exactly the same language gives exactly the same "power to regulate commerce among the several States and with the Indian tribes." If it is an exclusive power as to foreign commerce, "and with the Indian tribes," which latter, under the theory of the Constitution, have been treated as quasi nationalities, it is equally an undivided power as respects the exercise thereof in the regulation of "commerce among the several States." The very restrictions placed upon this power by Section 9 of Article I of the Constitution, that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State," and "no preference" given "to the ports of one State over another," and that "vessels bound to or from one State" shall not "be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another;" and the corresponding restraint placed upon the States by section 10 of the same article that no State shall "lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports" except for purposes of local inspection, and that all State laws, even as to this limited privilege, shall be under the revisory control of Congress, prove the absolutely exclusive national character of this power not only to regulate foreign, but internal commerce. The same control in the matter of these regulations and restrictions for the removal of impediments or obstructions in the way of the free course of foreign commerce exists as to the commerce among the several States, qualified only by the restraints thereupon before referred to.

The power of a State under the Constitution to quarantine as to a matter or thing which is clearly a subject of interstate commerce can only be exercised subject to the duty of Congress to regulate such commerce. The entirely independent exercise of this power under such circumstances by a State would be inconsonant with the national attribute respecting the regulation of commercial intercourse between the States with which the Constitution has clothed the National Government, and would be wholly inadmissible except with the sanction of Congress. Undoubtedly non-action by Congress would be such sanction. Quarantine is a potential instrumentality when employed as a health or police regulation by a State, and may become by its misuse most dangerous, most hurtful to the very interests for the protection of which it is invoked. When interjected by authority of a State into the general plan and policy of interstate commerce, as is sometimes done without due and proper public notice of the same to all the other States, it is liable to disturb commercial relationships between the States and derange the economic checks and balances that have grown into our commercial system through the sanctions of the Constitution. Verily, sir, this power can not be too prudently employed by a State nor too jealously guarded by the National Government. Great irritation between the States may occur from the careless exercise of this power locally on account of the suspicion that may be created that the State establishing the quarantine has a competitive interest to conserve through the practical embargo thus laid upon the commerce of other States. Recently one or more of the States of the farther West quarantined against the shipment to those States of cattle raised in certain Middle, Eastern, and Southern States under the apprehension that pleuro-pneumonia existed therein. One of the States thus prohibited from engaging in this kind of commerce was Virginia, from which had been exported formerly to the farms and ranges of the great trans-Missouri country many thorough-bred or high-grade animals for the improvement of the Western herds.

There was not at the time, nor had there ever been anywhere, either in the section of Virginia where the stock-farms are located upon which such animals are raised, nor upon the transportation routes over which they would be shipped, a single case, nor any exposure of any kind to the contagion of pleuro-pneumonia. Now it would be difficult, I think, to convince the men engaged in this industry—carrying on this commerce—that there was not a competitive interest in stock raising in that section whence the prohibition came which furnished the inspiration for such prohibition, and that it was not due, as alleged, to any apprehension of the spread of this disease through such commerce. I do not think this suspicion was well founded. The quarantine was undoubtedly the result of misinformation, which often reaches remote States as readily as correct information. But from whichever of these causes it resulted it shows the importance of the chief control of this subject being lodged with the National Government, which can be relied upon most surely to act in such a case without bias or prejudice for or against any particular State or section, and only upon carefully-collected information gathered from all parts of the country, from day to day, through official avenues always open to it. Under the powerful influence of great transportation companies, operating exclusively in one, or possibly in several contiguous States, such State or States, without sufficient cause, might quarantine against the commerce in domestic animals, or, indeed, in other or perhaps all of the products of other States, the real object being, through the interruption of intercourse thus secured, to specially advance the interests of the former, and the particular commercial centers or ports therein. Thus it might happen that the restraints placed by the Constitution upon the National Government to prevent "a preference for the ports of one State over another" might be removed by such State or States themselves, acting independently of the national authority, and in violation not only of the essential spirit but the plain provisions of the Constitution.

There was a unanimous consensus of opinion with the eminent men who framed the Constitution that commerce between the States should be under the exclusive control of the National Government. They were not afraid of encroachments by Congress upon the States in dealing with this subject. Mr. Madison said in the debate in the convention upon the plan of government proposed:

> Every one is impressed with the idea of a general regulation of trade and commerce.

Again he said, speaking of the proposed relations between the national and State governments:

> I apprehend the greatest danger is from the encroachment of the States on the National Government.

Mr. Wilson said:

> We have unanimously agreed to establish a general government—that the powers of peace, war, treaties, coinage, and the regulation of commerce ought to reside in that government.

In this enumeration of the great powers which were afterwards given to the National Government the word "commerce" is italicized in the report of the debate, indicating that Mr. Wilson considered the power to regulate commerce one of exceptional importance. These wise men foresaw, if this power to regulate commerce among the several States was not given absolutely to the National Government, that with the growth of the country, the increase of business, the multiplication of great commercial centers, and the preponderance in wealth, financial influence, natural resources, and advantages of some of the States over others the equilibrium so essential to the maintenance of the Union and the retention of its component parts in their proper spheres of subordination to the national authority would be impossible; that where the interests should become so diverse, the competition so great, the rivalries so formidable, if each State should have independent control, each striving to make its own regulations with the others, considering only its own special interests, it would be impossible to secure anything like uniformity of regulations, and a national government thus organized would speedily go to pieces.

But the Constitution could never have been framed upon such a theory. It could not have received a single vote in the convention if the great power over internal as well as foreign commerce had not been given by it without reservation or qualification to the National Government. It is a historical fact that one of the chief incentives for a stronger National Government was the universal embarrassment to commerce through the regulations thereof under the Confederation by the several States acting independently. Indeed, the difficulties, hardships, and irritations under this rule became finally so intolerable that a concerted movement by business men throughout the confederacy was inaugurated to secure relief from this oppressive system. Mr. President, I shall in no sense disparage or detract from the prescience of the great men who framed that immortal instrument when I say that, astute and far-seeing as they were, "they even builded better than they knew" in this as in many other respects.

The wise design of the fathers to secure uniformity of commercial regulations among the several States was very clearly set forth, after the experience of many years, in the opinion in Railroad Company vs. Richmond (19 Wall., 581), in which the court said:

> The power to regulate commerce among the several States was vested in Congress in order to secure equality and freedom in commercial intercourse against discriminating State legislation.

And, sir, whoever, under the apprehension of encroachments upon the rights of the States through the exercise of this power by the National Government in the manner best calculated to reach and regulate every incident, remove every menace, every impediment or obstruction from the path of interstate commerce, or who seeks to subtract from or limit such power to gratify State-rights sentimentalism, imperils the commercial prosperity and safety of all the States. Congress is the only safe repository of this power. If it errs at all it will be sure to err in the right direction, i. e., for the advancement and protection of the commerce of the whole country and the promotion of the general welfare of all the people. It will always be found safer and better to resolve whatever doubts may arise in favor of the most liberal and comprehensive regulations of commerce by the National Government rather than for such limited regulations as shall make it possible for the States, through the exercise of their police powers, to encroach upon the domain of the national authority over this subject.

And now, Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the importance of the great interest for the protection of which this bill is designed, with the view of making a practical application of the theory I entertain as to the power and duty of Congress over this whole subject.

The United States owns more live-stock than any nation of Europe, with the sole exception of Russia. Leaving the domains of the Czar out of the calculation, and excepting sheep, we exceed by five times the number of farm animals in all Europe. By the census of 1880 the United States was credited with 34,921,670 cows and other cattle; an increase of more than 13,000,000 over the number reported in 1870. According to the last estimates of the Department of Agriculture, a corresponding increase in this class of live-stock had taken place from 1880 to January, 1887. In the single State of Nebraska, by the State census of 1885, the value of live-stock had increased in five years from $33,440,265 to $83,776,720. To-day eight States and Territories west of the Mississippi River own more than one-third of all the cattle in the United States.

The aggregate value of live-stock in the whole country, according to the census of 1880, was $1,500,464,609. On January 1, 1887, this enormous amount had increased to the stupendous aggregate of $2,400,586,938, of which $1,041,000,000 are represented by cattle, including milch cows.

Mr. President, more than nine years ago I ventured, on behalf of the great State which I had the honor then, as I have now, to represent here in part, to call the attention of the Senate to the rapidly-developing need for national legislation upon the subject presented by the bill now under consideration. Time has more than verified the predictions then made as to the growth of this great interest, and the importance to the whole country of giving it stronger national protection than it has yet been able to secure. The figures I present to-day show that the increase of our flocks and herds during the past decade has been marvelous. The great ranching industry on the plains of the far West has been enormously developed, while the still larger industry of cattle feeding in small herds on the farms has been correspondingly stimulated. The demand for cheap meats has been met by new facilities for food production, and new processes and methods for the condensation of food products for shipment and distribution to the consumers, not only of this, but European countries. More and more each year the live-stock interest, particularly in the farther West, is becoming the essential feature of farm husbandry. The small herd is rapidly taking its place with the flock and drove as the most important wealth-producing factor in Western agriculture.

And here, Mr. President, if I may be permitted to further digress, is the explanation of the existence of a very large part of the farm mortgages in the trans-Mississippi River States of which we have heard so much lately from demagogues and others.

The increase in the number and aggregate amount of such mortgages is in no respect the result of unsuccessful agriculture, as has been charged, but quite the contrary. Tens of thousands of farmers in the States mentioned, who formerly depended upon the raising of cereals exclusively, have during the past ten years been acquiring herds and flocks. To make this change in their farm husbandry a great deal of money has been required, and some part of it has been borrowed. When you deduct the number of those who have purchased new farms, or who have enlarged their original farms by purchasing contiguous lands and have made moderate loans for that most proper and legitimate purpose, it will be found that a much larger sum than the remainder of the mortgages is represented by the value of the immensely increased number of cattle, horses, sheep, etc., that have been placed at great profit to the owners upon such farms. Through this diversification which has been for years and is still going on in the great agricultural States of the West the wealth of that country has been enormously increased, and farmers as a class are becoming more prosperous each year, while their farms have greatly increased in value. The capitalist has made in these cases the best loans to be found in the whole world, while the money thus borrowed has immensely increased the business, the wealth, and the general prosperity of those States, and indeed of the whole country.

The aggregate of these mortgages has been enormously overstated, while the properties upon which they have been placed have been correspondingly undervalued, both by the pessimists in politics who have sought through this attack upon Western securities to score a partisan advantage, and by the army of conscienceless speculators in watered stocks and other like securities in Wall street and elsewhere in the East, who are restless under this withdrawal of capital from their own kiting ventures for employment by the industrious and thrifty farmers of the West in the safest and most useful of all legitimate industries, the development and carrying on of agriculture in the chosen field of all the world. At another time, in the discussion of another subject, I shall have more to say about these misrepresentations.

Thus, Mr. President, the live-stock industry has come to be second only to all others combined in respect of its contributions to the staple food supplies of the people. It furnishes more than two-fifths of the internal commerce of the whole country. A large part of this commerce is carried on between the great inland grazing fields of the trans-Missouri States and Territories and the commercial centers in the Middle, Eastern, and Southern States, whence the products of this industry are distributed universally among the consumers of the whole country and of Europe as well. So that while the value of this commerce is enormous, with hundreds of millions of dollars invested in it, and hundreds of thousands of men employed in one way and another in carrying it on, it is even more important to the mass of the people because of the fact that upon it they largely depend for their supply of meats. Considering all these things, it would be almost impossible to estimate the magnitude of the calamity that would befall the country if this great industry should be destroyed.

It would not only bring ruin upon the multitude of men who have their money invested in the industry, or who labor in it for the support of their families, but it would greatly reduce the meat supply and thus make it impossible for the laboring classes, with their narrow incomes, on account of the increased cost resulting from the constantly increasing disproportion of supply to demand, to use meat, as at present, as an essential part of their daily food. In view of these important facts, will any one say that it is not the imperative duty of the National Government to foster, encourage, strengthen, and protect this industry and the enormous interstate commerce in the products thereof, by the use of all the powers intrusted to it by the Constitution? Indeed, it would be difficult to discover a better subject than this to operate upon for the promotion of "the general welfare."

It is well known that of all the contagious diseases to which cattle are subject there is none so terrible, so much dreaded, as pleuro-pneumonia. When it has once secured a firm lodgment among the herds occupying considerable areas of any country, no limit can be placed upon its ravages short of complete extermination—nothing can prevent its spread indefinitely except the slaughter or the perfect isolation of all animals affected and the entire destruction of every condition from which the disease can be communicated. Once well started the contagion will travel through a region devoted to cattle-raising almost with the rapidity of a prairie fire.

If, for instance, it should secure a firm footing in the herds of Central Illinois before the work of extirpation could be effectively commenced, the contagion might so spread as to envelop the whole country through which pass the transportation routes over which this enormous commerce from the farther West is borne to the great distributing centers of the East, virtually laying thereupon as complete an embargo as if such commerce should be absolutely prohibited by law. I can not accept for a moment the doctrine that if such a state of things should come to exist, and the State of Illinois, for instance, in the exercise of its general police powers, was powerless, from want of means or from other causes, or having the ability, should neglect to deal summarily and effectively with such an emergency, the National Government, with its unlimited jurisdiction over the whole subject of commerce, could not provide by Congressional enactment for the employment of its enormous forces to hunt out such contagion wherever it might be and destroy it in order to speedily secure the reinstatement of the commerce, thus destroyed or threatened with destruction. But more than this. The State or States in which such a situation should develop could not be called upon in the interest of interstate commerce alone to expend their money, to tax their resources, to employ their agencies to remove an obstruction thus interposed, unless they should themselves elect so to do. Besides, an intermediate State on the routes of such commerce might not have a special interest in its protection, or it might have a paramount interest in another direction competitive in its character that would be better conserved by the continuance of such obstructions to the commerce between other States passing through it, and therefore it might be indifferent as to these obstructions. Can it be possible that the National Government, which is charged specially with the duty not only to guard but to promote commerce between the States, could refuse under such circumstances, even without the assent of the State itself, to intervene? I think not, sir.

In my opinion, sir, the omission to do so would be a crime on the part of those charged with such responsibility under their oaths to support and defend the Constitution.

But, sir, it is contended by some that the powers reserved to the States to enact quarantine, health, inspection, and other similar laws carry with them exclusive control as to police regulations of all kinds and for all purposes whatsoever; that the national jurisdiction over this subject, if it exists at all, is secondary, subordinate, or auxiliary to State authority, and that the exercise of the same is permissible only when the State to be affected gives assent thereto. Abstractly considered this may be partly true, but in the concrete it is not true. The power to regulate commercial intercourse between the States belongs exclusively to the National Government by specific grant. It is a power to be exercised solely and independently by authority of Congress, not for the States as such, but for all the people of the United States standing together, and perfectly equal as to their rights, privileges, and immunities as citizens of one nationality in respect of all matters and things connected with such commerce and intercourse between the States. This power is not only specifically granted to the National Government for the benefit of the whole people, but it is with equal definiteness prohibited to the States. The inspection laws are distinctly subordinated to this larger grant of powers, and in order to emphasize this subordination more fully and forcefully it is provided that these very laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the Congress in order to make it certain that this exceptional authority may not be used in any manner or form to impede in the slightest degree the free course of commerce between the people in all sections of the Union, which the National Government is specially required to promote and preserve.

Undoubtedly, sir, there is a perfect and unbroken consensus of opinion running through all the debates in Congress and all the decisions by the courts since the adoption of the Constitution that the State may legislate primarily for the protection of the public morals, the public health, and the domestic welfare generally of society in the State, but I have been unable to find any decision of the Supreme Court from Chief-Justice Marshall down to the present day indicating that if through an incompetent, a negligent, or an indifferent administration of the affairs of a State, the insufficiency of its general statutes, or the poverty of its resources, or all these combined, the health or other local conditions have been permitted to fall so low as to become continuously a menace, an obstruction to the commerce between other States necessarily passing through the State so afflicted, that the National Government could not intervene and act directly upon such conditions for amelioration or removal, and the reinstatement of the commerce thus interrupted and threatened with destruction. Indeed, from my reading of the Constitution, I am satisfied that the warrant of authority is not only given, but the duty is imperatively enjoined upon the Congress by the Constitution to make full and careful provisions against all such contingencies. Nor is it permissible, in my opinion, for Congress to await the invitation, nor to be deterred by the protest of the State so affected when satisfied that conditions exist therein obstructive of commerce between the several States which the Constitution says must be protected by the national authority without reference to the geographical lines of any particular State, and which the State refuses or neglects to remove.

In the great case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, made historic by the learned opinion delivered by Chief-Justice Marshall, in which he considers the whole question of the powers of the National Government over the subject of commerce, that most eminent jurist, while not dissenting from the view that a State may provide by quarantine and other laws for the protection of the public health, is very careful to indicate that when a State law, whether quarantine, health, or other, may operate as an obstruction or an impediment to commerce it must fall before the supreme power of the National Government over that whole subject. Referring to the acts of 1796 and 1799 he says:

> But in making these provisions the opinion is unequivocally manifested that Congress may control the State laws so far as it may be necessary to control them for the regulation of commerce.

In other words, that Congress may accept the State laws, as was done in 1799, and co-operate with the State authorities in their enforcement, or by implication that it may modify or even replace them altogether by other laws of its own enactment, and provide for their enforcement through the agencies of the National Government alone if it shall deem it necessary, considering the interests of commerce, to do so.

Again, in this same opinion, speaking of "the power to regulate," he says:

> This power, like all others invested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution.

By parity of reasoning, if there are no "limitations" upon this power, and if it "may be exercised to the utmost" in conforming even the police and other regulations of a State to the requirements of commerce, Congress may undoubtedly, where there is an entire absence of law in a State for the protection of a great subject of interstate commerce, adopt regulations to protect the same when such protection is necessary to the maintenance of the commerce therein passing through such State to and from the several other States.

In the case of Walling vs. Michigan (116 U. S., 446) it was said by the court that—

> The police power can not be set up to control the inhibitions of the Constitution or the powers of the United States Government created thereby.

In other words, that the police power can not be employed by a State to prevent the necessary regulations of commerce, nor to limit nor abridge the powers of the National Government over this subject through the inhibitions in respect of such power. And so I maintain that, pari passu, if the police power may not be invoked by the State to obstruct, it may be set in motion by the national authority itself under some circumstances to remove obstructions in the way of interstate commerce. To illustrate: If certain police regulations necessary to protect a particular branch of interstate commerce in its passage through a State are not supplied by a State, the Congress may provide for making and enforcing such regulations in the interest and for the protection of such commerce, having due regard for all the interests of the people of such State to be affected by these regulations.

As for instance, if yellow fever should suddenly take possession, epidemically, of the States of the Lower Mississippi, and intercourse between the great States of the Northwest and the ports below, which are usually employed to make the exchanges incident to the commerce of that vast region, should be seriously interrupted—I maintain that in the absence of the necessary health or police regulations in those States to deal quickly and effectively with the situation, Congress could and it would be its duty under the Constitution to supply those regulations and authorize action directly upon the case anywhere in those States for the purpose of removing such obstacles to commerce when they could not otherwise be removed. And ultimately this rule will obtain and be gladly accepted by the people of every State in the Union. Of course these are extreme cases, but the law should be ready always to protect commerce among the several States in any and every emergency.

Certainly it would always be most desirable, and undoubtedly it would generally happen, if the bill under consideration should become a law, that where the State had provided laws to meet the case the national power would be exercised as an auxiliary force only, the State laws being supplemented by the regulations established by Congress, and the State agencies being employed so far as practicable to carry out the purposes of the proposed act. It is upon this theory of co-operation, where possible, that this bill was framed.

The reasons for such a policy are manifold. They could not be better presented than they were by Chief-Justice Marshall in the learned opinion in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, from which I before quoted. He said:

> The acts of Congress passed in 1796 and 1799 empowering and directing the officers of the General Government to conform to and insist in the execution of the quarantine and health laws of a State proceed, it is said, upon the idea that these laws are constitutional. It is undoubtedly true that they do proceed upon that idea, and the constitutionality of such laws has never, so far as we are informed, been denied. But they do not imply an acknowledgment that a State may rightfully regulate commerce with foreign nations or among the States, for they do not imply that such laws are an exercise of that power, or enacted with a view to it. On the contrary, they are treated as quarantine and health laws, are so denominated in the acts of Congress, and are considered as flowing from the acknowledged power of a State to provide for the health of its citizens. But as it was apparent that some of the provisions made for this purpose and in virtue of this power might interfere with and be affected by the laws of the United States made for the regulation of commerce, Congress, in that spirit of harmony and conciliation which ought always to characterize the conduct of governments standing in the relation which that of the Union and those of the States bear to each other, has directed its officers to aid in the execution of these laws, and has in some measure adapted its own legislation to this object by making provisions in aid of those of the States. But in making these provisions the opinion is unequivocally manifested that Congress may control the State laws, so far as it may be necessary to control them, for the regulation of commerce.

However, it will be remembered that Chief-Justice Marshall, in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, had before him primarily the question only of certain State enactments, under which Congress had authorized co-operation through certain officers of the National Government with the State authorities, whereas the requirement now is to provide not only for co-operation, when that can be had, but for independent action by the National Government in the case of non-action by the State, or of the non-existence of any State laws or regulations whatever to meet the case.

While the bill under consideration may be faulty in some of the details of its provisions as to administration, etc., it is in its general features within the scope of the authority of Congress over the subject under consideration. I think, however, that it aims to confine the operations of the national bureau or board, for which it provides, too narrowly, too closely, to established lines of transportation. As I have before said, if pleuro-pneumonia should exist epidemically and generally in Central Illinois, it would become a menace to the interstate commerce throughout the entire region through which three or four great interstate lines of transportation pass. Without authority to operate universally in that entire district for its eradication it would be impossible to relieve these great avenues of trade.

It often happens that cattle are gathered into herds preparatory to shipment at points somewhat removed from the actual shipping-point on the railroad over which they are to be transported. There can certainly be no question as to the importance of extending the jurisdiction of the board over such herds. Moreover, I think it would be safe to say that there are very few, if any, stock farms in the State of Illinois which are not within 20 miles of one or the other of these interstate transportation lines. I believe it would be entirely prudent to say that there are very few, if any, cattle in that State farther removed from one or the other of these routes than one day's drive at most; that one-half of them are even nearer, and that fully one-quarter of all of them are located not farther than three hours' drive at most from some one of these interstate roads. In my opinion, therefore, you can not safely confine the operations of this board to the exact limits of the right of way of each of these lines of traffic. As a member of the committee which presented this bill I accepted the provisions thereof respecting this jurisdiction as apparently the best attainable under the circumstances, and not because I indorsed the theory upon which they rest. I think the jurisdiction of the board should be more extended, and that it is a mistake not to make it so.

Mr. President, it would be impossible to estimate the importance of this subject. In a comparatively few years pleuro-pneumonia has cost this country directly and indirectly $10,000,000. Within ten years the losses from hog-cholera have been estimated at the enormous sum of $300,000,000 or more. We have to-day 125,000,000 of farm animals at the mercy of infectious diseases which commonly affect herds and flocks. Besides, we should not forget the lessons taught some of the older nations in the school of costly experience.

In Western Europe a single epidemic of the rinderpest swept away thirty million head of cattle of the estimated value of $1,500,000,000. France alone during the last century lost ten million head of cattle from malignant diseases. In the years from 1856 to 1862 lung fever and epizootic apptha cost Great Britain over one million head of cattle, worth $50,000,000; and in eighteen months in 1865–'66, from rinderpest, $10,000,000 more were added to the cattle losses of the same country.

If no calamity shall happen to the live-stock interest of this country, the census of 1890 will undoubtedly show its aggregate value to be nearly, if not quite, $3,000,000,000. And yet if this result shall be reached the supply per capita, with the enormous increase of our population, will be relatively smaller than it is now. Notwithstanding the great increase in the number of cattle of all kinds since 1860, while the ratio in that year was 814 head to each 1,000 of population, it has fallen to 600 to the 1,000 of population at this time. If, in addition to this, an infectious disease like pleuro-pneumonia should become general, particularly in the Western ranges, from which our beef supply largely comes, and our herds should be diminished through the insufficiency of our precautionary measures or the inefficiency of administration, it would seriously injure the whole country, and the condemnation of those who should be responsible for these omissions would be swift and terrible. You can not legislate for the evils of the present moment only. You must provide for those that may belong to the future as well. The National Government must deal with this matter. Congress can not shift the responsibility to the States.

There must be uniformity of regulation and action, with unlimited power and resources to meet any and every emergency. One method in one State, another system in another, and none of any kind in many, with non-co-operation between all, will not do. They are, so to speak, simply so many invitations for the introduction and spread of disease.

I am frank to say that the bill presented by the committee does not suit me in all particulars. There had to be, as is usual in perfecting important bills, concessions and compromises on the part of those who joined in reporting the bill, and I hope the proposition—considering the importance of the subject—will receive equally liberal and unselfish treatment in the Senate.

RAILROAD BRIDGE AT LITTLE ROCK, ARK.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up from the Calendar Senate bill 2198.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the pending order be informally laid aside to enable him to move the consideration of the bill (S. 2198) to authorize the building of a railroad bridge at Little Rock, Ark.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to interfere with the bill indicated by the Senator from Arkansas, but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the state of the public business. There are several important bills awaiting action. The time of the Senate in the last week or two has been wasted, in my judgment, by taking up and laying down and taking up and laying down bill after bill. Unless the Senator from Michigan will press his bill and have it disposed of, I propose to antagonize that bill and the other bills which are occupying so much time with some other measures. I give fair notice now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to laying aside informally the pending order and taking up the bill indicated by the Senator from Arkansas?

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2198) to authorize the building of a railroad bridge at Little Rock, Ark., which was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That it shall be lawful for the Little Rock Bridge and Terminal Railway Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Arkansas, to construct and maintain a bridge, and approaches thereto, over the Arkansas River, at a point on said river at or near the city of Little Rock, in the State of Arkansas, and to lay on and over said bridge a railroad track or tracks for the more perfect connection of any railroad or railroads that are or shall hereafter be constructed to the said river, on either or both sides thereof, at or opposite said point, under the limitations and conditions hereinafter provided; said bridge shall be constructed to provide for the passage of railway trains, and at the option of the builders and owners thereof, may be used for the passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals of all kinds, and for foot-passengers for such reasonable rates of toll as may be approved, from time to time, by the Secretary of War as to railway trains; and as to wagons, vehicles, animals, and foot-passengers, such rates as may be provided by the laws of Arkansas.

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under this act is subject to its limitations, shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post-route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, troops, and the munitions of war, or other property of the United States, than the rate per mile paid for the transportation of the same over the railroads or public highways leading to the said bridge, and it shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-roads in the United States. Equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph companies; and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and its approaches for postal telegraph purposes.

SEC. 3. That the said bridge shall be constructed with a draw or pivot span which shall be over the main channel of the river at an accessible navigable point, and the openings on each side of the pivot pier shall not be less than 160 feet in the clear, and, as nearly as practicable, both of said openings shall be accessible at all stages of water; that the spans be not less than 10 feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the lowest point of the superstructure of said bridge; that the piers and draw rests of said bridge shall be built parallel with the current at that stage of the river which is most important for navigation, and the bridge itself at right angles thereto; and that no riprap or other outside protection for imperfect foundations be permitted to approach nearer than 4 feet to the surface of the water at its extreme low stage, or otherwise to encroach upon the channel-ways provided for in this act: Provided, That said draw shall be opened by the company or persons owning said bridge upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats; and there shall be maintained, at the expense of the owners thereof, from sunset till sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridge as the Light-House Board shall prescribe.

SEC. 4. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have, and be entitled to, equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains over the same, and over the approaches to the same, upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case the owner or owners of said bridge, and the several railroad companies, or any of them, desiring such use, shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid, and upon rules and condition which each shall perform in using said bridge, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War upon hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties.

SEC. 5. That any bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to the regulations for the security of said river, as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to secure that object the owner or owners thereof shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawings of the bridge, and a map of the location, giving for the space of 1 mile above and 1 mile below the proposed location, the topography of the banks of the river, the shore-line at high or low water, the direction and strength of the current at all stages, and the soundings, actually showing the bed of the stream, the location of any other bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for the full and satisfactory understanding of the subject, and until such plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War, the bridge shall not be commenced or built, and should any change be made in the plan of said bridge during the progress of construction, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 6. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved, and the right to require any changes in said structure, or its entire removal at the expense of the owners thereof, whenever the Congress shall decide that the public interest requires it, is also expressly reserved.

SEC. 7. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT GOOSE ROCKS, MAINE.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to call up from the table the bill (S. 2506) for the establishment of a light-house, fog-signal, and day beacon in the vicinity of Goose Rocks, Fox Island Thoroughfare, Maine, which has been returned from the other House with an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2506) for the establishment of a light-house, fog-signal, and day beacon in the vicinity of Goose Rocks, Fox Island Thoroughfare, Maine, which was to strike out all after the word "sites," in line 6 of the bill.

Mr. FRYE. That amendment simply strikes out the appropriating clause, and I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

NEWPORT NEWS LIGHT-HOUSE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1828) to provide for a light-house at Newport News, Middle Ground, Virginia, which was to strike out all after the word "Virginia," in line 3 of the bill.

Mr. DANIEL. I move a concurrence in the House amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask unanimous consent that the pending order be informally laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected pension bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the pending order be informally laid aside for the consideration of private pension bills upon the Calendar to which there is no objection. Is there objection to that course of proceeding?

Mr. PADDOCK. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, who is in charge of the pending bill——

Mr. DAVIS. He gives consent.

Mr. PADDOCK. Very well; I understand that he gives consent to the course suggested by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CHACE. I object temporarily for the purpose of asking a question or two and making a few remarks, not that I intend to object to the proposition of the Senator from Minnesota.

The Senate has before it now three separate measures, all of them matters of considerable public interest, what is ordinarily termed the animal-industry bill, upon which the Senator from Nebraska has been making an address, the land-forfeiture bill, and Senate bill 554, to provide for an international copyright.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] having charge of the first bill which I have named has kept it before the Senate week after week, retaining his right of way and yielding occasionally for the consideration of other bills.

The copyright bill has got along so far as to a vote. The Senate adjourned the other day in the midst of a vote on an important amendment to that bill. I feel that in justice to the public, and to the parties who are interested in that measure, the Senate ought either to take some action on these other bills and get them out of the way or permit a positive assignment by which they will put the copyright bill upon its passage.

I give notice that I shall ask to-morrow at 2 o'clock to lay aside the pleuro-pneumonia or animal-industry bill and also the land-grant forfeiture bill, and I shall ask the Senate to take up, any objection to the contrary nevertheless, Senate bill 554, and proceed with that bill to a conclusion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Order of Business 1012 is the first private pension bill on the Calendar.

Mr. DOLPH. I object temporarily for the purpose of giving a notice. I was in the chair when the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] gave notice that after the disposition of the pending order of business he would move to take up the bill to regulate the manufacture and sale of gas in the District of Columbia. A previous notice had been given, I think, by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], if not by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], that at the earliest opportunity a motion would be made to take up for consideration the bill for the admission of the Territory of Washington. I introduced that bill and am anxious for its early consideration, and I wish to give notice that I shall feel disposed to antagonize the motion to take up any other bill, after the disposition of the pending business, in advance of that measure. I entirely agree with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that these bills ought to be disposed of, and that we are losing ground by first taking up one bill and then another and laying them aside.

Mr. MITCHELL. As it seems to be in order to give notices, I desire to give notice (and in order that I may not interfere with any other measure I will put it so far ahead that there can be no objection) that on next Wednesday, the 9th instant, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, I shall ask the Senate to indulge me in taking up the bill (S. 566) making an appropriation for a final survey and estimates for and the commencement of the construction of a boat railway around the obstructions to navigation at The Dalles and Celilo Falls, in the Columbia River.

This is a matter outside of the river and harbor bill. The bill has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, and is a measure of great local and national importance. I shall not ask the Senate to take it up for the purpose of wearying the Senate's time with a speech or anything of that kind, but for the purpose of its consideration by the Senate and action on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pension bills on the Calendar to which there is no objection will be proceeded with in their order.

WIDOW OF JOHN LEARY.

The bill (S. 1076) granting a pension to the widow of John Leary, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of the widow of John Leary, late a first sergeant in Battery F, Third Artillery, United States Army, in the war of the rebellion, at the rate of $20 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CATHARINE K. WHITTLESEY.

The bill (S. 2274) granting a pension to Mrs. Catharine K. Whittlesey was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "forty" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Catharine K. Whittlesey, widow of the late Major J. H. Whittlesey, United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET M. MILLER.

The bill (S. 1500) granting a pension to Margaret M. Miller was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Margaret M. Miller, of Elgin, Ill., a volunteer Army nurse during the war of the rebellion, at the rate of $25 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MANHATTON PICKETT.

The bill (S. 2301) to increase the pension of Manhatton Pickett was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "forty-five;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Manhatton Pickett, late a sergeant of Company B, One hundred and twelfth Regiment New York Volunteers, to $45 per month, in lieu of the pension now authorized by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANNA M. FREEMAN.

The bill (S. 1136) granting a pension to Anna M. Freeman was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Anna M. Freeman, widow of Thompson P. Freeman, late private in Company F, One hundred and thirteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALLIE R. ALEXANDER.

The bill (S. 1009) granting an increase of pension to Sallie R. Alexander, widow of Lieut. Col. Thomas L. Alexander, United States

Army, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sallie R. Alexander, widow of the late Lieut. Col. Thomas L. Alexander, United States Army, at the rate of $50 per month, for and during her natural life, in lieu of the pension of $30 per month now paid to her.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANK PASCHKER.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JARRET SPENCER.

The bill (S. 2418) granting a pension to Jarret Spencer was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Jarret Spencer, late of Company H, Fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have the report in that case read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. SAWYER April 17, 1888:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill granting a pension to Jarret Spencer, have examined the same, and report:

This claimant was a member of Company H, Fifth Wisconsin Volunteers. The Adjutant-General's report shows that he was enrolled on the 13th day of August, 1862, and it appears from the record that he was continuously in service until he was mustered out with his company at Hall's Hill, Va., on the 20th of June, 1865. In his declaration he says that at Brandy Station, in the State of Virginia, on or about the 15th of February, 1864, he contracted rheumatism, resulting in paralysis, and that at the date of filing his application he suffers constantly from rheumatism, paralysis, and general debility, which disqualify him for any kind of manual labor: that he was never treated in any hospital.

The history of this man's service is remarkable. He was fifty years and seven months old when he enlisted, and he was in all the skirmishes and engagements in which his regiment participated, and which included the battles of Antietam, Marye's Heights, Chancellorsville, Rappahannock Station, Gettysburgh, the battles of the Wilderness, and around Richmond. He was never off duty, never in hospital, but the hard, continuous service at his advanced age affected him seriously, and since his discharge he has had a progressive disability. The certificate of the medical board which examined him in 1887 says: "He can feed and dress himself by taking time; can not perform manual labor; does not require constant aid and attendance, but requires watching when moving about, because he frequently falls, and when down can not rise without help." They rate him total for rheumatism and heart trouble, and total for paralysis.

He is now eighty years old. In the past year his disabilities have increased; he needs the constant care and attendance of another person, and should be so rated. A petition to Congress for his relief, and signed by nearly two hundred of his neighbors, says his wife, the mother of all his children, with whom he has lived for nearly fifty years, takes care of him, and should not be separated from him. Nevertheless, their poverty is so great that they will have to be separated by placing him in a charitable institution unless Congress extends the relief which he has earned and which, if it is to be of any use to him, must speedily be conceded.

The claim is still pending in the Pension Office. It has not been rejected, but it is awaiting testimony which, in his disabled condition, it is impossible for him to furnish without protracting the time of its completion beyond the limit of his life.

The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wanted the record to show the reason why the Pension Committee, contrary to what I understand to be its established rules, has proposed to grant a pension in this case while the case is still pending in the Pension Office.

Mr. DAVIS. I will state to the Senator from Missouri that under the peculiar circumstances of this case, this man's advanced age and present condition, we made an exception.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think the report shows that fact clearly.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROZALIA JUNK.

The bill (S. 2310) granting a pension to Rozalia Junk was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Rozalia Junk, widow of John Junk, alias John Younge, late a private of Company K, Sixth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. MARY MOTT.

The bill (S. 1838) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Mott was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Mary Mott, widow of Henry A. Mott, late lieutenant of Company K, Fifty-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALEXANDER H. WHITE.

The bill (S. 1925) granting a pension to Alexander H. White was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Alexander H. White, late a private in Company D, One hundred and forty-first New York Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MADISON M. MEREDITH.

The bill (S. 1591) granting a pension to Madison M. Meredith was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Madison M. Meredith, late captain of Company D, One hundred and third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, at $20 per month, in lieu of the amount he is now receiving.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. QUAY April 17, 1888:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1591) granting an increase of pension to Madison M. Meredith, having examined the same, beg leave to submit the following report:

Claimant was mustered in, November 13, 1861, as first lieutenant of Company D, One hundred and third Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, commissioned as captain April 10, 1862, and honorably discharged for disability July 12, 1862.

He filed his declaration March 8, 1882, alleging that before Yorktown, Va., about March or April, 1862, he contracted chronic diarrhea and rheumatism and fistula.

He was granted a pension, to date from March 8, 1882, at $8.50 per month, with rank of first lieutenant, for chronic rheumatism.

Upon application of claimant his rating was corrected, and his pension increased to $10, as of the rank of captain. The claim for pension for fistula was rejected, the Pension Office deciding that claimant had not conclusively proven the existence of the disability since the war.

The papers on file in the Bureau of Pensions make the following exhibit:

First, that claimant was strong and healthy before his enlistment.

Second, that claimant contracted hemorrhoids or fistula while in the service and line of duty. The certificate of the regimental surgeon, upon which claimant was discharged July 12, 1862, was as follows: "I certify that I have carefully examined the above-mentioned officer, and find him suffering with chronic rheumatism and hemorrhoids, and that he is unable to perform the duties required of him, and has been since the 10th of May, 1862, and in my opinion ever will be."

Third, that claimant was still suffering from fistula May 6, 1885, when examined by the medical examining board. The board reports: "There is a blind internal fistula (internal opening 1 inch from anal margin) on right side, which applicant thinks resulted from diarrhea."

This board, as a result of this examination, rated claimant one-half of total for rheumatism and one-half of total for fistula.

Claimant was unable to conclusively prove the continuance of fistula from the date of the regimental surgeon's certificate (upon which claimant was discharged) until the medical board's examination, May 6, 1885, chiefly owing to the death of the physician who attended him after his discharge. But from all the evidence in the case your committee are of the opinion that the disability now existing is a continuation of that contracted in the spring of 1862, and that this bill simply gives the claimant the total pension to which he was entitled under the finding of the board of medical examiners, and under the evidence on file in the Bureau of Pensions. They therefore report the bill with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM SMITH.

The bill (S. 1926) granting a pension to William Smith was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 5, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty" and insert "forty-five;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, at the rate of $45 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Smith, late a private in Company H, Ninety-third Pennsylvania Volunteers, this act to take effect from its passage, and the pension hereby granted to be in lieu of that which he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read the third time, and passed.

PIERRE BOTTINEAU.

The bill (S. 2713) granting a pension to Pierre Bottineau was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Pierre Bottineau, at the rate of $25 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUSAN EDSON.

The bill (S. 915) granting a pension to Susan Edson was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 6, after the words "rate of," to strike out "seventy-two" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Susan Edson, M. D., a volunteer surgical nurse in the late war of the rebellion, at the rate of $25 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. EMELINE ANDERSON.

The bill (S. 2366) granting a pension to Mrs. Emeline Anderson was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Emeline Anderson, widow of Jeff Anderson, late a private in Company K, First Regiment Minnesota Cavalry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELLEN J. SNEDAKER.

The bill (S. 2313) granting a pension to Ellen J. Snedaker was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Ellen J. Snedaker, the dependent mother of James W. Snedaker, late second lieutenant of Company D, One hundred and eleventh Regiment New York State Volunteers, and of Albert I. Snedaker, late a private in the same company and regiment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HANNAH BABB HUTCHINS.

The bill (S. 1540) granting a pension to Hannah Babb Hutchins was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Hannah Babb Hutchins, a volunteer nurse in the war of the rebellion, and to pay her a pension during life of $25 per month, in lieu of the one now received by her.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear the report read in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. DAVIS April 17, 1888:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1540) granting a pension to Hannah Babb Hutchins, have examined the same, and report:

A bill of like tenor was favorably reported on by this committee at the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, granting the claimant a pension for services rendered and disabilities resulting from her labors as nurse during the late war. Adopting the views expressed in such report, the committee report the bill favorably, and recommend its passage.

[Report Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The evidence and attendant circumstances of this case are set forth in the following report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House of Representatives (House Report No. 1058) made during the present session:

Mrs. Babb makes the following presentment of her case in petition addressed to Congress:

"The undersigned, Hannah B. Hutchins, a resident of Freeport, in the State of Maine, respectfully represents: That at the time of the breaking out of the civil war she had recently lost her husband and four children; that her name was then Hannah Babb; that in response to the advertisement of the Government for nurses she offered her services in the capacity of a nurse, and on the 1st day of June, 1862, received a dispatch to report immediately at Washington, and that she did so at once; that upon arriving there she signed enlistment papers as a nurse, and mustered into the United States service as a nurse; that she served in that capacity three years and three months in the hospitals in and about Washington, and received pay at the rate of $12 per month and one ration; that she used the money received for pay largely for the purposes of procuring necessary delicacies for the sick and wounded soldiers; that on the 1st day of January, 1865, while engaged in said service at the Harewood Hospital, in Washington, in passing from ward 12 to ward 10, she slipped on the outside steps and fractured her ribs and injured herself otherwise severely; that she was confined to her quarters for a month, and after partially recovering again commenced services as a nurse; that on the 31st day of July, 1865, she was discharged at that hospital; that she returned to Maine, and subsequently married Solomon S. Hutchins, who died in 1880, leaving her a widow with no means of support; that her injury aforesaid affected her so that she was unable to labor and was obliged to be a patient for some eight months in the Maine General Hospital, whereby she got partially relieved, but has never been able to perform any manual labor; that she is seventy-six years of age and entirely without means of support; that she believes she is justly entitled to aid from the nation precisely as if she had been a soldier and been incapacitated from labor by injury received in the line of duty, but that she is informed that there is no law of the nation under which she would be entitled to a pension, as the laws for those purposes do not include nurses. She therefore prays that she may be granted a pension."

In connection with this petition is the following certificate by Josiah H. Drummond, dated December 27, 1885:

"I hereby certify that I have known the above-named Mrs. Hutchins for nearly twenty years; that I have personal knowledge that the statements in the foregoing petition as to matters happening during that time are all true; also that she is very poor, and has had to depend upon charity for support, although being an excellent nurse, she could support herself but for her disability. The State of Maine, upon a hearing of her case, granted her a pension for two years from January 1, 1885. She has no relations able to assist in her support, and she must have aid from the public, and must go to the poor-house unless she has it in some other way.

The efficient and faithful character of Mrs. Babb's services in the hospitals are attested by Mrs. H. B. Corts, M. Hoard, Elvina Bliss Sheldon, Harriet P. Dame, and Caroline A. Burghardt, M. D., members of the Army Nurse Association, all of whom speak from personal knowledge of her services. Twenty-five members of the Soldiers' Aid Society and other citizens of Chelsea, Mass., testify to her fidelity as an army nurse. They say:

"We knew her before the war as a worthy woman, and during the war some of us were in constant correspondence with her, forwarded her supplies from the above-named [Soldiers' Aid Society] and from individuals. Her services and sacrifices seem to entitle her to recognition by the Government, and we earnestly commend her to the favor of Congress."

Dr. Albion Cobb, of Webb's Mills, Me., who was on duty at the Harewood Hospital, writes that she was one of the best nurses there; that he remembers of her sick in the nurses' quarters, but has forgotten the cause of it.

Dr. David Dana Spear, of Freeport, Me., certifies under date January 14, 1886, that she has been his patient since 1880, treated for chronic diarrhea, and has known of her being treated for this and other troubles at the Maine General Hospital.

Dr. Charles O. Hunt, resident physician and superintendent of said hospital, certifies:

"Mrs Hannah B. Hutchins has been under treatment at this hospital since April 23, 1883, for cystocele, for which she has been obliged to have a surgical operation performed. She claims that the trouble was originated by a fall received while in the employ of the Government as a nurse in one of the army hospitals during the late war. I have no doubt that she has suffered much from this disease in the past, and that it has proved a real hinderance to her gaining a livelihood by her labor, and if there is any way by which such cases could be pensioned and her claims as above are substantiated, I think she richly deserves to be remembered by the Government she has served so well, now that age and infirmity render her unable to support herself."

James M. Bates, M. D., formerly surgeon of the Thirteenth Maine Regiment, makes a certificate, which Dr. Spear indorses:

"I have known Mrs. Hannah Babb, now Mrs. Hutchins, for several years past, and at one time attended her professionally for an extensive humor in her hands, wrists, and arms, which she supposed to be the result of blood poisoning, which she received while performing the duties of hospital nurse during the late civil war. She also complained, and does now, of pain and lameness in the region of the spine, between the shoulders, which she believes to be the result of slipping and falling on some door-steps at Harewood Hospital, while performing the duties of nurse. I know of no other cause for the disabilities named above, and consider Mrs. Hutchins a perfectly reliable woman, and any statement which she may make entitled to credit."

The evidence seems to disclose a meritorious case, which entitles Mrs. Hutchins to the same consideration accorded others of her class. The committee accordingly recommend the passage of the bill.

This bill passed the House at $12, having been reduced to that amount by the committee, mainly on the ground, as your committee are advised, that this lady was paid at the time for her services. The evidence before your committee shows that what little money she did receive was used for the purpose of purchasing necessary delicacies for the sick and wounded soldiers and food for herself; so that in no real sense did she receive compensation. She is now old, in poverty, and helpless, suffering by reason of disabilities incurred in her service.

The evidence shows that $12 per month will not be enough to relieve her necessities, and there appears to be no valid reason why she should not receive the same amount which in several other cases has been granted to other nurses. Her appeal that her services and sufferings be thus recognized is strongly urged by the Army Nurses' Association.

In view of all these facts your committee report back the bill with a recommendation that it do pass, with the following amendment: Strike out the word "twelve," in line 6, and insert in lieu thereof the words "twenty-five."

Mr. COCKRELL. I thought the committee had adopted a rule allowing $12 a month as the pension for these nurses.

Mr. DAVIS. The rule of the committee in cases of this character has been $25 a month. The second page of the report is covered with evidence confirming the petition.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have seen the evidence there. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this lady was a nurse, and received a regular monthly compensation of $12 per month. We have heretofore heard it said that the nurses were voluntary, and performed their services without any compensation. The report in this case flatly contradicts that position.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN C. ABBOTT.

The bill (S. 2246) granting a pension to John C. Abbott was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of John C. Abbott, late a private of Company B, Second Illinois Artillery.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FANNY WILLIAMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Order of Business 1086, House bill 335, is the next pension bill on the Calendar favorably reported.

Mr. FAULKNER. I was requested by the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] to ask when Order of Business 1064 was reached (which I reported adversely, and which he asked to be put upon the Calendar), that it be indefinitely postponed, as he did not understand the reasons for the action of the committee, and the report was really in the interest of the claimant, as the case is now pending in the Pension Bureau. The Senator from Florida desired me to ask that the bill be indefinitely postponed when it was reached.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2236) granting a pension to Fanny Williams, widow of William H. Williams, a lieutenant in the Seminole war.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the committee will be agreed to, and the bill indefinitely postponed, if there be no objection.

GENERAL W. E. WOODRUFF.

The bill (H. R. 335) granting a pension to General W. E. Woodruff was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes, in recognition of meritorious service, to place the name of General W. E. Woodruff, of Kentucky, on the pension-roll at the rate of $50 per month.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in this case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report submitted by Mr. SAWYER April 23, 1888:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill granting a pension to General W. E. Woodruff, have examined the same, and report:

This bill passed the House on the 13th of April. The House report is adopted and is as follows:

"General W. E. Woodruff was a soldier in the Mexican war. He was one of the first Kentuckians to respond to President Lincoln's call for troops at the outbreak of the civil war. He was the organizer and drill-master of both the First and Second Kentucky Regiments, and rendered great service in keeping his State in the Union. He was captured early in the war, and was one of the first prisoners confined in the Libby prison at Richmond. He was one of the five Union officers who were held as hostages and sentenced to death in the event of the execution of certain Confederates who were confined at Philadelphia as pirates."

"The gallows on which he was to be hung was constructed and was erected in sight of his window. He was thus held four months under death sentence, in full view of the scaffold, until the United States Government agreed to treat the Philadelphia prisoners as prisoners of war. Whilst on duty in West Virginia he was thrown from his horse and suffered internal injuries from which he has never recovered. General Woodruff was a brave and gallant officer, and has suffered greatly for his devotion to the Union cause. He is now over sixty years of age, infirm, and without resources.

"Your committee think the modest sum of $50 a month asked by him should be cheerfully allowed."

The bill is reported favorably with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask if this officer was pensioned in the Pension Office? Has there ever been any pension granted to him?

Mr. SAWYER. No, I think not. It is a House bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Did he apply there for a pension?

Mr. SAWYER. I do not remember about that; I have had so many cases to examine. I am quite willing that the bill shall go over, if the Senator from Missouri desires to look into it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not desire to object to it, but let it stand over for the present, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

FRANCIS DANIELS.

The bill (H. R. 2664) for the relief of Francis Daniels was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Francis Daniels, of Cropseyville, N. Y., late a private in Company H, One hundred and twenty-fifth Regiment of New York Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY M'GRATH.

The bill (H. R. 404) for the relief of Mary McGrath was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary McGrath, dependent mother of Peter McGrath, deceased, late of Company F, Twenty-seventh Regiment Michigan Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIZA SHREEVE.

The bill (H. R. 3735) granting a pension to Eliza Shreeve was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Eliza Shreeve, widow of Alfred T. Shreeve, late of Company A, Sixth Regiment Maryland Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. JEANNIE STONE.

The bill (H. R. 401) granting a pension to Mrs. Jeannie Stone was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Mrs. Jeannie Stone, widow of General Charles P. Stone, a pension.

Mr. SAWYER. I move to amend the bill by adding: "at the rate of $50 per month."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SAWYER. I move that the Senate ask for a conference on the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. DAVIS, Mr. HOAR, and Mr. TURPIE were appointed.

Mr. SAWYER. I ask that the bill (S. 1161) granting a pension to Mrs. Jeannie Stone, widow of General Charles P. Stone, be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed will be reconsidered, and the bill will be postponed indefinitely.

JOSEPH PERRY.

The bill (H. R. 138) granting a pension to Joseph Perry was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place the name of Joseph Perry, of Dearborn County, Indiana, late a private in Capt. Joseph H. Burkam's company, Twelfth Regiment of Indiana Militia, on the pension-roll, he having been disabled while in the line of duty in the military service in the late war.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN KINNEY.

The bill (H. R. 7882) granting a pension to John Kinney was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of John Kinney, late private Company M, First Regiment Ohio Heavy Artillery.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. SAWYER April 24, 1888:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill granting a pension to David W. Seely, have examined the same and report:

This bill passed the House, and the report, which is as follows, is adopted:

"The applicant in this case was a member of Lieut. R. Crandall's company, of the Minnesota State Militia, called out to fight the Indians in 1865. In 1866 he filed an application in the Pension Office for pension, which was rejected on the ground that the injury was not received in actual engagement with the Indians.

"It seems that while he was in pursuit of the Indians with his company, by the accidental discharge of his gun he was wounded in the left arm, rendering amputation necessary. The facts as herein set forth seem to be fully established. Had the wound been received in an actual engagement with the Indians claimant would have been entitled to and would have received a pension under the general laws.

"Your committee feel that the man was actually engaged in protecting the frontier from the hostile Indians, and that the technicality ought to be waived."

The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. DAVIS, April 24, 1888:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3844) granting a pension to Wilson C. Moles, have examined the same, and report:

Your committee have reported favorably several bills involving the same principle as the present one, and they therefore recommend the passage of this bill. The report of the House committee is subjoined.

HOUSE REPORT.

The claimant in this case was pensioned for partial paralysis, receiving $8 per month from March 3, 1864, $15 from May 1, 1869, $18 from June 4, 1872, $24 from August 9, 1880, and $50 from May 27, 1885. This is the highest rate that can be allowed in this case by the Pension Office, because the claimant does not come under the provisions of the act of June 16, 1880, not being on the pension-roll at that time for $50 per month.

The files in the Pension Office show that though comparatively a young man, having enlisted in the service when only a little more than sixteen years of age, he is a complete wreck.

The report of the examining board of surgeons at Marysville, Kans., after describing the disabilities, add:

"This man is certainly a pitiable subject, dependent upon the kindness of friends for everything. He requires the regular aid and attendance of another person."

Affidavits filed in the case show that from the effects of the paralysis the soldier has lost all control of his bowels, and has to be cared for as an infant would be. His condition is certainly worse than that of a man who has lost the sight of both eyes, or of one who has lost both legs or both arms, and is otherwise in good health. The present pension is inadequate to provide for his comfortable support and to pay for necessary medical attendance. It is not possible for him to live many months, and your committee believe that it is the duty of the Government to make him as comfortable as possible for the short time he can live.

Your committee therefore report favorably, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NANCY F. JENNINGS.

The bill (H. R. 5545) granting a pension to Nancy F. Jennings was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to put the name of Nancy F. Jennings, widow of William Jennings, late of Company F, Thirteenth Regiment Michigan Cavalry, on the pension-roll.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN H. SAYERS.

The bill (H. R. 3180) granting a pension to John H. Sayers was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place upon the pension-roll the name of John H. Sayers, late captain of Company H, Twenty-sixth Regiment of Michigan Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIZABETH WARD.

The bill (H. R. 6582) granting a pension to Elizabeth Ward was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Elizabeth Ward, wife of Joseph S. Ward, late a private in Company B, Seventy-second Enrolled Missouri Militia.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARTHA GRAY.

The bill (H. R. 2071) for the relief of Martha Gray was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Martha Gray, widow of Charles Gray, deceased, formerly of Company A, Fourth Illinois Cavalry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOWARD S. ABBOTT.

The bill (H. R. 3158) increasing the pension of Howard S. Abbott, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that the pension of Howard S. Abbott, certificate 73522, late adjutant of the Seventy-eighth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, be increased from $17 to $30 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVID M. RENNOE.

The bill (H. R. 6379) to increase the pension of David M. Rennoe was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to increase the pension of David M. Rennoe, late private in Company H, Twenty-ninth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, to $40 per month, for disability resulting from wounds in left foot, neck, and hand.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. DAVIS April 24, 1888:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6379) granting a pension to David M. Rennoe have examined the same and report:

The grounds on which this increase is asked are set out in the following report of the House committee.

Your committee concur in the conclusion therein reached, and recommend the passage of the bill.

This claimant, David M. Rennoe, enlisted as a private in Company H, Twenty-ninth Indiana Volunteers, November 29, 1861, and was honorably discharged March 23, 1863, for gunshot wounds received at the battle of Murfreesborough, Tenn., December 31, 1862.

Claimant was pensioned December 28, 1863, at the rate of $8 per month, for loss of right foot, which was increased from time to time by the Pension Department until he received a pension for total third grade. At the session of the Forty-ninth Congress a special act was passed, June 4, 1886, increasing his pension to $30 per month, because of wounds of left foot, neck, and hand. Subsequent to the passage of the aforesaid act a general act of Congress was passed August 4, 1886, increasing the rate for total disability of right foot to $30 per month. Since the passage of the aforesaid act he continued to receive only $30 per month, or the rate for the disability of right foot, and nothing for the disabilities of foot, neck, and hand.

By the ruling of the Pension Bureau the special act for his relief, passed June 4, 1886, must govern, and therefore the general act of August 4, 1886, which increased the rate on his disability of right foot to $30 per month, is made to repeal the effect of the special act of June 4, 1886, which increased his pension from $24 to $30 per month because of wounds of left foot, neck, and hand, and this bill for an increase of pension is to secure what Congress by special act allowed him for the last-named disabilities, but which has not been permitted by the Pension Bureau since the approval of the general act of August 4, 1886.

The evidence now on file in this case discloses the following facts: Soldier was wounded at the battle of Murfreesborough, Tenn., December 31, 1862, the ball passing through the left foot, just in front of the astragalus and os calcis bones, and through the center of the os calcis of the right foot, fracturing the bone in many pieces. Three months after soldier was discharged from the service on account of said wounds. In discharge it is stated "gunshot wound, fracture of the right and left metatarsals; disability total."

In a short time after the arrival of soldier at home it became necessary to amputate the right foot to save his life. The board of examining surgeons at South Bend, Ind., make the following report upon examination:

"Pensioner's right foot is off about 18 inches above the ankle; left foot shot through below and a little forward of the ankle joint. We find the foot tender, and he is not capable of walking or being on his left foot much on account of the lameness and soreness it produces; foot looks tender and red. The wounds of neck and hand are not painful, and, he says, do not trouble him. We find his disability as described above to be equal to and entitling him to total third grade for loss of right foot, and one-half total for wound of left foot."

The evidence of the examining surgeons and the citizens of his home clearly establish the fact that the soldier is now receiving a pension only for the amputation of right leg, and nothing on the wounds of the left foot, neck, or hand, and that soldier is unable for the performance of manual labor.

The committee, being unanimously of the opinion that claimant is entitled to the benefit of the general act of August 4, 1886, submit a favorable report and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. LEPHA A. OSBORN.

The bill (H. R. 5966) granting a pension to Mrs. Lepha A. Osborn was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place the name of Mrs. Lepha A. Osborn, widow of Henry A. Osborn, late corporal Company C, One hundred and eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and of Company E, One hundred and twenty-eighth Ohio Infantry Volunteers, on the pension-roll.

NANCY VAN DYNE.

Mr. SAWYER. I ask leave to report from the Committee on Pensions and have put on its passage a pension bill which I neglected to report heretofore. I report without amendment the bill (H. R. 7094) granting a pension to Nancy Van Dyne. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Nancy Van Dyne, mother of James B. Van Dyne, who was a private in Company B, Thirty-third New York Volunteers, and late orderly sergeant in Company I, First Regiment New York Veteran Cavalry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call attention to the wording of the latter part of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again read.

The CHIEF CLERK. "Subject to the provisions and limitations of the of the pension laws."

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to strike out one of the "of the's."

Mr. SAWYER. I thought of that, but then we should have to send it back to the House and it would cause more bother than it is worth. It does not amount to anything.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is it a House bill?

Mr. SAWYER. Yes; the repetition will not do any hurt.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it go.

The bill was passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ASHEVILLE, N. C.

Mr. RANSOM. I ask leave by unanimous consent to call up Order of Business 1163, House bill 1697.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1697) for the erection of a public building in the city of Asheville, N. C.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY H. SIBLEY'S REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask the Senate to take up Order of Business 1163, Senate bill 518, the second on the Calendar below the one just read.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 518) for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry H. Sibley, deceased.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend in line 4 by striking out "W." and inserting "H.;" so as to read "Henry H. Sibley."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WOONSOCKET, R. I.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of Order of Business 1012, Senate bill 165.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 165) for the erection of a public building in the city of Woonsocket, R. I., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds reported the bill with amendments, in line 4, after the words "directed to," to insert "acquire by;" in the same line, after the word "purchase," to insert "condemnation," and in line 5, after the word "otherwise," to strike out "provide;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to acquire by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise a suitable site, and to cause to be erected thereon, at the city of Woonsocket, in the State of Rhode Island, a substantial and commodious public building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and for other Government uses.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 13, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty;" so as to read:

The site, and the building thereon, when completed according to plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed the cost of $50,000.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. I have already explained to the members of the committee that that sum is inadequate, and I think I have the assent of the committee in asking that the bill shall stand as originally presented.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, in line 17, before the word "thousand," to fill the blank by inserting "fifty;" so as to read:

And the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of at least 40 feet, including streets and alleys; and for the purposes herein mentioned the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be amended.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move to amend by striking out "fifty" and inserting "seventy-five."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FORT DODGE, IOWA.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 289, Calendar number 1178.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee on the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 289) for the erection of a public building at Fort Dodge, Iowa.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 4, after the word "purchase," to insert "or acquire by condemnation proceedings or otherwise;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to purchase or acquire, by condemnation proceedings or otherwise, a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the United States district and circuit courts, post-office, and other Government offices, at the city of Fort Dodge, Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 12, after the words "sum of," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to read:

The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $75,000.

Mr. ALLISON. The original bill provided an appropriation of $100,000. The committee have reported an amendment reducing the sum to $75,000. That amount is not sufficient to put up such a building as should be constructed at Fort Dodge, Iowa, where the United States circuit and district courts are held. Therefore I hope the Senate will non-concur in the amendment reducing the sum to $75,000. A very good example has just now been set in the case of the Asheville bill for North Carolina, which passed the Senate with $100,000, though that is a much smaller place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the amendment will be disagreed to. The Chair hears no objection, and it is disagreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was, in line 22, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to read:

And no purchase of site nor plan for said building shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $75,000.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, in line 33, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to read:

For the purpose of this act the sum of $75,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT STERLING, ILL.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1190, Senate bill 1940.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1940) to provide for the construction of a public building at Sterling, Ill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 4, after the word "purchase," to insert "or acquire by condemnation proceedings or otherwise;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, or acquire by condemnation proceedings or otherwise, a site for, and caused to be erected thereon, a suitable building for the accommodation of the post-office and other Government offices at the city of Sterling, in the State of Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 11, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "forty;" so as to read:

And plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed, for the site and building complete, the sum of $40,000.

Mr. CULLOM. The amendment proposed reduces the amount from $100,000 to $40,000. I wish to say that I was misled, because I recommended to the committee to make that reduction myself. I thought $40,000 was the right amount from what I had heard; but I desire to say that on investigation I find there can not be such a building put there for the amount after purchasing the ground, and so I ask that the amount be increased to $50,000 instead of $40,000 as proposed by the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. I notice the same thing has been done in two or three cases. It seems to me the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds ought to make investigation, and if they make a report here that we should not ignore it lightly. There have been two cases passed to-day where they recommended a smaller amount than the Senate voted. In a bill that provided $100,000 they recommended $75,000, and so reported a few days ago, and we trampled the report under foot and gave $100,000.

Mr. CULLOM. The remarks of the Senator do not apply to this case.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am only speaking of the precedent. If we are going to have a committee to do its work, let it do its work and dismiss it. No member of the committee is here to defend the action of the committee and its reports are ignored and trampled under foot.

Mr. CULLOM. I move to amend the amendment by striking out $40,000 and inserting $50,000. I exonerate the committee, as I told the committee myself that I thought possibly $40,000 would do, but I find on investigation that it is not enough. The committee would probably have made it more than $50,000 if I had insisted upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment to strike out "forty" and insert "fifty."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was, in line 30, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "forty;" so as to read:

And no purchase of site, nor plan for said building, shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $40,000 for site and building.

Mr. CULLOM. I move to make that $50,000 also.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 2. That the sum of $40,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used and expended for the purpose provided in this act.

Mr. CULLOM. I move to amend that amendment in line 1 by making the amount $50,000 instead of $40,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. BERRY. I move to take up for consideration Order of Business 1162, Senate bill 2644.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2644) granting the right of way to the Fort Smith, Paris and Dardanelle Railway Company to construct and operate a railroad, telegraph, and telephone line from Fort Smith, Ark., through the Indian Territory, to or near Baxter Springs, in the State of Kansas, and authorizing said company to build a bridge across the Arkansas River at or near the city of Fort Smith, Ark.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was in section 4, line 6, after the word "mile," to strike out:

and shall in all respects conform to the laws of Congress on the subject of interstate commerce which have been or may hereafter be enacted on the subject: Provided,

And insert:

Congress hereby reserves the right to regulate the charges for freight and passengers on said railway and messages on said telegraph and telephone lines, until a State government or governments shall exist in said Territory within the limits of which said railway, or a part thereof, shall be located; and then such State government or governments shall be authorized to fix and regulate the cost of transportation of persons and freights within their respective limits by said railway; but Congress expressly reserves the right to fix and regulate at all times the cost of such transportation by said railway or said company whenever such transportation shall extend from one State into another, or shall extend into more that one State: Provided, however, That the rate of such transportation of passengers, local or interstate, shall not exceed the rate above expressed: And provided further,

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That said railroad company shall not charge the inhabitants of said Territory a greater rate of freight than the rate authorized by the laws of the State of Arkansas for services or transportation of the same kind: Provided, That passenger rates on said railway shall not exceed 3 cents per mile. Congress hereby reserves the right to regulate the charges for freight and passengers on said railway and messages on said telegraph and telephone lines until a State government or governments shall exist in said Territory within the limits of which said railway, or a part thereof, shall be located; and then such State government or governments shall be authorized to fix and regulate the cost of transportation of persons and freights within their respective limits by said railway; but Congress expressly reserves the right to fix and regulate at all times the cost of such transportation by said railway or said company whenever such transportation shall extend from one State into another, or shall extend into more than one State: Provided, however, That the rate of such transportation of passengers, local or interstate, shall not exceed the rate above expressed: And provided further, That said railway company shall carry the mail at such prices as Congress may by law provide, and until such rate is fixed by law the Postmaster-General may fix the rate of compensation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 9, line 2, before the word "miles," to insert "fifty," and in the same line, after the word "within," to insert "three years;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. That said railway company shall build at least 50 miles of its railway in said Territory within three years after the passage of this act, or the rights herein granted shall be forfeited as to that portion not built; and that said company shall construct and maintain continually all road and highway crossings and necessary bridges over said railway wherever said roads and highways do now or may hereafter cross said railway's right of way or may be by the proper authorities laid across the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out "Sec. 13" and connect section 13 with section 12.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out sections 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19, as follows:

SEC. 14. That the said Fort Smith, Paris and Dardanelle Railway Company shall have the right to construct and maintain a bridge across the Arkansas River, at or near the city of Fort Smith, Ark., and also to lay on and over said bridge a railway track or tracks for the passage of railway trains; and said company may, at its option, construct and maintain ways for wagons, carriages, and foot passengers, charging and receiving such reasonable tolls therefor as may be approved by the Secretary of War, if built in the Indian Territory, and if built in the State of Arkansas, by the authorities of the State of Arkansas.

SEC. 15. That said bridge shall be constructed and built without interference with the security and convenience of navigation of said river beyond what is necessary to carry into effect the rights and privileges hereby granted; and in order to secure that object the said company shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawings of the bridge, a map of the location, giving, for the space of 1 mile above and 1 mile below the proposed location, the topography of the banks of the river, the shore lines at high and low water, the direction and strength of the currents at all stages, and the soundings, accurately showing the bed of the stream, the location of any other bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War the bridge shall not be built: Provided, That the bridge built under this act shall be a draw-bridge, with a draw over the main channel of the river at an accessible and navigable point, and with the spans of not less than 300 feet, should the width of the river between the draw span and the banks be sufficient to permit it, and the head room under such spans shall not be less than ten feet above high-water mark: Provided, also, That said draw-bridge shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passing of boats; and said company shall maintain at its own expense, from sunset until sunrise, such light or other signal on said bridge as the Light-House Board shall prescribe.

SEC. 16. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, upon receiving such plan and map and other information, and upon being satisfied that the bridge upon such plan with such necessary works and at such locality will conform to the prescribed conditions of this act, to notify the company that he approves the same; and upon receiving such notification the said company may proceed to an erection of the bridge, conforming strictly to the approved plan and location; and should any change be made in the plan of the bridge or accessory works during the progress of the work thereon, such change shall be subject likewise to the approval of the Secretary of War, and, in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river, caused or alleged to be caused by said bridge, the case may be brought in the United States court for the western district of Arkansas.

SEC. 17. That the said bridge and accessory work, when built and constructed under this act and according to the terms and limitations thereof, shall be lawful structures; and said bridge shall be recognized and known as a post-route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transportation over the same of mails, the troops, and munitions of war of the United States, than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroad said company may construct on its right of way granted in this act, this bridge being a part of the same; and said bridge and railway line shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-routes in the United States; and should said bridge be constructed and built in the Indian Territory, Congress reserves the right at any time to regulate by appropriate legislation the charges for freight and passengers over said bridge.

SEC. 18. That the United States shall have the right of way for such postal-telegraph lines across said bridge as the Government may construct or control.

SEC. 19. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved; and the right to require any changes in said structure, or its entire removal, at the expense of the owner thereof, whenever Congress shall decide that the public interest shall require it, is also expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I move to strike out in the third section of the bill the words in the forty-sixth line beginning "If the judgment of the court" down to the word "damages" in line 49. It is the same provision which was struck out of the railroad bill which was passed the other day. My colleague informed me that he intended to have all these bills modified so as to correspond with the one then passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 46, after the word "company," it is proposed to strike out the words:

If the judgment of the court shall be for the same or a less sum than the award made by the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the party claiming damages.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting the right of way to the Fort Smith, Paris and Dardanelle Railway Company to construct and operate a railroad, telegraph, and telephone line from Fort Smith, Ark., through the Indian Territory, to or near Baxter Springs, in the State of Kansas."

FORT SEDGWICK MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 821, Senate bill 1765.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1765) to provide for the sale of the Fort Sedgwick military reservation, in the State of Colorado and Territory of Wyoming, to actual settlers.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 6, after the word "settlers," to strike out "only at minimum price," and in line 8, after the word "laws," to insert "only;" so as to read:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause said tract of land to be surveyed, sectionized, and subdivided as other public lands, and after said survey and appraisement to offer said land to actual settlers under and in accordance with the provisions of the homestead laws only.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 8, after the word "person," to insert "who;" in line 10, after the words "to the," to strike out "appraisement thereof" and insert "1st day of January, 1888;" and in line 14, after the word "laws," to insert "notwithstanding such prior entry;" so as to read:

Provided, That if any person who has made permanent improvements upon said land prior to the 1st day of January, 1888 (being an actual settler thereon), has exhausted his right to make a homestead entry, such person, or his heirs, may enter one quarter-section of said land under the provisions of the homestead laws, notwithstanding such prior entry.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 17, after the words "prior to," to strike out "such appraisement" and insert "January 1, 1888;" and in line 18, after the word "complete," to strike out "the pre-emption or;" so as to make the clause read:

And provided further, That the heirs of any deceased person who had made settlement and improvement as above described prior to January 1, 1888, may complete homestead entry of the person so deceased.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I should like to hear the bill read as it now stands amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read as amended.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause said tract of land to be surveyed, sectionized, and subdivided as other public lands, and after said survey and appraisement to offer said land to actual settlers, under and in accordance with the provisions of the homestead laws only: Provided, That if any person who has made permanent improvements upon said land prior to the 1st day of January, 1888 (being an actual settler thereon) has exhausted his right to make a homestead entry, such person, or his heirs, may enter one quarter-section of said land under the provisions of the homestead laws, notwithstanding such prior entry: And provided further, That the heirs of any deceased person who had made settlement and improvement as above described prior to January 1, 1888, may complete homestead entry of the person so deceased.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $1,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

Mr. REAGAN. I am not advised about this bill, but I should like to hear the Senator who reported it explain why it is that this land is to be left open to be taken up by homestead entries. It seems to be a military reservation, and doubtless, being a military reservation, it has a primary value attached to it. It seems to me it is proper that the Senate should know whether the land is of great value, and whether there are persons now on it prepared to take it up as soon as the law authorizes them to do so.

Mr. PADDOCK. I will state for the information of the Senator from Texas that the land is not of great value. It is of very ordinary value. It is very common arable land. Some settlers have gone upon it to develop it, and the aim is to put it upon the same footing as the surrounding arid country in Northwestern Nebraska. The land is of very little value. It could not be sold at a dollar and a quarter an acre under the circumstances.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the Senator tell us how long a military post was kept at that place?

Mr. PADDOCK. For a very short time. It was only a temporary post. It was never an important post.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know the particulars.

Mr. PADDOCK. The bill is the unanimous report of the Committee on Public Lands, and was recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. REAGAN. I suppose the committee in passing upon the bill has inquired into it, but it seems to me that the legislation proposed is unusual; and that a military reservation which is of the value that generally attaches to those reservations, after being surveyed, should be sold to the highest bidder. I do not understand why it should be taken up by homestead entries.

Mr. PADDOCK. The bill is in exact accordance with the provisions of all the bills which have been passed with reference to military reservations in that whole region of country. The Fort Kearney military reservation, which was composed of land very much more valuable than this, was disposed of exactly under the provisions of this bill, the aim being to give the poor people who have gone on the land to develop the country the same opportunities that they have under the general homestead law. There is actually no value in this land. I assure the Senator that it is one of the commonest tracts of land there is in this country.

Mr. REAGAN. Of course, if the bill has been examined by the Committee on Public Lands and reported favorably, I shall raise no further objection; but it seems to me that it is rather an unusual thing that a military reservation should be disposed of under pre-emption or homestead.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The Committee on Public Lands reported to amend the preamble in line 1 by striking out the word "State" and inserting "States," and in the same line by striking out the words "Territory of Wyoming" and inserting "Nebraska;" so as to make it read:

Whereas the tract of land in the States of Colorado and Nebraska, known as the Fort Sedgwick military reservation, is no longer needed or used for military purposes, and has been abandoned by the military authorities: Therefore.

The amendment was agreed to.

The preamble as amended was agreed to.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the sale of the Fort Sedgwick military reservation, in the States of Colorado and Nebraska, to actual settlers."

HEIRS OF SOLOMON SPITZER.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask to call up House bill 2699, Calendar number 776.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 2699) for the relief of the heirs of the late Solomon Spitzer was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay $12,500 to the heirs of Solomon Spitzer for the unexpended increase in the work of weighing imports at the port of New York, under his contract with the Secretary of the Treasury, during the year 1879.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why was not the money paid to Spitzer if he had a written contract?

Mr. HISCOCK. The report shows that there was some technical objection to the payment by the Secretary of the Treasury, but he recommended that it be paid by Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report submitted by Mr. STEWART March 21, 1888:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2699) for the relief of the heirs of the late Solomon Spitzer, after having considered the same, submit the following report:

A bill similar to the one under consideration was favorably reported upon by the House Committee on Claims of the first sessions of the Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, and Fiftieth Congresses, and passed the House of Representatives on the 2d instant. The facts in the case are fully stated in the last-mentioned report.

A report made by the committee of Treasury officers appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury to examine into Spitzer's claim in 1880 for extra compensation, and the concurring opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, are hereto attached and also made a part of this report.

In view of the facts stated in the accompanying papers, your committee report back the bill favorably and recommend its passage.

The following is the report of the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives, made on February 14 last, to which is added the above-mentioned report of the committee of Treasury officers and the concurring opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury:

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2699) for the relief of the heirs of Solomon Spitzer, would respectfully report:

"That a similar bill was favorably reported by Mr. TILLMAN, from the Committee on Claims, in the Forty-eighth Congress. Your committee concur in the report, which is hereto annexed, and recommend that it do pass."

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1089) for the relief of Solomon Spitzer, and accompanying papers, have had the same under consideration, and make the following report:

"This bill appropriates the sum of $12,500, or so much thereof as in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury may be necessary, to pay the claim of Solomon Spitzer for the unexpected increase in the work of weighing imports at the port of New York under his contract with the Treasury Department for the year 1879.

"It appears that Spitzer entered into a contract with the Treasury Department to do all the work of weighing imports at the above-named port for three years from February 1, 1878, at a compensation of $75,000 per annum.

"The contract also specified that in case the work was increased more than 10 per cent. by legislative action increasing the classes of weighable goods, the contractor should be entitled to compensation in proportion to the increase, less the 10 per cent. specified.

"An unanticipated increase in the volume of importations took place in the latter part of the year 1879, and the quantity of weighable goods imported continued to increase to such an extent that Spitzer was no longer able to perform his contract, and it was terminated on the 1st of January, 1880. Spitzer presented a claim to the Treasury Department for extra compensation on account of the unexpected increase, and it was referred to a committee of Treasury officers, appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury. They examined the matter carefully, and reported that, under the terms of the contract, Spitzer was equitably entitled to additional compensation to the extent of $12,500, but there was no power vested in the Department to pay same, and recommended legislative action. The Secretary of the Treasury concurred in the report of the committee.

"The average number of tons weighed during each of the six years from 1873 to and including 1878 was 1,104,488, and it is fair to assume bidders for furnishing the labor in question took into consideration, in making their bids to perform the service, the average number of tons weighed during former years. The quantity of goods weighed in 1879 was 1,570,907 tons, or 466,419 tons more than the average of each of the six preceding years, an increase of about 42 per cent., while the price paid by the Government for the labor performed was over $100,000 less than 1877, according to the report of the Treasury officials.

"The collector of the port of New York, the deputy naval officer, and General Curtis all seem to indicate, by communication to the Department on this subject, that in their judgment it would be equitable to allow Mr. Spitzer 33 per cent. in addition to his contract price for such period as the Secretary might deem proper.

"The report of the collector of February 10, 1880, states that according to Spitzer's pay-rolls the labor under the contract cost him $32,000 in 1879 more than the $75,000 received from the Government. He also estimated that during the year 1880 the work done by Spitzer would cost something like $144,000, and experience has shown that this was an underestimate.

"Your committee are therefore of the opinion that as Spitzer made his contract in good faith, and as it is fair to assume, on the estimate as furnished by the Government for the six years preceding 1878, that, in accordance with the said contract, he would be equitably entitled to an addition of 33 per cent. to his contract price for the last half of the year 1879, or $12,500.

"At the commencement of the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, of 1882, Mr. Spitzer came to Washington and presented his claim, and, while here prosecuting said claim, was suddenly taken sick, and died April 13, 1882.

"In view of the foregoing facts, your committee therefore report back the bill, amended so as to pay said amount of $12,500 to the legal representatives of the late Solomon Spitzer, and recommend that it do pass."

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
"Washington, D. C., August 16, 1880.

"SIR: In accordance with instructions contained in the letter of Assistant Secretary French, of the 12th of February last, we have examined the claims of Solomon Spitzer for extra compensation on account of weighing imports at New York, and beg leave to make the following report:

* * * * * * *

"The only other branch of the subject remaining to be considered is, what extra compensation, if any, shall be paid to Spitzer on account of the large increase in the work prior to the 1st of January last, and what period such compensation shall embrace. Is is conceded that the work for which this extra compensation is sought was of a character covered by the contract. If Mr. Spitzer can be paid extra compensation on account of such increase, the following table, furnished by the superintendent of the weighers, Mr. Lake, may be taken as exhibiting the number of tons and cost per ton of weighable goods weighed at the port of New York from 1873 to and including 1879:

Year.	Number of tons weighed.	Expenses of weighing.	Cost per ton of 2,000 pounds.
1873	1,184,386 1938/2000	$367,934.09	$0.31 1/2
1874	1,138,132 750/2000	301,536.30	.26 1/2
1875	1,005,944 1500/2000	314,109.73	.29 1/2
1876	1,057,437 750/2000	301,891.18	.28 1/2
1877	1,097,368 1250/2000	314,294.72	.28 1/2
1878	1,093,662 500/2000	197,467.22	.18 1/2
	6,626,931 662/2000		1.62 1/2
1879	1,570,907 1346/2000	198,207.78	.12 1/2

"Average number of tons weighed during each of the six years from 1873 to and including 1878, 1,104,488.

"Average cost per ton, 0.2713+ cent.

"It is assumed that bidders for furnishing the labor in question took into consideration, in making their bids, the average number of tons weighed during former years. The quantity of goods weighed in 1879 was 466,419 tons more than the average of each of the six preceding years; an increase of about 42 per cent.

"The contract specified that in case the work was increased more than 10 per cent. by legislative action, increasing the classes of weighable goods, the contractor should be entitled to extra compensation in proportion to the increase, less the 10 per cent. specified.

"The collector, by his letter of January 14 (see Exhibit F); the deputy naval officer, by his letter of January 12, and General Curtis, by his report of January 10 (both inclosures of Exhibit F), all seem to indicate that, in the judgment of these officers, it would be equitable to allow Spitzer 33 per cent., in addition to his contract price, for such period as the Secretary may deem proper.

"To form any judgment as to the period of time which this extra compensation should embrace, it is proper to inquire what were the expenses and receipts of Mr. Spitzer in connection with the contract for the year 1879. The report of the collector of February 10, 1880, marked I, states that according to Spitzer's pay-rolls the labor under the contract cost him $32,000 in 1879 more than the $75,000 received from the Government as the contract price. The collector estimates in said letter that during the present year the work done by Spitzer would cost, on the basis of last year's importations, something like $144,000, and later experience has shown that this was a serious underestimate.

"Upon review of all the circumstances, we are of opinion that if Mr. Spitzer has in good faith performed his contract according to its terms, he would be equitably entitled to an addition of 33 per cent. to his contract price for the last half of the year 1879, or $12,500.

"We are, however, of the opinion that no power exists in the Secretary to make this award without legislative sanction.

"Very respectfully,

"J. H. ROBINSON,
"Assistant Solicitor.
"A. K. TINGLE,
"Supervising Special Agent.
"H. B. JAMES,
"Chief Customs Division.

"HON. JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary."

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
"Washington, D. C., March 1, 1881.

"SIR: I am in receipt of a note from the clerk of your committee, dated the 21st ultimo, requesting, on behalf of the subcommittee charged with the preparation of the deficiency bill for 1881, an expression of the views of this Department upon the merits of a bill therewith inclosed for the relief of Solomon Spitzer.

"This bill proposes to appropriate the sum of $12,500, or so much thereof as, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, may be necessary to pay the claim of Solomon Spitzer for the unexpected increase in the work of weighing imports at the port of New York under his contract with this Department for the year 1879.

"Mr. Spitzer entered into a contract with this Department to do all the work of weighing imports at the port of New York for three years from February 1, 1878, at a compensation of $75,000 per annum. This contract was let to Spitzer after public advertisement, he being the lowest bidder.

"A great, and to a large extent unanticipated, increase in the volume of importations took place in the latter part of the year 1879, and the quantity of weighable goods imported continued to increase to such an extent that the contractor was no longer able to perform his contract, and it was accordingly terminated on the 1st of January, 1880.

"After the abrogation of the contract Spitzer presented a claim for extra compensation on account of the heavy and unexpected increase in the volume of the work during the last half of the year 1879, and this claim was referred by me to a committee consisting of the Assistant Solicitor of the Treasury, the chief of the special agent's force, and the chief of the customs division, and I inclose herewith a copy of their report upon the case. Their conclusion was that inasmuch as this work was done while the contract remained in force there was no power vested in the Department to grant the relief sought, but that if Spitzer had faithfully performed the terms of his contract he was equitably entitled to additional compensation to the extent of $12,500. The method by which they arrive at this sum as a basis of compensation is given in their report.

"I know of no facts which lead me to dissent from the conclusion reached by the committee.

"Very respectfully,

"JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

"Hon. J. D. C. ATKINS,
"Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT DULUTH, MINN.

Mr. SABIN. I move to take up the bill (H. R. 7218) for the erection of a public building in the city of Duluth, State of Minnesota.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT DOVER, N. H.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to take up Order of Business 1179, Senate bill 384.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 384) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Dover, in the State of New Hampshire, which was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 4, after the word "purchase," to insert "or acquire by condemnation proceedings or otherwise;" so as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to purchase, or acquire by condemnation proceedings or otherwise, a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with commodious fire-proof vaults, for the accommodation of the post-office, internal-revenue office, and other Government offices at the city of Dover, in the State of New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to read:

The site, and the building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed the cost of $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 1, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to make the section read:

That the sum of $75,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used and expended for the purposes provided in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

T. J. EDWARDS.

Mr. HOAR. I move to take up the bill (H. R. 518) for the relief of T. J. Edwards, administrator of David Edwards, deceased.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to T. J. Edwards, as administrator of the estate of David Edwards, deceased, late of Jackson County, Ohio, $225, for the balance due said David Edwards, deceased, for property taken by the United States Army in 1862.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN F. SHORTER.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Wisconsin will pardon me a moment, I moved the other day, unless I am mistaken in my recollection, to recommit to the Committee on Military Affairs, with the assent of the chairman of that committee, Order of Business 997, being the bill (H. R. 2465) for the relief of the heirs of John F. Shorter, but I find it still stands on the Calendar. I move that the bill be recommitted if it has not already been sent back to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The mistake is in the Calendar, and not in the condition of the business. The bill has been recommitted, and it should be taken from the Calendar.

SURETIES OF DENNIS MURPHY.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 935, Senate bill 1715.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 1715) for the relief of the sureties of Dennis Murphy was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to release from liability the sureties of Dennis Murphy, who was formerly paymaster and military storekeeper at the national armory at Harper's Ferry, Va., upon his official bond to the United States as such paymaster and military storekeeper, executed on the 28th of April, 1858.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF JOSEPH H. MADDOX.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 508, being the bill (S. 2201) for the relief of Laura E. Maddox, widow and executrix, and Robert Morrison, executor of Joseph H. Maddox, deceased.

Mr. COCKRELL. Pending that motion I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. This bill——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. COCKRELL. I withdraw the motion, if the Senator desires to make an explanation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is withdrawn.

Mr. MITCHELL. This bill was reached in regular order three or four weeks ago, and was passed over at the suggestion of a Senator on my own motion. The bill has been twice reported unanimously after careful investigation by the Committee on Claims; and I trust the Senator from Missouri will suspend his motion to adjourn and let the bill be passed.

I will state in addition that there were two bills of the same nature, arising out of similar transactions. One was passed two or three weeks ago and this one was held over so that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] might examine into the matter. He has done so and he withdraws his objection. I appeal to the Senator from Missouri not to interpose any objection by a motion to adjourn, and let us pass this bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I appeal to the Senator from Oregon not to ask the Senate to pass a bill of this character with no quorum here. There is no quorum present; it is past 5 o'clock; and there is no time to discuss this bill, which may involve millions of dollars. I know that when you touch the question of insurrectionary claims, claims for property acquired technically under the law, you touch a very large number of claims. They have been pending here for the last twenty years.

I am not certain whether this comes within the category of those claims or not. If it does I am opposed to it in toto. It may not come within the same rule that would be applied to the others which have been reported adversely time and again by the Committee on Claims; and I believe the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] once reported this claim adversely.

Mr. MITCHELL. No, Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. We want some explanation about it, and I tell the Senator the bill can not be passed now at 5 o'clock without a quorum. There is no use in wasting time with it now.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is not necessary that the Senator from Missouri should make any threats at all. I know he is a just man, and I know he would not do a wrong for anything in the world. I shall not press the bill now, but I ask him to-morrow or this week to look into this case carefully.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will do so.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am quite sure if he will do so he will come to the same conclusion that the Committee on Claims have twice come to unanimously.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will look into it carefully. I shall get all the reports. I see it has been reported twice adversely, and I think I was a member of the committee once when it was reported adversely.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask that the bill retain its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so ordered.

WILLIAM P. GORSUCH.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask the Senate to consider Order of Business 761, House bill 3727.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. 3727) for the relief of William P. Gorsuch was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay William P. Gorsuch, of Carroll County, Maryland, $300, the amount paid by him for commutation, he having been drafted into the military service of the United States after he had arrived at the age of forty-five years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 3, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 2, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

VETO MESSAGE, H. B. WILSON.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the message from the President of the United States, the reading of which was interrupted on yesterday by the adjournment.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 19, entitled "An act for the relief of H. B. Wilson, administrator of the estate of William Tinder, deceased."

The purpose of this bill is to refund to the estate of William Tinder the sum of $5,000 which was paid to the Government by his administrator in June, 1880, upon the following facts:

In 1876 two indictments were found against one Evans, charging him with passing counterfeit money. In May, 1878, he was tried upon one of said indictments and the jury failed to agree; thereupon the prisoner entered into two recognizances in the sum of $5,000 each, with W. R. Evans and William Tinder as sureties, conditioned for the appearance of the prisoner Evans at the next term of the court, in November, 1878, for trial upon said indictment. Before that date, however, the prisoner fled the country and failed to appear according to the condition of his bond. In the mean time William Tinder died and H. B. Wilson was appointed his administrator.

Suits were brought upon the two bail bonds, and the liability of the sureties not being admitted, the suits were tried in March, 1880, resulting in two judgments in favor of the United States and against the surety Evans and the estate of Tinder for $5,000 each and the costs.

Soon thereafter an application was made by the administrator of the estate of William Tinder for relief, and an offer was made by him to pay $5,000 and the costs, in compromise and settlement of the liability of said estate upon said two judgments.

These judgments were a preferred claim against the estate, which was represented to be worth sixteen or eighteen thousand dollars. The other surety, Evans, was alleged to be worthless, and it was claimed that neither the administrator of the Tinder estate nor his attorneys had known the whereabouts of the indicted party since his flight, and that some time would elapse before certain litigation in which the estate was involved could be settled and the claims against it paid.

It was considered best by the officers of the Government to accept the proposition of the administrator, which was done in June, 1880. The sum of $5,099.05, the amount of one of said judgments, with interest and costs, was paid into the United States Treasury, and the estate of Tinder was, in consideration thereof, released and discharged from all liability upon both of said judgments.

Thus was the transaction closed, in exact accordance with the wishes and the prayer of the representative of this estate, and by the favor and indulgence of the Government upon his application. There was, so far as I can learn, no condition attached, and no understanding or agreement that any future occurrence would affect the finality of the compromise by which the Government had accepted one-half of its claim in full settlement.

It appears that in 1881 the party indicted was arrested and brought to trial, which resulted in his conviction. And apparently for this reason alone it is proposed by the bill under consideration to open the settlement made at the request of the administrator and refund to him the sum which he paid on such settlement pursuant to his own offer.

I can see no fairness or justice to the Government in such a proposition. I do not find any statement that the administrator delivered the prisoner to the United States authorities for trial. On the contrary, it appears from an examination made in the First Comptroller's Office that he was arrested by the marshal on the 25th of May, 1881, who charged and was paid his fees therefor. And if the administrator had surrendered the prisoner to justice, it would not entitle him to the repayment of the money he has paid to compromise the two judgments against him.

The temptation to relieve from contracts with the Government upon plausible application is, in my opinion, not sufficiently resisted. But to refund money paid into the public Treasury upon such a liberal compromise as is exhibited in this case seems like a departure from all business principles and an unsafe concession that the interests of the Government are to be easily surrendered.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 1, 1888.

The SPEAKER. What action will the House take with the message?

Mr. WHEELER. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

COLLECTION OF REVENUE, NO MAN'S LAND.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting correspondence and recommending legislation for enforcing the laws for the collection of internal revenue in the Public Land Strip known as "No Man's Land;" which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BRIDGE ACROSS BLACK RIVER, ARKANSAS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2611) to authorize the Batesville and Brinkley Railroad to build a bridge across the Black River in Arkansas; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House for the consideration of this bridge bill at the present time; and hope I will be permitted to state in this connection that the bill has been reported unanimously by the House committee in the exact form here presented. It has also received the approval of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers. I ask unanimous consent, not only to consider the bill now, but also to dispense with the reading of the bill at length, in order to save time. It is provided with all of the usual restrictions placed in bills of this character.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. DINGLEY. I have no objection; but there is another Senate bill which came over on Friday last, relating to the establishment of a certain light-house in Maine; and I ask that I may also be recognized for the purpose of asking the present consideration of that bill.

Mr. ROGERS. I hope the gentleman will let that come up afterwards. I did not object to its consideration.

Mr. MILLS. Let each stand on its own merits.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has withheld from the House, at the suggestion of members who desired to ask unanimous consent, several Senate bills, among them the one to which the gentleman from Maine refers. The Chair has sent for the bill.

Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill referred to by the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is the reading of the bill demanded?

Mr. ROGERS. I hope the reading will be dispensed with.

The reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The bill was considered, ordered to be read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROGERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the House bill No. 6563, upon the same subject, will be laid upon the table.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LIGHT-HOUSE, ETC., FOX ISLAND, MAINE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2506) for the establishment of a light-house, fog-signal, and day beacon in the vicinity of Goose Rocks, Fox Island Thoroughfare, Maine.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be established at or near Goose Rocks, at the entrance of Fox Island Thoroughfare, on the coast of Maine, a light-house and fog-signal, and that there be established at or near Channel Rock, in the vicinity of Goose Rocks, a day beacon, the cost of which shall not exceed the sum of $35,000, including the cost of the sites, and said $35,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for said purposes, is hereby appropriated out of moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. DINGLEY. I wish simply to state, in connection with this bill, that it has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Commerce of the House, with this exception, that in the House bill there is no appropriation, as appears in the present bill, and if unanimous consent is given for the consideration of the bill at this time, I will move to strike out the appropriation, so that it will be precisely the bill reported by the House committee, and also precisely in the form of the bill which was passed a few days ago for the establishment of a light-house on the Florida coast, on motion of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. DAVIDSON]. I will state that this is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury and by the Light-House Board.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRISP. Before consent is given, as I do not see the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] in his seat, who has charge specially of matters referring to light-houses, I would like to know whether this meets his approval?

Mr. DINGLEY. I consulted with the gentleman from Missouri, and he has given his consent to this application.

Mr. CRISP. Then I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection to the present consideration of the Senate bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. I now move to strike out the appropriating clause in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read that portion of the bill proposed to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

And said $35,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for said purposes, is hereby appropriated out of moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DINGLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the House bill No. 1492, upon the same subject, will be laid upon the table.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT NEWPORT NEWS, VIRGINIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1828) to provide for a light-house at Newport News, Middle Ground, Virginia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask for the present consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to cause a light-house to be constructed at Newport News, Middle Ground, Virginia; and $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for this purpose from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRISP. I believe that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY], is now present. I desire to call his attention to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PHELAN].

Mr. CLARDY. Is this a Senate bill?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. CLARDY. It seems to carry an appropriation.

Mr. PHELAN. I am willing to have the appropriation stricken out.

Mr. CLARDY. I ask the gentleman further if the Senate bill conforms in every respect to the House bill.

Mr. PHELAN. It conforms to the House bill exactly, except that the House bill provided for an appropriation of $35,000 and the Senate bill for an appropriation of $50,000, but that being stricken out, there is no cause for objection.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PHELAN] to strike out the appropriating clause will be agreed to.

Mr. CLARDY. I ask if there ought not to be an amendment prescribing the amount which this light-house will cost.

Mr. PHELAN. That can be settled by an appropriation hereafter. The Light-House Board calls for an appropriation of $50,000. The House committee recommended an appropriation of $35,000. The Senate bill calls for an appropriation of $50,000. That can be settled in the future. I ask for the passage of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the appropriating clause, which it is proposed to strike out.

The Clerk read as follows:

And $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for this purpose from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment offered by Mr. PHELAN to strike out the appropriating clause was agreed to

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PHELAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The corresponding House bill (H. R. 1891) to provide for a light-house at Newport News, Middle Ground, Virginia, was laid on the table.

L. J. WORDEN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1064) for the relief of L. J. Worden; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. FUNSTON. I desire to say that I introduced a bill like this in the House, which has been favorably reported. I also introduced a similar bill in the last Congress, and it was favorably reported. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill be now considered, and that the House bill be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The Senate bill will be read.

The bill (S. 1064) was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster-General be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to allow L. J. Worden, late postmaster at Lawrence, Kans., for expenditures made by said L. J. Worden for clerk-hire necessary for the proper transaction of the business of said post-office during the period from July 1, 1882, to June 30, 1883, the sum of $625; and that a sum sufficient to pay said allowance is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRISP. I ask if that bill has been considered by the House committee?

Mr. FUNSTON. It was considered in the last Congress by the House committee and favorably reported. A similar bill was introduced in this House and has been favorably reported.

Mr. CRISP. In this Congress?

Mr. FUNSTON. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FUNSTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The corresponding House bill (H. R. 2265) was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GROSVENOR, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BOWEN, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I now call for the regular order, and move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to call attention to the fact that the Nicaragua Government has asked this Government to permit one of their youths to be educated at the West Point Military Academy. A House bill giving that permission has been reported. A Senate bill for the same purpose has been received, and I ask that it be passed.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] has called for the regular order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This is not a private request. It is a matter of international courtesy, and I hope the gentleman will yield long enough to allow that bill to be passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has declined to withdraw his call for the regular order, and the Chair has no discretion. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports to make from committees may have leave to hand them to the Clerk for reference to the appropriate Calendars.

There was no objection.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

ALASKA SEAL FISHERIES.

Mr. DUNN, from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, reported back favorably the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries be authorized and directed to fully and thoroughly investigate the fur-seal fisheries of Alaska, and all contracts or leases made by the Government with any persons or companies for the taking of fur seals or other fur-bearing animals in Alaska; the character, duration, and conditions of such contracts or leases; and whether and to what extent the same have been enforced and complied with or violated; the receipts therefrom, and the expenses incurred by the Government on account of any such contracts or leases; and to fully investigate and report upon the nature and extent of the rights and interests of the United States in the fur-seal and other fisheries in the Bering Sea, in Alaska; whether and to what extent the same have been violated, and by whom; and what, if any, legislation is necessary for the better protection and preservation of the same; that said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers, issue process, summon witnesses, administer oaths, etc., and to employ a clerk, stenographer, and messenger, whose compensation shall not exceed $6 a day while so employed; and that all expenses of such investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

DEFICIENCY IN EXPENSES OF COLLECTING CUSTOMS REVENUE.

Mr. BURNES, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 9788) making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN FARLOW.

Mr. PIDCOCK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2014) granting a pension to John Farlow; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RACHAEL A. SINKINSON.

Mr. PIDCOCK also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1101) granting a pension to Rachael A. Sinkinson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL NOBLE.

Mr. OATES, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2202) for the relief of Samuel Noble; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SANDY HOOK SHIP-CHANNELS.

Mr. CATCHINGS, from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, reported back resolution moved by Mr. SPINOLA April 30, 1888, with the following substitute therefor; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the House of Representatives a detailed statement of the work being done in deepening the Sandy Hook ship-channels, giving the terms of the present contract, the facilities of the contractors for doing the work, the amount of material removed by the said contractors to date, and the estimated amount of material yet to be removed under the contract, and also at the present rate of progress what length of time will be required to exhaust the present appropriation of $750,000, and why the work has not been pushed forward more rapidly.

ACADEMIC BUILDING AND GYMNASIUM, WEST POINT.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. 9409) for the erection of an academic building and gymnasium at West Point; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, WATERBURY, CONN.

Mr. SOWDEN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 7729) for the erection of a public building at Waterbury, Conn.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

POLICE MATRONS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. ATKINSON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 8039) providing for the appointment of police matrons for the District of Columbia, defining their duties, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEEDS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 9804) to validate acknowledgment of deeds made before commissioners of the circuit courts of the United States or before any of the commissioners of the supreme court of the District of Columbia since the 16th of September, 1850; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 738) granting a pension to the guardian of Enos J. Searles, of Clermont County, Ohio.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the joint resolution (H. Res. 56) authorizing the use and improvement of Castle Island, in Boston Harbor.

The message further announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2345) authorizing the construction of bridges across the Cape Fear River and the Northeast River in the State of North Carolina, asked a conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. RANSOM, Mr. VEST, and Mr. SAWYER.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. 1913) for the erection of a public building at Emporia, Kans.; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

TARIFF.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the collection of taxes is one of the admitted functions of government; but how they should be collected, in what proportion imposed on different industries and individuals, and for what purposes are still vexed questions that nearly affect the interests of the people. No class is disposed to cavil at any tax or system of taxation merely intended to raise revenue for the support of the Government, honestly and economically administered; but it is claimed that this is the limit of the power, and certainly it is the measure of the duty of the Government in respect to taxation. It is claimed that the Government has no right to take from the people by taxation a sum more than commensurate with its needs, or to tax, directly or indirectly, A, B, and C for the purpose of enriching D. When a greater sum is raised by taxation than is demanded for governmental purposes, even though it is retained in the Treasury vaults, the people have a right to complain. Excessive or unnecessary taxation takes from the people what is theirs, and what they have a right to retain and use, and the unnecessary accumulation of money in the Treasury merely adds to the wrong, for it can only have the effect of appreciating the price or value of money and depreciating the price of every other species of property. To the masses of the people such a policy is especially unjust and oppressive. As has been said by an eminent writer on economics:

Federal taxes, both direct and indirect, with very few exceptions, are levied on commodities, fall on consumption, and must be paid by the consumer in the increased price of the things he consumes. Hence it follows that the burden of such taxes must be disproportionately heavier on the man who, from necessity, expends all or nearly all of his wages, salary, or other income, in mere living, than on him who expends one-half or one-third, or a smaller proportion of his income for like purposes, and lays up a surplus for increasing his resources. * * * Every dollar raised by the Government by taxation for any other purpose than to provide revenue for its most economical administration, constitutes, therefore, a heavier burden on the recipients of smaller incomes and wages than upon any other class of the community.

The taxes levied in the States are imposed on the property, every one paying in proportion to his wealth and ability. But tariff taxes often fall more heavily upon the necessaries of the poor than upon the luxuries of the rich. The poor man's blankets or his wife's cloak or shawl pay a tariff five or ten times as high as the rich man's diamonds.

By overtaxation we have now in the Treasury more than $100,000,000, and for a number of years we have had an unnecessary accumulation of the money of the people withdrawn from the circulating medium of the country. The amount of this drain on the country is not at once appreciated. David A. Wells, one of our best thinkers and writers on economics, in an article published in the Princeton Review a few years ago, said:

Recent investigations have shown that, accepting the highest reasonable estimate that can be made of the value of the annual product of the nation, and supposing the same to be equally divided among our present population, the average income of each person, out of which subsistence, savings, education, means of enjoyment, reparation of waste, and taxes are to be provided, would not be in excess of 50, probably not over 40, cents per day. But, as a practical matter, we know that the annual product is not divided equally, and never can be, and some receive the annual average as stated multiplied by hundreds and thousands, which of course necessitates that very many others shall receive proportionately less.

When, now, it is further considered that the present aggregate of Federal, State, and municipal taxation in the United States probably amounts to 7 per cent. on the value of the entire annual product of the country, and that the unnecessary taxation of $100,000,000 which the Federal Government now collects from the people is equal to 15 or 20 per cent. of what the whole people annually save from the product of their labors (taking no account of the additional burden which the imposition of such taxation entails through increased prices), it is possible to form some idea of how a fiscal policy of large taxation, which so many politicians and so-called statesmen advocate as in the interest of the masses, fearfully trenches on the narrow measure of comfort which the masses under the most favorable circumstances can obtain.

Such taxes—

Says Mr. Atkinson, alluding to the fact before noticed that the Federal taxes fall on commodities—take from the many what they may actually need for a bare subsistence. They must fall with the greatest hardship on those whose earnings for their families are less, on the average, than a dollar a day to each adult man and woman; and while our present excess of national taxation may be equal to only 15 per cent. of the possible savings of the whole people, they may take 100 per cent.—even the little all—of what the poor man may save.

In addition to the direct injury to the general business of the country and to the individual citizen such an accumulation in the Treasury is demoralizing in the extreme. It is an incentive to the multiplication of offices, the increase of salaries, and to extravagant, if not corrupt, expenditures generally. It can not be necessary to enlarge on the wrong of overtaxation or the evils of such a surplus. All will, at least in theory, admit them. The President has at different times called the attention of Congress to the situation and its dangers.

The questions therefore arise, What is the remedy? Why is it not applied?

To answer these questions it is necessary to take a brief retrospect of our system of Federal taxation, and to look at the reasons why it was adopted and why and by what means retained.

At the breaking out of the war of the rebellion, the "Morrill tariff bill," so called, was enacted, which was an increase of the then existing tariff. Even that increase was not demanded by the manufacturers, as was declared by their friends on the floor of Congress, and there is certainly no reason to suppose that the manufacturers asked for a higher tariff than that of the Morrill bill, in 1861.

But during the war very heavy internal taxes having been imposed on nearly every class of business, the import taxes were accordingly raised. This was a simple act of justice to our manufacturers, for it would otherwise have been impossible for them to bear the burdens of our high internal-revenue taxes and compete with outside untaxed competitors. The tariff on imports was therefore raised, but with the distinct understanding expressed by the advocates of the tariff and the friends of the manufacturers on the floor of Congress, that the measure should be only temporary as an offset to the internal taxes. The several bills increasing the tariff were passed with this distinct understanding. Mr. MORRILL, in a speech introducing one of the bills, used this language:

It will be indispensable for us to revise the tariff on foreign imports so far as it may be seriously disturbed by any internal duties, and to make proper reparation. * * * If we bleed manufacturers, we must see to it that the proper tonic is administered at the same time.

And Mr. Stevens said:

We intended to impose an additional duty on imports equal to the tax which had been put on the domestic article. It was done by way of compensation to domestic manufacturers against foreign importers.

These gentlemen had charge of the bills and were, as it is well known, leading protectionists.

The three revenue acts of June, 1864—practically one measure—were the greatest measure of taxation the world had ever seen. The first provided for an enormous extension of the internal-tax system; the second for a corresponding increase in duties on imports; and the third authorized a loan of $400,000,000. The first two were understood to be and advocated as companion acts, one the complement of the other—the first made necessary by the second, and only to exist while the second existed.

When the war was terminated, its floating debt paid, and the then exciting questions of reconstruction disposed of, the attention of Congress was naturally called to the reduction of taxation. Then common fairness and the previous solemn understanding obviously required that in proportion as the internal taxes were abated the tariff on imports, imposed during the war and as a war measure, should also be abated. Mr. MORRILL, who, as I have said, was an extreme protectionist and the author of the tariff bills, said in 1870:

For revenue purposes, and not solely for protection, 50 per cent. in many instances has been added to the tariff (during the war) to enable our home trade to bear the new but indispensable burdens of internal taxation. Already we have relinquished most of such taxes. So far, then, as protection is concerned, * * * we may safely remit the percentage of tariff on a considerable part of our foreign importations. * * * It is a mistake of the friends of a sound tariff to insist upon the extreme rates imposed during the war if less will raise the necessary revenue. * * * Whatever percentage of duties was imposed on our foreign goods to cover internal taxation on home manufactures could not now be claimed as lawful prize of protection when such taxes have been repealed. There is no longer an equivalent.

In the year 1870, and prior years, it was estimated that an annual reduction had been made in internal-revenue taxes as follows:

By act of 1866	$65,000,000
By act of 1867	40,000,000
By act of 1868	23,000,000
By act of 1869	45,000,000
By act of 1870	55,000,000

So far as they affected the manufacturers the internal-revenue taxes were wiped out. The people had, therefore, a right to demand that the promised reductions should be made in the taxation on imports. But during the war and the years following the protectionists had seen many fortunes made—I should rather say acquired—in a few years, and they thought this their opportunity. And our princely masters—for, disguise it as we may, they have dominated us for years—insisted on retaining, and do still substantially retain, what was conceded to them by the patriotism of the people as a war measure, on the express understanding that when the pressure of internal taxes should cease the pressure of their exactions should also cease.

The good old rule
Sufficeth them, the simple plan,
That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can.

It is difficult to consider this subject with equanimity. But perhaps we should not be too severe in our condemnation of the course of these monopolists, for when has ever any class of people willingly surrendered such an advantage? It is hardly to be expected that a few favored classes should, without a struggle, consent to the surrender of their power to levy tribute upon the people. Self-interest obscures the moral sense of all men. These lines of Scotland's great poet are almost as true as the precepts of Holy Writ:

But, och! mankind is unco weak,
And little to be trusted,
If self the wavering balance shake
It's rarely right adjusted.

For the last few years the contest has been going on, and growing hotter and hotter, between the monopolists on one side, fighting like feudal lords of the middle ages for the right to compel the masses of the people to contribute to their magnificence, and, on the other side, the people, in almost an unorganized condition, resisting the injustice and oppression. The contest is an instructive one; humiliating to the people in some respects, it is true, because at the bidding of party hacks they have permitted themselves to be overborne by a handful of capitalists; but nevertheless its lessons, if carefully read and pondered, can not be without advantage.

Though the internal taxes had been so largely reduced, the annual receipts of the Government had become greater than its needs, with a certainty that the surplus would increase annually. There was, therefore, a necessity for a reduction of taxes. One class or party in Congress insisted that the reduction should be made so as to lessen the taxes on the necessaries of the people, according to the understanding when the tariff was increased, while the other side insisted that the reduction should be so made as to lessen or abate the taxes on the property of the wealthy class and on those articles the tax on which bore heavily on no one. The latter class succeeded.

So, that the very truth may appear, I refer to the record.

In 1870, a bill being before the House to regulate internal taxes and for other purposes, Mr. HOLMAN moved an amendment imposing—a tax of 10 per cent. per annum on the interest and income accruing from all bonds, notes, and other securities of the United States, the same to be deducted and withheld from such interest at the time of payment thereof by the Treasurer of the United States—

Which was disagreed to—yeas 46, nays 135; of the yeas all were Democrats but 3; of the nays all were Republicans but 5.

Mr. BECK moved to—amend by levying a tax of 5 per cent. on the interest or coupons of all bonds or evidences of debt, including United States bonds.

Which was disagreed to—yeas 78, nays 111. Of the yeas all were Democrats but 26; of the nays all were Republicans but 2.

This bill being in the Senate in the same year, Mr. Bayard moved to amend by adding the following words:

That hereafter there shall be annually deducted and withheld by the Treasurer of the United States 5 per cent. of all moneys payable as interest upon the public debt of the United States, the same being hereby imposed as a tax upon the property represented by the bonds heretofore issued under the laws of the United States.

Which was disagreed to—yeas 12, nays 36. Of the yeas 8 were Democrats and 4 Republicans; of the nays all were Republicans.

Mr. Thurman moved to amend by adding the following words:

That there shall be levied and collected in the manner hereinafter specified a tax of 5 per cent. upon the income of every person residing in the United States, and of every citizen of the United States residing abroad, derived from interest on the bonds of the United States, said tax to be collected by withholding the same in the payment of such interest.

Which was disagreed to—yeas 11, nays 35. Of the yeas all were Democrats but 3; of the nays all were Republicans.

At the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress (1882) a bill was pending, the first section of which was in the following words:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the passage of this act, except as hereinafter provided, the taxes hereinafter specified, imposed by internal-revenue laws now in force, be, and the same are hereby, repealed, namely: The stamp tax on bank-checks, drafts, orders, and vouchers; the tax on the capital and deposits of banks and bankers, under section 3408 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended; the tax of capital and deposits of national-banks, under section 5214 of the Revised Statutes; * * * the tax on matches, perfumery, medicinal preparations, other articles, imposed by Schedule A, following section 3437, of said Revised Statutes.

On the passage of that bill there were yeas 127, nays 80; of the yeas all were Republicans but 23, of the nays all were Democrats but 16, and of those 16 four were Independents.

When this bill reached the Senate Mr. GEORGE moved to limit the repeal of the stamp tax to checks, etc., under $100 in amount; which was disagreed to—yeas 19, nays 39; of the yeas all were Democrats, of the nays all were Republicans but 7, two of whom were Independents.

Mr. GEORGE then moved to strike from the bill that part which relieved from tax the capital and deposits of banks and bankers, and which repealed the stamp tax on bank checks, drafts, orders, and vouchers; which was disagreed to—yeas 15, nays 41; the yeas were all Democrats; the nays all Republicans but 8; one of the 8 was an Independent.

Mr. BECK then moved to strike from the bill that clause which took the tax off perfumery, medicinal preparations, and other articles. ("Other articles" here included pills, powders, tinctures, troches, lozenges, sirups, cordials, bitters, anodynes, tonics, plasters, liniments, salves, ointments, waters, essences, spirits, oils, or other medicinal preparations; in fine, it included all that class of medicines.) On this amendment of Mr. BECK there were—yeas 26, nays 29; the yeas were all Democrats, the nays all Republicans but 2, and they were Independents.

Mr. VANCE then moved to amend as follows:

Except playing-cards, after the words "Schedule A," so as to retain the stamp tax on playing-cards.

Which was disagreed to—yeas 28, nays 28; of the yeas all were Democrats; the nays were all Republicans but 1, and he an Independent.

Up until 1883, when on many articles a considerable reduction was made, the war taxes had remained, with slight modification, on all necessaries of the people. In that year complaints of the people became too loud to be ignored. Hence, some tariff legislation became absolutely necessary, and I beg leave to call attention to the record of the struggle that followed.

A bill pending in the Senate in that year, fixing the rate of duties on certain articles, contained the following clause:

All other earthen, stone, and crockery ware, white-glazed, branded, painted, and dipped or cream-colored, composed of earthy or mineral substances not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 50 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. VANCE moved to substitute 25 per cent. for 50 per cent., which was rejected—yeas 20, nays 27; the yeas were all Democrats but 1, the nays all Republicans but 3, one of the 3 being a Liberal.

Mr. BECK thereupon moved to substitute 40 per cent., which was rejected—yeas 17, nays 23; the yeas being all Democrats, the nays all Republicans but 2, one of whom was a Liberal.

Mr. VANCE moved thereupon to substitute 45 per cent., which was rejected—yeas 20, nays 28; the yeas being all Democrats, nays all Republicans but 4, one of whom was a Liberal.

Pending the following clause of the same bill—

Porcelain and Bohemian glass, painted glassware, stained glass, and all other manufactures of glass, or of which glass shall be a component material of chief value, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 45 per cent. ad valorem—

Mr. BECK moved to amend so as to reduce the duty to 40 per cent. ad valorem, which was rejected—yeas 16, nays 25; the yeas being all Democrats but 1, the nays all Republicans but 3, one of whom was a Liberal.

Pending the same bill Mr. INGALLS moved to strike out the clause imposing a tariff on lumber, laths, shingles, clapboards, etc., the object being to place these on the free-list, which was agreed to—yeas 25, nays 23. The yeas were all Democrats but 5, one of whom was a Liberal, and the nays were all Republicans but 1. This amendment was subsequently defeated by the Republicans.

Pending the following clause of the same bill—

Bar-iron, rolled or hammered, comprising flats less than 1 inch wide and not less than three-eighths of an inch thick, nine-tenths of a cent per pound; comprising round iron not less than three-fourths of an inch in diameter, and square iron, not less than three-fourths of an inch square, 1 cent per pound; comprising flats less than 1 inch wide or less than three-eighths of 1 inch, round iron less than three-fourths of an inch and not less than seven-sixteenths of an inch in diameter, and square iron less than three-fourths of an inch square, 1.2 cents per pound—

Mr. BECK moved to amend by making—

Bar-iron, rolled or hammered, comprising flats not less than an inch wide nor less than three-eighths of an inch thick, and round iron not less than three-fourths of an inch in diameter, and square iron of not less than three-fourths of an inch square, seven-tenths of a cent per pound; comprising flats less than 1 inch wide or less than three-eighths of an inch thick; round iron less than three-fourths of an inch and not less than seven-sixteenths of an inch in diameter; and square iron not less than three-fourths of an inch square, eight-tenths of 1 cent per pound.

Which was rejected—yeas 25, nays 33; the yeas were all Democrats, the nays all Republicans but 4, two of whom were Liberals.

In the same bill was the following clause:

Iron or steel T-rails weighing not over 25 pounds to the yard, and iron or steel flat rails punched, nine-tenths of 1 cent per pound.

Pending which Mr. Bayard moved to make the rate seven-tenths of 1 cent per pound, which was rejected—yeas 24, nays 26. Of the yeas all were Democrats but 1; of the nays all were Republicans but 2.

In the same bill, pending a clause taxing boiler or other plate iron 1.3 cents per pound, Mr. BECK moved to reduce the tax to 1¼ cents per pound, which was agreed to—yeas 28, nays 25. Of the yeas all were Democrats but 3, one of whom was a Liberal; of the nays all were Republicans but 1, and he a Liberal.

In the same bill, pending the following clause—

Wrought iron or steel spikes, nuts, and washers, and horse, mule, or ox shoes, 2 cents per pound—

Mr. VANCE moved to reduce the rate to 1½ cents, which was rejected—yeas 23, nays 25; the yeas were all Democrats, the nays all Republicans.

Pending this clause—

Iron or steel blacksmiths' hammers and sledges, track-tools, wedges, and crowbars, 2½ cents per pound—

Mr. VANCE moved to reduce the rate to 2 cents, which was rejected—yeas 18, nays 21. The yeas were all Democrats, the nays all Republicans but 1, and he an Independent.

Pending this clause—

Horseshoe nails, hob nails, and wire nails, and all other wrought-iron or steel nails, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 4 cents per pound—

Mr. COKE moved to reduce the rate to 2½ cents, which was rejected—yeas 22, nays 23; the yeas all Democrats, the nays all Republicans.

Pending this clause—

Hand, back, and all other saws, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 40 per cent. ad valorem—

Mr. COKE moved to make the rate 20 per cent., which was rejected—yeas 21, nays 27; yeas all Democrats, nays all Republicans.

Pending this clause—

That on all kinds of iron or steel articles or manufactures of iron or steel hereinbefore in this act enumerated, when galvanized or coated with any metal or compound, alloy, or mixture of metals, by any process whatever, there shall be paid one-half cent per pound in addition to the rates provided in this act—

Mr. SAULSBURY moved to amend by inserting after the word "enumerated" the words—

Except wire used for fencing only between sizes 8 and 13—

Which was not agreed to—yeas 27, nays 27; yeas being all Democrats but 1, the nays all Republicans but 2, and they were Liberals. It will be seen that the scope and effect of this amendment, if adopted, was to except fence-wire from the additional burden imposed by this act.

Pending this clause—

Hollow-ware, coated, glazed, or tinned, 3 cents per pound—

Mr. VANCE moved to make the rate 2½ cents, which was rejected—yeas 19, nays 22; the yeas all Democrats but 2, one of whom was a Liberal; nays all Republicans.

Pending this clause—

Potato or corn starch, 1 cent per pound; rice starch, 2½ cents per pound; other starch, 2½ cents per pound—

Mr. HALE moved to make the first-named rate 2 cents, which was agreed to—yeas 28, nays 24; the yeas all Republicans but 2, and they were Liberals; the nays all Democrats.

Pending this clause—

Cotton thread, yarn warps or warped yarn, whether single or advanced beyond the condition of single by twisting two or more single yarns together, whether in beams or in bundles, skeins, or cops, or any other form, value not exceeding 25 cents, 10 cents per pound; valued at over 25 cents and not exceeding 40 cents per pound, 16 cents per pound; valued at over 40 cents per pound and not exceeding 50 cents per pound, 22 cents per pound; valued at over 50 cents per pound and not exceeding 60 cents per pound, 27 cents per pound; valued at over 60 cents per pound and not exceeding 70 cents per pound, 35 cents per pound; valued at over 70 cents per pound and not exceeding 80 cents per pound, 40 cents per pound; valued at over 80 cents per pound and not exceeding $1 per pound, 50 cents per pound; valued at over a dollar per pound, 50 per cent. ad valorem—

Mr. HARRIS moved to place upon all the classifications one uniform rate of 30 per cent. ad valorem, which was rejected—yeas 23, nays 30; yeas all Democrats but 2, nays all Republicans but 2.

Mr. HARRIS then moved to make a uniform rate of 35 per cent. ad valorem, which was rejected—yeas 24, nays 25; yeas all Democrats but 1, nays all Republicans but 2, one of whom was a Liberal.

Mr. HARRIS then moved to make a uniform rate of 40 per cent. ad valorem, which was rejected—yeas 25, nays 26; yeas all Democrats but 2, nays all Republicans.

Mr. BECK then moved to change the rate first named from 10 cents to 7½ cents per pound, which was rejected—yeas 25, nays 26; the yeas all Democrats, nays all Republicans but 1, and he a Liberal.

Pending this clause—

On stockings, hose, half-hose, shirts, and drawers, fashioned, narrowed, or shaped wholly or in part by knitting machines or frames, or knit by hand, and composed wholly of cotton, 45 per cent. ad valorem—

Mr. BECK moved to make the rate 35 per cent. ad valorem, which was rejected—yeas 27, nays 27; yeas all Democrats but 1, and he a Liberal; nays all Republicans but 1.

Mr. BECK then moved to make it 40 per cent. ad valorem, which was agreed to—yeas 31, nays 24; the yeas were all Democrats but 4, one of whom was a Liberal; nays all Republicans.

Pending this clause—

Spool thread of cotton, 7 cents per dozen spools containing on each spool not exceeding 100 yards of thread; exceeding 100 yards on each spool, for every additional 100 yards of thread or fractional part thereof in excess of 100 yards, 7 cents a dozen—

Mr. BECK moved to strike out "7" where it occurs and insert "6," which was rejected—yeas 26, nays 28; the yeas being all Democrats but 2; the nays were all Republicans but 2.

Pending this clause—

And like manufactures of jute or jute butts (materials used for cotton bales, sacks, and bags), or in which jute or jute butts shall be component material of chief value, 20 per cent. ad valorem—

(The effect of this amendment was to reduce the tariff on this article from 35 to 20 per cent.)

This was agreed to—yeas 25, nays 18; the yeas were all Democrats but 5, one of whom was a Liberal; the nays were all Republicans.

Pending this clause—

Women's and children's dress goods, coats, linens, Italian goods, and goods of like description now or heretofore known as worsted stuffs, the warp of which was made wholly of cotton, linen, ramie, china grass, or other vegetable materials, or of a combination of them, and the woof of which is made wholly or in part of wool, worsted, or hair of the alpaca, goat, or other like animal, valued at not exceeding 20 cents per square yard, 5 cents per square yard, and in addition thereto 35 per cent. ad valorem; valued at above 20 cents per square yard, 7 cents per square yard, and in addition thereto 40 per cent. ad valorem—

Mr. VANCE moved to strike from the clause all after the word "animal" and insert in lieu thereof the words "fifty per cent. ad valorem."

(It will be observed this would have been a considerable reduction.)

This was rejected—yeas 26, nays 27. Of the yeas all were Democrats, the nays all Republicans but 1, who was a Liberal.

Pending this clause—

Precious stones of all kinds, 10 per cent. ad valorem—

Mr. VANCE moved to make the clause read—

Diamonds, cut or uncut, and precious stones of all kinds, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Which was agreed to—yeas 21, nays 18. Of the yeas all were Democrats but 3, nays all Republicans.

Pending this clause—

Free-list—

Mr. HAWLEY moved to strike therefrom "garden seeds" (so as to make garden seeds subject to tariff); which was rejected—yeas 25, nays 32. The yeas were all Republicans but 1 Liberal, nays all Democrats but 5, one of them a Liberal.

Pending this clause—

Salt in bags, sacks, barrels, or other packages, 10 cents per 100 pounds; in bulk, 6 cents per 100 pounds—

Mr. VANCE moved to strike out, with the view to put salt on the free-list; which was rejected—yeas 22, nays 24; the yeas all Democrats but 2, nays all Republicans but 2.

These references sufficiently illustrate the position and policy of the parties. Some of the votes above referred to would seem to show that those in favor of tariff reduction had succeeded on certain propositions, but in nearly all, I believe in all, such cases on a subsequent vote they were overruled. These facts and figures should be carefully considered. With a heavy tax on the tools and machinery of the mechanic, the implements of the farmer, and the clothing of all classes, from the swaddling-cloth to the shroud, and on nearly every article that is a part of the common needs of the people, a tax varying from 25 to 100 per cent., and in many instances heavier on the necessaries of the poor than on the luxuries of the rich; with a constant augmentation of the surplus in the Treasury, increasing the value of money and decreasing the value of all other property; with the wealth of the country accumulating in an unprecedented degree in the hands of a few favored classes; and with the burden of taxation pressing heavily on the laboring and producing classes, we had this singular spectacle—the leaders of a great party of the country, backed and impelled by the money power and the monopolists (generally the same persons), struggling contrary to a solemn understanding to retain the war taxes on the necessaries of the people and to remove all taxes from the property and luxuries of the wealthy.

The people asked for bread, and they were given a stone; for a fish, and they were given a serpent. They asked to have the taxes, heavy beyond precedent in any other country in the world, lessened on the things that are necessary, not only to their comfort but to their very existence, and the answer to their prayer was the removal of the taxes from bank deposits, bank stock, incomes from United States bonds, playing-cards, perfumery, cosmetics, and many other such articles.

I do not argue that because an act was passed or defeated while either party had a numerical majority in Congress therefore that party is necessarily responsible wholly or at all for the act or its defeat. No party, either political or religious, can fairly be held blamable for the vote or act of every individual who calls himself by its name. Self-interest or lack of principle will always affect the conduct of a few.

But all the legislation to which I have above referred was enacted while the Republican party was in power in every branch of the Government, and these measures were carried by a majority of its members, approximating to unanimity. They, therefore, must be admitted to have been Republican measures. On that proposition the record leaves no ground for discussion.

I now wish to refer to two other measures originating in the House while the Democrats were in the majority in that body. I refer to the Morrison tariff bills, so called, of 1884 and 1886, respectively.

In 1884 Mr. Morrison introduced a bill to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes, by the provisions of which the tariff was reduced 20 per cent. on manufactures of wool, metal, sugar, earthenware, glassware, and certain other articles, it being expressly provided that nothing in the act should operate to reduce the duty so imposed on any article below the rate at which said article was dutiable under the Morrill tariff of 1861, to which I have above referred. This Morrison bill of 1884 placed on the free-list coal, timber, shingles, laths, and lumber. The Committee of the Whole voted to strike out the enacting clause—156 ayes to 151 noes, in which the House concurred by a vote of 159 ayes to 155 noes. This killed the bill. This was done without offering even a single amendment. In other words, it was a refusal to even consider the question of a reduction of the tariff. Of the 159 ayes there were 41 Democrats and 118 Republicans, and of the 155 noes there were 151 Democrats and 4 Republicans.

In 1886 Mr. Morrison again, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill to reduce the tariff. By its provisions the tariff was reduced on woolen and cotton goods, on glass, manufactures of metal, and other articles of prime necessity. Timber, lumber, laths, shingles, wool, flax, hemp, jute butts, and other articles of necessity were put on the free-list. On a motion to consider this bill there were 140 ayes, 157 noes. Of the affirmative vote, 135 were Democrats, 1 Greenback Democrat, and 4 Republicans. Of the negative vote, 121 were Republicans, 1 Greenback Republican, and 35 Democrats. So the House refused even to consider the subject of the reduction of the tariff.

I wish here, Mr. Chairman, to emphasize these facts: (1) That in the Morrison bill of 1884 it was expressly provided that nothing in that act should operate to reduce the duty imposed thereby on any article below the rate at which said article was dutiable under the Morrill tariff bill of 1861; (2) that when the duty was raised above that in the Morrill bill of 1861 it was with the distinct understanding that the increase should only be retained so long as the internal-revenue taxes imposed on the protective industries should be retained; (3) that long before the Morrison bill of 1884 was introduced the internal-revenue taxes affecting the protected industries had been removed; and (4) that notwithstanding these facts, the protectionists, including all the Republicans in the House but four, refused to even consider the question of reducing the tariff.

I would not be justified in spending time to further refer to the position of the parties on this question. If anything can be established beyond the possibility of a doubt, it is this: That the Republicans in Congress of late years have, with almost unanimity, been opposed to even considering the question of a reduction of the tariff on necessaries of the people and in favor of reducing or abating the tax on the wealth and luxuries of the rich, and the record shows with equal clearness that the Democrats in Congress, with the exception of certain ones residing in districts where manufacturers and monopolists are powerful, have have been opposed to taking the tariff from the luxuries and wealth of the country and in favor of reducing it on the necessaries of the people.

It is here proper to inquire more particularly what protection is and what are now the demands of the protectionists. The demands of the protectionists are not what they were in the days of Henry Clay, nor, as I have shown, what they were at the commencement of the late war. Their demands are each year greater. On this question I will first let one of the most prominent Republicans and at the same time one of the ablest men of our country, the late Emory A. Storrs, speak. In 1870 he delivered a speech before a meeting of farmers at Springfield, Ill., which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A surplus so gigantic demonstrates, better than any argument could possibly do, that taxation is unnecessarily high. Still there stands, in a time of profound peace, an enormous tariff, the effect of which is felt in every department of business, and the maintenance of which enhances the cost of living to every man in the land. Why should that tariff be continued? The fact of the surplus demonstrates that it is not necessary for the support of the Government, and so those who are interested in maintaining it are compelled to place their demands upon what they call the "protection of American industry."

I will inquire precisely what is meant by protecting American industry? Against what or against whom is American industry to be protected? Who attacks or proposes to attack American industry? How is the attack made? Is American industry so feeble that it can not, without assistance from the Government, protect itself? These are all vital questions. If no one is attacking American industry, it needs no protection. The forms of American industry are wonderfully diversified. The great body of the farmers of the country constitute a large element of what may be called American industry, and I know of no attack upon them so serious in its character as that made by the tariff; and if the farmers need protection against anything it is against protection. There are thousands of printers in the country; who attacks or proposes to attack them? No one, except it be the tariff, which enhances the cost of material with which their industry is carried on, of the clothes which they wear, of the coal which they burn, of the lumber with which their homes are built, of the salt which they consume, and of the books which they read. There are thousands of shipbuilders in the country; who attacks them and their interests, and from what enemy do they need to be protected? The deserted ship-yards of the East answer this question—they need to be protected against protection, and that is all the protection they need. The thousands and hundreds of thousands of carpenters and joiners, boot and shoemakers, blacksmiths, and the daily toilers with their hands, upon the land or upon the sea, are threatened with an attack against which, for their own protection, the interveation of the Government is necessary.

I apprehend that should the Government levy a direct tax upon all the property of the country, to be paid over directly to iron manufacturers, so that they might be enabled to hold their own against the competition of the foreign manufacturers, but few would be found who would justify such an exercise of the power of taxation. When reduced to its exact practical operations, the protection of American industry, so called, is simply the forcible taking from the consumer of a portion of his earnings and handing it over to the manufacturer. The proposition to the consumer is simply this: We, the Government, will take from you 10 or 15 or 20 per cent. of your earnings and give it to the manufacturer, and he will spend it so much more judiciously than you would; that ultimately and in the process of time it will in some curious and circuitous manner which we have not the time to explain now redound more greatly to your advantage than it would had you spent it yourself and for yourself.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. These words are not less appropriate and truthful now than they were then.

The tariff on many of the necessaries of the people is double what it was before the imposition of the war tax, and while the duty paid at the custom-houses on importations is the measure of the sum collected by the Government, it is not the measure of the sum paid by the people. This will be apparent when it is considered that the foreign manufacturer can not afford to sell his goods in our market at less than their value plus the duty paid to the Government, nor can he sell at a price higher than that at which our goods of home manufacture of a like kind are sold. If he pays 25 or 50 per cent. tariff on his goods he of course must add that sum to the price, and it is borne by the consumer. So, if domestic goods are raised to the price of the foreign, as they must be or no foreign goods would be imported or sold, the sum of the increase is likewise paid by the consumer. The effect of the tariff is, therefore, to raise the price of both, and to put into the Treasury of the United States the sum of the increase on the imported goods, and into the treasury of the protectionists the sum of the increase on the domestic goods.

The imports of dutiable goods into this country for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, were $460,000,000, on which the duty collected was $218,000,000, being an average tax of over 47 per cent. While it is impossible to state with accuracy the value of domestic manufactures raised in price by the tariff, it is estimated that it very much exceeds the amount of imported goods. These facts considered, it is not a matter of wonderment that fortunes in such numbers and with such rapidity are of late years amassed by the favored classes, nor that the agriculturists and producing classes are not prosperous. All these things are the inexorable logic, the necessary consequence of our unprecedentedly high protective tariff.

Even the promise of the protectionist, that by competition among themselves prices should be reduced, has proved delusive, as is shown by the following lists of trusts or combinations to keep up prices, with the per cent. of tariff duty protecting each:

Name of trust.	Protected by duties averaging—	Name of trust.	Protected by duties averaging—
	Per cent.		Per cent.
Salt trust	50	Tin trust	32
Earthenware trust	56	Lead trust	74
Bessemer-steel trust	84	Glass trust	55
Plow-steel trust	45	Soap trust	26
General steel trust	45	Linseed-oil trust	54
Nail trust	45	Rubber-shoe trust	25
General iron trust	45	Envelope trust	25
Copper trust	24	Paper-bag trust	35
Zinc trust	52	Cordage trust	25

The unreasonableness of the demands of the protectionists is more clearly seen by reference to the percentage of people for whose benefit it is insisted the Government shall levy tribute on the whole. The following table, prepared by David A. Wells from the census of 1880, furnishes a good illustration:

Tables and estimates deduced from the census of 1880 will afford approximately correct data for estimating the method in which the burden of the taxation imposed to maintain the protective tariff policy of the United States distributes itself among population, occupations, and professions:

OCCUPATIONS OF THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES IN 1880.

Agriculture	7,670,493
Professional and personal service	4,074,238
Trade and transportion	1,810,256
Manufacturing, mechanical, and mining industries	3,837,112
Total	17,392,099
Proportion engaged in agriculture who may possibly be subjected to foreign competition in some manner—mainly the growers of sugar and of rice, and of wool possibly to a very small extent, about 5 per cent. or	400,000
Proportion engaged in manufacturing, mechanical, and mining industries, who can be in part but not wholly subjected to foreign competition—large estimate based on calculation	837,112
Total	1,237,112
Proportion that are heavily taxed and placed at a disadvantage in agriculture, manufactures, mechanical pursuits, and in mining by the protective system	16,154,989
Proportion in whose favor the protective system is invoked, but whose wages are not lower than in other employment	1,237,112

It will be seen that it is proposed to heavily tax 16,154,112 of our population for, as it is claimed, the benefit of 1,237,112, but in fact for the benefit of a handful of wealthy manufacturers. In the face of these facts, the cry of "free-trader" will not silence protest nor satisfy the masses of the people who bear the burden. It is not epithets, but arguments and reason that are demanded in such a case.

The assertion that those who demand a reduction of taxation wish to destroy the industries of the country will not be accepted as true without evidence, nor will the pretense that the tariff is for the benefit of labor deceive any one in view of the known fact that laborers in protected industries do not fare better than in other branches. The advocates of tariff reform would neither embarrass the industries of the country nor reduce the rewards of labor. What they complain of is that the protectionists are appropriating much that properly belongs to labor; that they are limiting the income and field of labor, and levying an unreasonably high tribute on the people of the country, especially on the agriculturists and other industrial classes without any equivalent.

All of our wealth is the product of capital and labor, and when capital appropriates too much it follows, of course, that labor receives too little. When the capitalist in a few years accumulates a fortune as his share of the profits, while the laborer is enabled merely to make a living, the inequality and injustice are self-evident; and when a few favored classes secure such legislation as compels the people to contribute to their wealth, the burden is on them to show some benefit to the public to offset the essential injustice of taxing one class or person for the benefit of another.

In answer to these objections we are met with the stereotyped exclamation, "Our laborers must be protected against the pauper labor of Europe." That is now, apparently with one consent, accepted as the most taking argument, as they are pleased to style it.

Some years ago the claim was that protection would only be needed to aid our "infant industries." But as these industries have grown older and stronger and richer their demands have grown greater. Now they appear in the rôle of patriots and public benefactors. They propose to contribute largely of other people's money to aid, as they pretend, our laborers in their competition with the "pauper labor of Europe and Asia."

A few weeks ago, in a speech delivered in Congress, a leading protectionist stated their argument as follows:

He who strikes down the protection the laboring man enjoys against the cheap labor of Europe and Asia strikes at the prosperity, happiness, intelligence, and independence of the masses of the American people, and therefore at the prosperity of the country and the existence of republican institutions.

He then went on to state what the senior Senator from Maine had learned during the past summer about wages in Italy, Belgium, Germany, England, and other countries. He added, referring to the Senator from Maine—

He says: "Of the countries I visited the wages of Switzerland and Italy were the lowest, Germany next, then Belgium, then France, while those of England were highest."

Warming up with the subject, he triumphantly exclaimed:

If the labor of the country can not stand the competition of the Chinese upon the Pacific coast and a few thousand imported Italian laborers upon the Atlantic coast, how could it stand the competition of 404,000,000 of Chinamen, 40,000,000 of Japanese, of 60,000,000 of the population of India, and the pauper millions of Europe under a free-trade policy? There was never a greater fallacy than the one being so persistently advocated by the free-traders, and which was presented by the Secretary of the Treasury—that the greater efficiency of our laborers and the consequent low labor cost of our agricultural and manufacturing products enable us to compete successfully with the cheap labor of other countries.

I quote at length from the speech, because it is a bold and full statement of the staple argument of the protectionist against revenue reform and tax reduction. It is true that the wages in England are considerably higher than in any other of the countries named, and grow lower in those countries about in the order stated—France, Germany, Belgium, Switzerland, Italy, Japan, China, India. If this contention of the protectionist means anything it means this: That the cost of production is lower where wages are lower, and that high-wage countries can not without protection stand up against the competition of countries where wages are lower.

If it were necessary to disprove a proposition which I had supposed every one knew to be untenable, the data furnished by the speaker would be its sufficient refutation. Every school boy knows that England needs no protection against the manufacturers of India, China, Japan, or Russia, though the wages of England are five times as high as in any of those countries. It is a well-known fact that though free-trade England pays the highest wages in Europe, it makes the cheapest goods and is the most successful manufacturer. England neither needs nor asks protection against the cheaper labor of any of those other countries, while they insist that they need protection against the products of her high-priced labor.

Nor is the disproof of the protectionist's assumption found alone in the history of manufacturing in England. France and Germany do not ask protection against the lower wages of the other lower wage-paying countries named, but against the higher wages of England.

In 1887 of all the merchandise by us imported we got from free-trade England nearly 20 per cent.; from Germany over 11½ per cent.; from France nearly 10 per cent.; from Italy, China, British East Indies, respectively, a little over 2½ per cent.; from Japan a little less than 2½ per cent.; from Russia a little over nine-tenths of 1 per cent. These figures show how successfully Russia, China, India, and Japan, with their untold millions of laborers working for nominal wages, compete with the highest wage-paying country of Europe. They conclusively show that low wages and low intelligence are beaten in the race with higher wages and greater intelligence.

The subjoined table, made by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department from the census of 1880 and official data in the Treasury Department, furnishes indubitable proof that the high rate of present tariff is not needed to offset the difference between the cost of labor in this country and in Europe.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS, January 25, 1888.

WM. F. SWITZLER, Chief of Bureau.

It will be observed that the percentage of duty is in all cases higher, and in many cases twice and in some cases three times as high as the whole cost of labor in the production of the article. The statistics in the volume of the Census from which these figures are taken, were compiled by Joseph D. Weeks, an authority on such subjects and a prominent Republican. Nothing further surely need be said in disproof of the "pauper-labor" argument.

Even loaded down by the disadvantages and burdens imposed by our protective tariff, the ingenuity, energy, and intelligence of our people are so great that they in many departments compete successfully in the markets of other countries. And it will be instructive to observe that our competition has been most successful in those manufactures, the principal cost of which is labor, and high-priced labor, too; such as musical instruments, carriages and cars, clocks and watches, earthen and stone ware, manufactures of iron, steel, paper, etc.

Another argument in favor of the retention of our extremely high taxes is that it is necessary to build up our home manufacturing industries, and thus create a home market for our agricultural products. We have had now about a quarter of a century to discover the beneficent effects of our tariff, a hundred per cent. higher than that of any other country in the world, and the result can be satisfactory only to those for whose protection it was imposed, and their advocates. It is true that many individual fortunes have been made by it at the expense of the people. The excessive tariff and high prices—our market being limited—have not infrequently stimulated overproduction, followed of course by reduction in labor and wages, and that by strikes and lockouts to the great detriment of labor.

We have succeeded in many instances in building factories, but not in building up industries to an extent that can be satisfactory to any one who unselfishly considers the interest of the whole country. A reference to the figures will best illustrate this. The following table, compiled from official data, shows the imports and exports of the manufactures of metals and textiles by the countries named, in the year 1886:

Total values of manufactures of metals and textiles imported into and exported from the United Kingdom, Germany, France, Netherlands, and the United States in 1886.

United States	190,727,090	3.27	38,031,459	.66

NOTES.—The imports into Germany and France are the net imports, and the exports from all countries the exports of domestic products. The data for Germany are those for the German Customs Union.

All metals beyond the condition of ore, and all textiles not raw or unmanufactured, are classed as manufactures.

There being no later official data for Netherlands than 1883, the data furnished by Hon. Thomas Wilson for 1880 are repeated.

WM. F. SWITZLER,
Chief of Bureau.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS, April 17, 1888.

These figures show that the United States import more largely than any other of the countries named, except Great Britain, of those manufactured articles which we attempt to exclude by our exceptionally high tariff, and an analysis of the list would show that of the imports of Great Britain a large percentage is in a partly manufactured state, to be exported greatly increased in value; so that the United States are, beyond a doubt, the largest importers of manufactured goods, properly so called.

These figures also show that per capita England exports over twenty-seven times, Germany over nine times, France nearly eight times, and the Netherlands nearly twenty times as much as the United States, notwithstanding our exceptional advantages.

The testimony of Mr. Howard M. Newhall, one of the leading manufacturers of shoes in Lynn, Mass., before a committee of the Massachusetts Legislature in 1882–'83 (quoted by Mr. Wells in an article written by him a few years ago), is so apposite that I quote from it:

I have come before this committee—to present a few facts in regard to one specific branch of business interest—a protected shoe industry. The shoe industry is the most thoroughly American in its parts of any of our great industries. A few years before 1860 few would have dared to predict that a shoe could ever be made by machinery, or that in a quarter of a century there would be so many people employed in making shoes by machinery as to render the American market altogether too small for their industrial capacity. Yet such is the fact. In Lynn alone the capacity is 300,000 pairs of shoes per week, and Lynn is only one great representative of a great many shoe-manufacturing centers in New England, New York, Pennsylvania, and the West. This is its present capacity, but the power of enlarging this capacity is unlimited. This whole system could be duplicated and reduplicated if necessary within a short term of years. With such facilities it is very natural that the business should soon outgrow the home consumption.

Said Mr. Newhall—

Where a few years ago it took nine months in each year to shoe this country it now takes six months, and with the present increase of factories a few years hence it can be done in less than that time. Of course the increase of capacity engenders competition among the manufacturers, and there is a constant incentive to underbid the market to secure trade. As in all trade, a low price (often quoted) "sets" the market, and in order to meet the market articles have to be made cheaper at the expense of the operatives. If the materials used to make a shoe go up in price, labor always has to go down. Strikes result, as that seems to be the only way the laborer can protect himself from the encroachment of the employer. In a general strike in a shoe manufacturing center the operatives often gain temporary advantage, but with a supply greater than the demand it can not long continue.

Gentlemen, do not blame the manufacturer for trying to meet the market, or blame the operatives for resisting a reduction in wages. It all goes to show that the supply is greater than the demand, and that our market is not large enough. Perhaps you may wonder how and where we are "protected" in our shoemaking. I will mention two or three articles specially and speak of the others generally. Take, for instance, serges or lastings. The average duty on the serges or lastings used in the manufactures of shoes is 85 per cent; and how many factories do you think are protected by this enormous duty? I know of only two, one at Oswego, N. Y., the other at Woonsocket, R. I. I may be in error, but these are all which have been named to me, although I have made diligent inquiry.

As another instance take that well-known article, French kid, or, in fact, kid of any foreign make. Kid requires a duty of 25 per cent. on the average. French kid costs all the way from $18 to $45 per dozen skins, according to the quality. An average skin would cost about $30 per dozen, and each skin would cut about one pair of shoes. Hence, the prospective penalty for wearing soft, pliable French kid shoes is 60 cents before the process of making the shoe has begun. This appeals to our own pockets, but in its broader sense we are at just 60 cents disadvantage in competition with the rest of the world in that grade of shoe. The light, pliable glove-calf of foreign manufacture is taxed by a duty of 20 per cent. I have selected the serges, kid, glove-calf, which perhaps form a sufficient variety to illustrate the argument. In the warm climates where we must push these very kinds of shoes which have been mentioned American calf, goat, or grain is too heavy for use, and if we are to compete with foreign manufacturers we need every advantage of competition. Cottons, nails, tacks, buttons, threads, all have to be used in the make-up of a shoe, and they are protected. The iron from which we make our machinery is protected. If, as facetiously said, we make shoes of paper, that is protected too. In short, you have paid a duty on nearly every component part of the shoe which you are now wearing on your foot.

* * * * * * * *

A removal of duty from all articles used in the manufacture of a shoe would be an advantage to employer and employed. Why, up in Canada and in the Provinces they have been obliged to protect themselves from American shoes by a duty of 25 per cent.; and even though we are having to pay a high tariff on importation and exportation, we are sending as many shoes into Canada as ever. This alone proves what our shoe-manufacturing industry is capable of achieving if it can have a chance. There is no other country knows how or could make shoes as fast and as cheap as the Yankees, and all we need is one end of the bargain. If we are able to sell our goods when protected and protected against, if half the disadvantage we now stagger under were removed, we could soon fix ourselves into a place where the world's buyers could not afford to purchase from any other market.

This speaks volumes to thoughtful men; and what is here said would equally apply to other industries. It is not against the pauper labor of Europe or Asia that the laborer or the people generally need protection so much as against the rich beggars among ourselves who have secured the passage of laws compelling every industry, class, and person in the country to contribute to their enrichment, and who are now, by every means in their power, opposing the modification of these laws. This is but another illustration of the fact that what we need most is protection against protection. If we were not put at a disadvantage by our extremely high tariff we could hold our own against the world.

We export annually to Great Britain of raw cotton $200,000,000 worth, and of breadstuffs, $125,000,000 worth. The breadstuffs are consumed by the operatives who manufacture our cotton in England. It is not doubted but that if our manufacturers were not put at a disadvantage by our protective tariff, they could successfully compete with Great Britain or any other country in the manufacture of cotton goods, especially of the lower grades.

At our very doors there is a heavy trade in these goods with the South American and Central American Republics. They entertain the most friendly disposition toward us. They have hardly any manufacturing industries of their own. We naturally should supply them. But the following table of the imports of English and American cotton goods into Central and South American States for the year ending June 30, 1887, shows that we do not compete with Great Britain notwithstanding our exceptional advantages:

Total values of the exports of domestic manufactures of cotton from the United Kingdom, and the United States to Mexico, Central and South America, and to the West Indies in 1886.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS, April 17, 1888.

We sell them a little over $6,000,000; Great Britain over $46,000,000.

Illustrative of this point, I call attention to the following table, showing the ratio which the exports of unmanufactured and manufactured products from the United States have sustained to each other during the periods designated.

The ratio which the exports of the unmanufactured and manufactured products from the United States have sustained to each other during the decennial periods included between the years 1859–'60 and 1879–'80, and from 1881 to 1887, are as follows:

	Unmanufactured products.	Manufactured products.
1859–'60.....Per cent. of total...	82.3	17.7
1869–'70.....do.....	86.6	13.4
1879–'80.....do.....	87.5	12.5
1881–'87.....do.....	85.20	14.80

Unmanufactured products have risen, therefore, from below 82.3 per cent. of the total exports in 1859–'60 to 87.5 per cent. in 1881–'87, while during the same period manufactures have fallen from 17.7 per cent. to 14.80 per cent. Further illustrations can not be necessary to demonstrate the fact that our tariff has not built up our manufacturing industries. Though we have piled stone upon stone upon the high tariff Chinese wall by which we have undertaken to exclude foreign imports, they have continued rapidly to increase. The value of our imports of merchandise from all countries in 1860 was $353,620,000, but it had gradually risen in 1887 to $692,320,000. If anything can be conclusively proven by facts and figures, this is, that protection does not exclude European manufactures from our market, and that it does exclude our manufactures from the markets of the world. Hardly any country on earth could compete with us under equal conditions. Our situation is most favorable, our natural resources great, and the superior intelligence and ingenuity of our people unquestioned.

But to any thoughtful person, who honestly seeks to discover the truth, the reason that our imports of manufactured products are so great and our exports so insignificant is not far to seek. Of the countries named the United States is the only one that prevents the free importation of raw materials, by our tariff on which we largely increase the cost of our manufactured products. Our domestic manufacturers have to pay a very high tariff directly on their tools, machinery, dye-stuffs, chemicals, and on all raw material, and indirectly on many other articles that enter into the cost of production. This must ordinarily exclude them from the markets of the world, where they come in competition with those who are not so burdened.

That a manufacturer of woolen goods, for instance, who is compelled to pay from 25 to 30 per cent. more than another manufacturer in the same line for his wool, dies, machinery, etc., can not compete with the latter is a proposition too plain to admit of doubt. Every person who reflects on the subject must perceive the truth of the statement of Schoenhoff, that—

Taxes on raw materials inevitably lead to the decay of manufacturing industries. Either one or the other has to give way. There is no choice, no alternative.

Nor is this the only disadvantage at which our tariff places our manufacturers, so far as markets outside of the United States are concerned. To sell, we must buy. Commerce is traffic. But under our tariff laws our manufacturer can not purchase and import on equal terms with his competitors of other countries. The effect of all this is of course to make traffic difficult or impossible, and practically to shut us out of the markets of the world. It must, too, as a consequence, lessen wages and the demand for labor. To compete in the markets of other countries our manufacturers must sell at market prices; and as the cost of the materials, tools, machinery, etc., plus the cost of labor, fixes the cost of production, it is a plain proposition that as the cost of raw materials, tools, and machinery go up labor must go down, or our manufacturers must go out of the market. And certainly, that as the markets for our goods are circumscribed the demand for labor is lessened is a proposition that can hardly be denied.

The protectionists are accustomed to point to the volume of our domestic manufactures as the fruits of the tariff; but they do not state, what ordinary observation shows to be true, that 80 or 90 per cent. of such products must, and would of necessity, be made in the United States, tariff or no tariff.

And as I have attempted to show, so far as we export we do so in spite of the tariff. I am therefore opposed to our present tariff, because while it enriches a few it prevents the expansion of our industries and lessens the field and the reward of labor. But my opposition is intensified by the belief that it is especially unjust and oppressive to the agriculturists of the country.

While, Mr. Chairman, experience and uncontroverted facts show that, in the business of manufacturing, unintelligent, low-priced labor can not and does not compete with intelligent, high-priced labor aided by improved machinery, they also show that our farmers are brought in direct and severe competition with the lowest-priced labor in the world. Perhaps in no other country on the globe are wages so low as among the natives of India and Russia. In either country they are not over about one-fifth as high as in the United States.

That the annual surplus of our wheat which fixes the price of the whole crop comes in competition with the harvests of India and Russia is known to every one, and improved facilities for transportation from these countries are each year making this competition more sharp.

In 1870 British India exported of wheat only 78,208 cwt., and not until 1874 did it export as high in any year as a million of bushels. The table which I append shows that between 1880 and 1886 inclusive, the exports of wheat from Russia in Europe had nearly doubled; from British India had more than trebled; from Victoria, South Australia, and New Zealand had largely increased (but how much we have not the data to show), while within the same period the exports from the argentine Republic grew twenty-five times greater, but from the United States they shrunk nearly one-half in volume and over one-half in value.

Quantities and value of domestic wheat exported from Russia in Europe, British India, the Australian colonies, the Argentine Republic, and the United States during the years 1880 to 1886, inclusive.

It will be seen that during that period there was a decrease in quantity varying from 10 to 60 per cent., and in value varying from 25 to 68 per cent. on every article mentioned but one—wheat flour; and if we take wheat and flour together there was a great decrease in that.

The records of the Treasury Department show that since the years 1855, 1856, the export prices of the following products have not been as low as in 1885 and 1886, only as hereafter stated, namely:

Corn, but once; wheat, not once; wheat flour, not once; cotton, not once; pork, but once; beef, not once; butter, but three times; cheese, but once.

My time, Mr. Chairman, will not permit me to dwell on the lesson taught by these figures, nor is it necessary that I should. They speak with an eloquence greater than I could command of the great injustice of our tariff.

Pressed on one side by the products of the labor of myriads of semi-serfs, and with their markets constantly growing narrower and their products lower priced, our agriculturists are at home oppressed by an unprecedented tariff imposed, not for the support of the Government, but for the protection, so called, of a mushroom, moneyed aristocracy that it has built up.

I append a table showing the tariff on a few of the necessaries of the people:

Articles.	Tariff.
Lumber	$2 per thousand.
Nails	43 per cent.
Common window-glass	68 per cent. and upward.
Linseed-oil	54 per cent.
White lead	40 per cent.
Red lead	77 per cent.

This table is well worthy of careful study. In examining the figures given in the column headed "price at factory" and the column headed "per cent. of price at factory," which the total duty amounts to, the startling inequalities in the rate of duty to be paid in this country becomes apparent. The highest-priced goods named in the table is West of England broadcloth, worth $3.60 per yard in Leeds, the specific duty being 35 cents per pound and the ad valorem duty 40 per cent., making a total of duty of 50.3 per cent. on the value at the factory. This is on a high grade of goods. In looking at the bottom of the table the last entry is for cotton-warp reversible cloth, made in imitation of a better kind. It is worth but 45 cents per yard at the factory. The specific duty is the same as on the West of England broadcloth, 35 cents per pound, the ad valorem duty is 35 per cent., but the specific duty and the ad valorem duty together make the rate on the price at the factory 180.7 per cent. That is to say, the cheaper the goods at the factory the greater is the proportional increment of duty. The column headed "per cent. of price at factory," which shows the percentage that the duty is of the factory price, brings this out clearly.

By looking at this table it will be seen that this per cent. steadily increases from 50.3, on high-priced goods, to 180.7 on low-priced goods.

Had it not been for the richness of our soil and the pluck and intelligence of our people they must long since have been overcome in the unequal contest. That they could hold their own under such circumstances was not possible. That they have not held their own is shown by the following graphic statement, cut from the St. Louis Republican (quoted a few days ago by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LANDES] in his speech on this question):

ILLINOIS AND MASSACHUSETTS.

Illinois is a farming State, the richest and most productive one in the Union. Massachusetts is a manufacturing State, one of the most wealthy and prosperous in the industrial group of nine States that are the seat of the protected vocations and the chief beneficiaries of the high-tariff policy.

The fertile soil of Illinois, its enormous crops of grain and other farm produce, its admirable railroad systems—the largest possessed by any State in the Union—and the intelligence and thrifty habits of its people make it the true representative agricultural State of the West; and in like manner, the intelligence and superior ingenuity of the Massachusetts people, their judiciously diversified industries, their thriving manufacturing towns, and their great wealth make it the proper representative of the industrial group. Illinois has an area of 56,650 square miles; Massachusetts, 8,310. At the last census Illinois had a population of 3,077,000; Massachusetts, 1,783,000. Illinois is more than six times as large in area as Massachusetts, and has nearly twice as great a population.

In 1880 Illinois had 255,741 farms, 436,371 persons engaged in farming pursuits, and $1,175,000,000 capital invested in agriculture, this being the estimated value of the farms, with the buildings, live-stock, and implements on them. Massachusetts had 14,352 manufacturing establishments with $303,808,000 invested in them, and employing 352,200 persons. It will be observed that Illinois has nearly four times as much capital invested in farming as Massachusetts has invested in manufacturing, and also that it has 84,000 more persons employed on farms than Massachusetts has employed in factories.

The value of all farm products in Illinois, both sold and consumed on the farms, in 1880 was $204,000,000, while the value of all the products of manufacture in Massachusetts was $631,000,000, from which must be deducted the value of the raw materials used, $387,000,000, leaving $244,000,000 as the net product. It appears, then, that Massachusetts, with one-fourth as much capital as Illinois, and 84,000 fewer persons employed, made $40,000,000 more in manufacturing than Illinois made in farming.

Again, it takes $1,175,000,000 capital invested in farming in Illinois to produce $204,000,000 worth of produce, but in Massachusetts $303,000,000 invested in manufacturing produces $244,000,000.

It appears, also, that it takes 436,371 persons engaged in farming in Illinois to produce $204,000,000 worth of crops, but in Massachusetts 352,200 persons engaged in manufacturing produce $244,000,000 worth of goods. In Illinois the average product per capita in farming is $442; in Massachusetts the average product per capita in manufacturing is nearly $700.

The assessed valuation of taxable property in Illinois for 1887 was $798,000,000, which, for a population of 3,077,000, is about $266 per capita. The assessed valuation in Massachusetts for 1887 was $2,100,000,000, which, for a population of 1,780,000 is about $1,120. So that not only is there more than twice as much assessed valuation in the small manufacturing State of Massachusetts as in the large farming State of Illinois, but an average person in Massachusetts is worth more than four times as much as an average person in Illinois.

These estimates are based on the assumption that all the wealth in Illinois is owned by its people. But it is notorious that this is not the case. All the railroads and telegraph lines are owned outside the State—in the industrial States of the East—and are assessed at $70,000,000, but actually worth $300,000,000.

This article does not state the whole truth. Not only do the wealthy citizens of the manufacturing States own a large percentage of the stock of our telegraphs and railroad companies, but they also own millions upon millions of mortgages upon the farms of our people, as is shown by a table which I also append:

This table, taken from the National Review, was compiled for one of the leading banks in Chicago after a thorough investigation.

While, Mr. Chairman, it is not pleasant for our agriculturists to learn the lesson taught by these figures, it would not be wise to blink or disregard them. No sophistry can gainsay the fact that a good percentage of the profits of their labor is without any equivalent transferred to the pockets of certain favored classes.

It is not strange that after a consideration of the facts and a careful estimate, Joseph Medill, a very prominent Republican and the proprietor of the leading Republican journal of the Northwest (The Chicago Tribune), in a speech delivered before the American Agricultural Society in 1882, said:

> I understate the truth when I say that the farmers of the West and the planters of the South are charged $500,000,000 a year on their goods for the profit of protected Eastern manufacturers more than is fair or necessary on the principle of "live and let live."

But it is idle to disguise the fact that the monopolists are determined that there shall be no essential change in the tariff. They are determined to insist on a literal application of that Scripture:

> Unto every one that hath shall be given, but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath.

Their representatives and advocates on this floor treat with derision our appeals for a modification of the tariff so as to lighten the burdens on our farmers. They are willing that the tax shall be abated on tobacco and whisky, as they were that it should be on bank stock, bank deposits, incomes from United States bonds, perfumery, playing cards, etc.; but they are not willing that it should be lessened on the shoes, the blankets, the clothing, the plow-shares, or any other of the necessaries of the people.

The most important question now is, shall the wealthy classes be permitted to continue to levy tribute on the industrial classes; shall toil be guarantied the fruits of its own labor? Between these two classes there is an irrepressible conflict. Sooner or later the people will succeed. It may not be at first. The power of concentrated capital is great. The practical politician, the lobbyist, and the place-seeker will be on that side until it is most clear that it can not succeed.

They always worship the golden calf.

But ultimately the people will say, as President Cleveland in his last message said:

> The taxation of luxuries presents no feature of hardship; but the necessaries of life used and consumed by all the people, the duty upon which adds to the cost of living in every home, should be greatly cheapened.

[Applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing speech, the hour having expired,

On motion of Mr. MACDONALD, by unanimous consent, the time of Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota, was extended for ten minutes.

Mr. CANNON. My friend from Minnesota, in the speech he has just concluded, made a statement about Illinois, comparing her with Massachusetts as to the assessed value of property in Illinois compared with the assessed value of property in Massachusetts. He also made a statement in which, making a comparison between manufacturing Massachusetts and agricultural Illinois, he ignored manufacturing Illinois and misleads as to agricultural Illinois. I do not know where the gentleman got his table——

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I stated that it was taken from the St. Louis Republican. It purports to be, and I have no doubt it is, compiled from the census of 1880.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I have here the census of 1880 as compiled and tabulated, and instead of the condition of affairs which the gentlemen's tables show I find this fact: the true valuation of property in Illinois in 1880, as shown by the census, was $3,092,000,000.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I am ready to answer any question, but perhaps this is not just the time to inject a speech. Let me say to the gentleman [Mr. CANNON] that the comparison made is not a comparison of the whole of the property of Massachusetts with the whole of the property of Illinois, but a comparison of the value of the farms of Illinois with the value of the manufacturing property of Massachusetts.

Mr. CANNON. A partial statement always misleads.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON] has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I ask five minutes to complete my statement. I do not contemplate a speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is compelled to recognize the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS], who is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] be allowed five minutes; not to come out of my time. [Laughter.]

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. CANNON. To continue, Mr. Chairman, I call the attention o the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON] to the fact that the true valuation of all property in Illinois, real and personal, as shown by the census of 1880, was three thousand and ninety-two million dollars, while the true valuation of all the property in Massachusetts was two thousand seven hundred and ninety-five million.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Can you institute any fair comparison in that way? Is not the only proper way to make the comparison the way it was done by the St. Louis Republican, to wit, taking the value of the agricultural property in one State as compared with the value of the manufacturing property in the other?

Mr. CANNON. I will make the comparison of manufacturing in Illinois with manufacturing in Massachusetts, too, within my five minutes.

The aggregate wealth per capita in Illinois, as shown by the census of 1880, is $1,005, not $266, as stated and quoted with approval by the gentleman, as against $1,568 per capita in Massachusetts; Illinois having a population far exceeding that of Massachusetts. The population of Illinois has nearly doubled within the last twenty years. More than that, Mr. Chairman, we will talk about the manufacturing interests of the two States for a moment. I speak now from the census of 1880. Massachusetts then had 14,352 manufacturing establishments; at the same time Illinois had 14,549. The value of the manufactured products of Massachusetts in 1880 was $631,000,000; the value of the manufactured products of Illinois was $415,000,000. This same census which shows Illinois to be first in agriculture also shows her to be fourth in manufactures, the States coming in this order: New York first, Pennsylvania second, Massachusetts third, and Illinois fourth. That is the census. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Now, Mr. Chairman, my able friend from Illinois knows that that is not the comparison to which I was calling attention, and that his comparison only distracts attention from the issue that I presented.

Mr. CANNON. What I complain of is, that the statement which the St. Louis Republican made, and which the gentleman and other gentlemen on that side of the House have adopted, is deceptive; that figures, when you tell only part of the truth and conceal a part, do, in effect, tell a falsehood. That is what I complain of. I do not claim, of course, that the gentleman from Minnesota prevaricates; but I say such is always the effect when any one states only a part of the truth.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. If nobody can make a better explanation than you have made, it is an admission of the truth of the St. Louis Republican's statement.

Mr. CANNON. Let me say one word further. The honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY]—and I see it in his published speech for the first time this morning—spoke of census reports of assessed values in the State of Illinois. Why, sir, everybody in Illinois, and everywhere else, who has given any attention to the subject knows that the assessed value of property in Illinois is not one-fourth of its real value. It is by artful statements, founded upon such figures, that the attempt is made to mislead the House and the country; and I sometimes think that some of these newspapers desire to have believed as truth that which is not the truth.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois another question?

The CHAIRMAN. The five minutes allowed to the gentleman from Illinois have expired.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. If the assessed values in both Massachusetts and Illinois are divided by four, what difference does it make in the gentleman's comparison?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I want to say—and the statistics sustain the assertion—that the percentage of wealth per capita has increased as rapidly in Illinois as in Massachusetts.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Mr. Chairman, if any article of common use which our farmers can not profitably grow or our miners or workmen produce is not already on the free-list I will vote to put it on.

If any duty on any home product be higher than the conceded higher wages rate of my country I will vote to reduce it to the protective level, because I believe the tariff is simply a question of wages. If it be clear that any clause fosters only monopoly I will vote to strike it out. If you frame a revenue-reduction bill with an eye single to the relief of the Treasury and the people from a growing surplus I will vote with you.

If you who are the majority would suffer the Republican minority to deal for one day only with the problem of the surplus I believe we would in that single day reduce our annual revenues $70,000,000, by repealing the internal-revenue tax on tobacco, a burden on the farms in sixteen hundred counties and fifteen States; by repealing the internal-revenue tax on alcohol used in the arts, manufactures, medicines and drugs, and by reducing the tariff on sugar to a minimum, yielding revenue enough to pay bounties to home producers of sugar from cane, sorghum, corn, and beets.

The reduction of the surplus is the pretext but not the motive of this bill.

Who, for instance, to reduce a surplus of $55,000,000 would put "curled hair for beds or mattresses" on the free-list, which last year yielded a revenue of $38.25?

It is not a surplus revenue, but a protective revenue; not a war tariff, but a protective tariff, you gentlemen of the majority assail. Mr. Cleveland's message and this foundling now called the Mills bill have a common purpose. Both use the surplus as the fulcrum wherewith to apply the free-trade lever to dislodge the protective system. Every free-trader applauds both. Every protectionist denounces both.

Why, in this debate, has every friend of the Mills bill landed the English free-trade tariff system, which only levies duties on articles not produced at home?

Has any friend of this bill in this debate uttered one sentence in favor of the American tariff system, which discriminates in favor of the home producer and laborer?

I pause and will yield a half minute to any member on the Democratic side to name the sentence or the member's name who uttered it.

Mr. HOOKER. No. There was no one, and you won't hear any Democrat utter one.

Mr. McCOMAS. I have heard one eloquent Democrat [Mr. FORAN] defend the tariff and labor, but he will not vote for this bill. I am glad to hear the gentleman from Mississippi declare for his party that no Democrat has or can utter a word for protection of labor.

Your purpose is the enlargement of the free-list and final opening of our markets to the world. Why then discuss the revision of the protective tariff with this majority which would wipe it out as with a sponge? [Applause.]

The Democracy has under Cleveland after forty years renewed its allegiance to English free trade. This fight is not over the details of this bill but on the broad issue of free trade or protection. Your tariff of 1846, the contagion of Cobden's enthusiasm, resulted in the bankruptcy of all industries, wheat rotting in unthrashed stacks, and corn burned for fuel on the Western farms. Said Richard Cobden in 1844:

You have no more right to doubt that the sun will rise to-morrow than to doubt that in less than ten years from this time, when England inaugurates the glorious era of commercial freedom, every civilized nation will be free trade to the backbone.

It was to convert the world, and after forty years no nation has adopted it.

Enterprise was to be paralyzed and invention stifled where free trade did not prevail. It was to confer great benefits on its votaries, and impose evils on those who rejected it.

Free trade to-day comes with the broken promises, the disappointed hopes of its early supporters and founders.

Protective France and Belgium rival England, while Germany is surpassing her, and after five years of protection Bismarck says, "Germany fears nobody but God," while the United States has far outstripped England in enterprise and inventive industry. Thirty-ninefortieths of mankind repudiate free trade to-day.

Prophecy has been falsified by history. One year ago, outside of England, of all the wise and thoughtful men in Europe and America, no ruler or minister dared to propose free trade. After forty years of trial all statesmen outside of England have united in rejecting it as one of the "puerile doctrines and illusions of mankind." The modern statesmen we find all protectionists: Thiers, Gambetta, Clemenceaux, Grant, Garfield, Bismarck, Sherman, and Blaine.

Wherever there is universal suffrage the producers the world over have repudiated free trade. When free trade won in England the working people were excluded from the suffrage.

THE BRITISH TARIFF FOR REVENUE ONLY AND DIRECT TAXES.

We collect over two hundred millions from customs under a protective tariff.

England collects one hundred millions from customs under a free-trade tariff for revenue only.

The campaign this fall is designed to bring our tariff to the English model—a free-trade tariff for revenue only.

Great Britain has 2,220 customs officials. Her custom-houses are scattered everywhere.

On some imports Great Britain imposes a duty of 400 per cent. or 500 per cent.; on several a duty of 1,900 per cent.

By a tax of 6 pence per pound on tea and 2 pence per pound on coffee, Great Britain wrests from the breakfast table of her people $22,000,000 annually.

She has a tariff on chicory, cocoa, cocoa husks, chocolate, currants, figs, raisins, plums, prunes, chloral, chloroform, collodion, tobacco, snuff, soap, ether, cordials, alcohol, spirits, and other articles, which in 1886 yielded her a customs revenue of $99,086,435.

Besides, a free-trade tariff compels heavy direct taxation. While we collect our one hundred and eighteen millions from internal-revenue taxes, Great Britain in 1886 by internal taxes collected by licenses to auctioneers, pawnbrokers, and peddlers, by stamps on bankers' notes, on bills of exchange and promissory notes, on checks, drafts, and receipts, on deeds and instruments, by a tax on dogs and guns, by a house duty, by a tax on marine and life insurance, by a land tax, a tax on legacies, by liquor taxes and licenses, by a tax on patent medicines, on property, and licenses on refreshment houses, by a tax on dealers and manufacturers of tobacco and snuff, and by taxes on a hundred other vexatious items, from her people, the enormous sum of $291,573,490.

DEPRESSION OF TRADE AND INDUSTRY IN ENGLAND UNDER FREE TRADE.

Dare you now go home and tell the people of our land how thirty years of a free-trade tariff for revenue only has prospered Great Britain? Even after three years of Democratic incompetent administration we have nothing like the industrial distress existing in England. There is a wolf at the door of the English wage-earner and an enemy at his fireside. There is the figure of the laborer badly clad in his hovel, living in want and ignorance. England has a million paupers, and seven millions of people there to toe the line of pauperism. Wages all over England are low and decreasing. Her industries are depressed by a competition some of them can not survive. Eighty thousand people are out of employment in London alone. Women are selling their life-blood working at a half-penny an hour in making cheap clothes, and lately the countless army of the unemployed crowded Haymarket. Tens of thousands marched through London streets to Westminster Abbey calling for "bread or work."

ENGLISH FARMING HAS COLLAPSED UNDER FREE TRADE.

Learn from England, ye farmers of America, how free trade benefits agriculture.

There agriculture has reached a state of collapse. Every farmer is 40 per cent. poorer than he was twelve years ago. The tenant farmers are now paying their rent out of their capital. In ten years the loss of income to owners of land was 30 per cent. and to tenant farmers 60 per cent.

The farm laborer now works for 1 or, at most, for 2 shillings a day, a loss of 20 per cent. of his wages.

The land is rapidly going out of cultivation, and free trade has made wheat growing unprofitable to the English farmer. Within ten years 1,000,000 acres, one-fourth of the whole wheat area of Britain, has gone out of cultivation. Dairy farming is extinguished. The best of the farm population is crowding into the great cities, no longer customers, but competitors.

To the doctrinaires it is a pretty pastoral scene; free-trade England, a grass country without gates, cropped-tail horses, and foxes and hounds running on forever and ever.

The howling dervish of free trade, with his epileptic froth over the mortgages on Western farms, should remember that while mortgages on farms here are 20 per cent. of their value, the mortgages on English lands were over 58 per cent. of their value (says Mullhall) in 1876, and since then the value and income of these lands has fallen off from 20 to 50 per cent. The number of farming bankruptcies in Britain have increased six times in ten years. Bills of sale have multiplied ten times in five years.

I was born upon a farm; its fragrant fields, its meadows, and clover bloom are redolent of the memories of a happy boyhood. I live among farmers and represent largely a farming constituency. As I consider their wants, their burdens, their troubles, God forbid I should ever vote to add to their present evils by a dose of English free-trade tariff for revenue only, the loss of their home market, the farmer's main dependence for the sale of his surplus products. [Applause.]

Free trade may cheapen a few of the farmer's supplies; it will still more cheapen the value of his farm and its products, decrease manufactures, and increase farmers.

When our people are all employed they earn wages, and the more wages they earn the more of the farmer's products they buy. Free foreign trade may enrich the mugwump importers of New York or Boston, but it is home production and consumption that enriches the farmer. Foreign importation enriches the few at the expense of the many by gathering the profits in a few hands—the bankers, the merchants, the brokers, the agents, the shippers, those who deal in money and exchange. Home trade is tenfold more profitable than foreign trade. Foreign trade profits individuals; home trade profits the community, because the money turned over once in foreign trade is turned over ten times in home trade.

While foreign trade enriches many middlemen, home trade enriches the producer. In home trade both the buying and the selling are done at home, and both transactions bring profit to the community. In foreign trade one transaction is done abroad and does not benefit our country at all. Free foreign commerce is a curse if it only displaces so much home commerce.

For the farmer foreign goods in exchange for the farmer's grain and raw material are far-fetched and dear-bought. The farmer will not transfer prosperity from home manufacturers to Northern importers, for the manufacturer keeps the money at home, while the importer sends it abroad. He knows to-day that it is best to exchange his produce at his own door, to have his neighbor for his customer instead of his competitor, quite as well as when a century ago the American farmers created the American protective policy. He knows that the home market his foresight fostered consumes more than all of Britain's imports and exports combined. He hails the tendency to bring producers and consumers together by more rapid transit and fewer middlemen.

THE AMERICAN FARMER SACRIFICED TO FREE TRADE BY THE MILLS BILL.

Mr. Chairman, the American farmer has for years heard the Democratic leaders denounce the tariff as the bulwark of monopoly, the enricher of a favored few whose products ought to be on the free-list

He will read the Mills bill to find that the farmer is the Robber Baron whose products now go to the free-list. The raiser of sheep and the grower of wool is now the chief of sinners, and wool must be made free. Cultivators of hemp, flax, peas, beans, cabbage, potatoes, seeds, and vegetables are monopolists; so these go to the free-list.

More than one-third of the free-list in the Mills bill is composed of the yield of the field, forest, and mine to the damage of the lumberman, quarryman, farmer, and miner.

With demagogic zeal salt which costs us 6 cents per capita is hurried to the free-list, while sugar which costs us $2.57 per capita escapes lightly.

But I will not vex the House with figures. Figures are good servants but bad masters. This bill and the tables in the majority report suggest that either ad valorem or percentage is the prince of liars.

THE PROBLEM TO-DAY—NOT CHEAPNESS, BUT EMPLOYMENT.

Mr. Chairman, the speeches for this bill are the extravagant speeches of forty years ago. The necessaries and conveniences of life were never so plentiful or so cheap as to-day. The wages of labor were never so high in our country. The poor man's blanket never was so cheap as now, but the poor man's wages are the lowest in the States where most of the members who support the Mills bill hail from. During the past forty years all over the world mechanical and scientific appliances have transformed the transporting and producing of commodities. These have reduced and are still reducing the labor required for both.

When Cobden triumphed with the cry of "the cheap loaf" the trouble was the scarcity and dearness of the necessaries of life. To-day the struggle is for work enough to give the bulk of population money enough to buy these necessaries of life now so cheap and abundant.

Without employment, increasing masses of people must pass a miserable existence in the midst of plenty. Industries must constantly grow and diversify to give full and well-paid employment. From the difficulty of supplying adequate employment in the midst of commodities cheap and plentiful has resulted the reconversion of the civilized world to protective tariffs.

Employment, not cheapness, is the mainspring of national contentment. Internal production and internal consumption are the best tests of national prosperity.

Cheap blankets and cheap salt are a mockery if labor is cheaper still. Free trade means untaxed foreign competition. It cheapens a few things the workman consumes, but cheapens everything that he produces. Protection raises the price of a few things the workman consumes, but raises the price of everything he produces, and higher wages for what he produces means a higher standard of life for home, wife, and children.

Free trade means cheapness to the few rich idlers with fixed incomes, but longer hours, lower wages, harder work to the workers, who are many. Goods are too cheap for us when they are cheaper than we can make them. Competition with long hours and low wages will bring us to long hours and low wages. "Competition for cheapness becomes competition in cheap labor, and competition in cheap labor means competition in flesh and blood."

To-day every old soul-driver of the South is a free-trader. Free trade is against the poor man and in favor of the rich man when it lets the rich man buy what he wants abroad and employ the foreign workers at lower wages in place of the American producer who stands ready with his capital, the workman's skill, his practical knowledge, his industry, his strength, his health. In this country to-day the workingman has the ballot to defend him against the competition of underpaid workmen and plethoric capital in Europe, and Coolie and Chinese labor in Asia, for all of them by cheap ocean freights are now brought near our door. [Applause.]

THE MARKET OF THE WORLD IS A DELUSION AND A SNARE FOR US.

When you tell the farmer if he will slaughter his sheep free wool will enable our manufacturers to control the foreign market, he retorts that cotton has always been free. Free cotton has not given our spinners control of the foreign market, but with free wool a million flockmasters must seek other employment.

Since all foreign countries save England have adopted the protective system, free trade for us can not open a single port or market not now open to us, but simply opens our market to all foreign wares. We would fall before the combined efforts of protective tariffs abroad and foreign competition at home.

The depressed and overcrowded market of England is already open to us, and all the markets of the continent of Europe are protected. How then will these markets give us continuing employment? Besides, if ten million workers in glass, woolens, cotton, and silk in Germany, France, and Belgium are working 72 hours a week, including Sunday, at 50 per cent. less wages, and send their products free to New York and Boston or Baltimore, at a lower rate of freight than it costs workmen working 48 hours a week here, then these ten million workmen are competing as if they were all here alongside of our workmen. Instead of free trade let us rather make more stringent our immigration laws. [Applause.]

THE SOUTH MOST NEEDS THE TARIFF.

Mr. Chairman, it amazes me to hear Mr. Mills, who hails from Texas, claim that the tariff has nothing to do with wages, because wages are higher in some States than in others. The tariff wrought its best fruit in New England and the enterprising North and West. Wages are lower in Arkansas and Louisiana and South Carolina, because slavery condemned the black and poor white people to ignorance; and after the war under the inherited system it was too long disgraceful to labor.

The wages of her men and women are not much more than half the wages paid in New England. It is amazing to hear Representatives from the Southern States unite to denounce the tariff, when the South most needs protection. New England and Pennsylvania, rich with the fruits of a general system of manufactures, may well smile at the folly of these Southern leaders blinded by prejudice.

The United States Government was formed in part for the creation and promotion of manufactures. The Confederate States government was formed to stimulate agriculture alone and to import manufactures.

Will the old South never recant this clause of the Confederate constitution?

> But no bounties shall be granted from the treasury, nor shall any duties or taxes on importations from foreign nations be laid to promote or foster any industry.

On this charter of free trade and slave labor the South based the fabric of a commercial alliance with England—the exchange of cheap manufactures from cheap foreign labor for unlimited cotton from cheap slave labor. The war cry of the old South was slave labor and free trade. Slavery has gone, but these leaders of the old South here on this floor fight for the English alliance and free trade once more. Free trade is still the dream of the old South, whose corner-stone was the plantation idea—wide lands, an accomplished few enriched by the ignorant many toiling for bare subsistence.

The old South, whose old master class can forget with magnanimity the bitterness of the war, but can not forget the enfranchisement of their slaves.

The old South, which, appalled at the rule of the ignorant majority, resorts in turn to violence or fraud, convinced that if ever the small white minority yields at the ballot-box to the growing black majority then will be the doom in the cotton States of public and private rights.

The old South, which, bewildered by the gravest problem of civilization, blindly keeps solid the black vote by outside pressure, by the denial of full citizenship, which excuses the fraudulent denial of a fair poll or count in communities where there is a black majority, by reason of color, ignorance, and poverty, convinced that fraud affords the only escape from the supremacy of the poor and ignorant mass.

The old South, which passionately forbids massed black ignorance to be counted against its own intelligent white minority, but with shameless inconsistency believes it right to count this uncounted black vote wherever the South needs an offset to as many intelligent workingmen's votes actually cast in the North and West, believes it right to thus quadruple the power of the white minority of the cotton States at an election for President and Congress.

This old South, whose old Confederate leaders on this floor now seek by free-trade and the English alliance to readjust the old plantation idea to raw products of mines and fields with cheap peasant labor.

The young men of the South begin to realize, though slowly, that when the white minority stoops to fraud upon the poll or count, it controls the massed majority at the cost of its own civic virtue and debasement of the moral sense of the community.

There is hope in the new South with her exultation in her new-found treasures, her inexhaustible mines of coal and iron, her mountains of iron and salt, her copper, lead, her granite, her fire-clay, her cement and lime rock, all imperiled by this bill. The new South, with its nascent industrial fire, its gleams of wealth through whirling spindles and looms and molten glass.

The new South, with its growing impatience with the plantation idea, the growing belief that the Northern township system will be potential, and that peasant labor can not sustain "Southern booms." The new South by slow degrees learning that the healthful growth of Southern towns and cities must be grounded upon the education of the whole mass of the people, by the free consent of all under a local self-government with equal civil rights as citizens. The new South, conscious of the value of its free black labor, beginning dimly to see that this labor robbed of its dues for two centuries must be educated if the South would rival Northern labor, if it wants the factory to raise the value of the farms, and around the shops to grow a village.

The new South, which believes it must lift its labor above the level of Europe, and that like the North it must eventually pay its skilled workers in metal, glass, wool, and cotton 50 per cent. more than the old world if it would transform its towns into cities and diffuse prosperity over countless small farms.

Upon this new South, thrilling with mighty enterprises, developing her mines, founding her cities, Mr. Cleveland's message against a protective tariff fell like some unwelcome bell knelling a departed friend. This cry of free raw materials is the device whereby to drive the new South back to free trade before her transformation weds her to the tariff which made New England great. In this spirit John Randolph said he would go a mile out of his way to kick a sheep. He hated the animal which made the farmers protectionists.

Like another Tannhauser, the new South has just broken away from the toils of slavery. It has awakened to the industries of earth. Just as it has made paths in the trackless forest, just when it is exploring the seams of earth to extract its ores, just as it stands by the mouths of its new-made coal-pits, the President's message and the Mills bill summon the new South again to slumber, that the vines may cumber the forests, that bats and owls may inhabit the shafts of deserted mines, that spiders may weave their webs over the mouths of the coal-pits, that the grass may grow again in the village streets. [Applause.]

Like another Tannhauser, this last cry will break the illusion of free trade that so long has blinded the South.

Instead of Cleveland's curfew, we will set the morning school-bells ringing in the South. [Applause].

Mr. HEMPHILL. Have you ever been South?

Mr. McCOMAS. I have, somewhat.

Mr. HEMPHILL. How many times?

Mr. McCOMAS. Many times. I was born and bred on the Potomac, in a slave State, and I live there yet.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, I do not live in that country either. I want to know whether the gentleman has ever been south of the Potomac.

Mr. McCOMAS. Oh, yes; lived South, and sometimes traveled South.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Recently?

Mr. McCOMAS. I have been there recently, and would be glad to go again to the gentleman's country; would be glad to meet my friend there; would be glad to observe the effect of protection still retained at 100 per cent. on rice in his State, and above all would be glad to go there next election day to look upon peaceful and fair elections and the eight ballot-boxes to deceive the illiterate voters; would be glad to see there such a state of sentiment as is represented on this side by seventeen men, friends of the American industrial system from the Southern States—six from Virginia, four of them gallant ex-Confederates as well as Republicans; two from Tennessee, one from West Virginia, one from Maryland, two from North Carolina, three from Kentucky, in spite of the deadly enmity of the whisky ring, the deadly foe of the protective tariff; my two neighbors yonder from Missouri, the whole seventeen, except the two brave soldier Republicans from Missouri, Republicans who are "native and to the manor born"—born and bred in the slave States, belonging there, and all of them the peers of any man from the South, on this floor as well as at their own homes and among their own constituents. [Applause.]

I lament that able and fair-minded men like my friend from South Carolina can be standing here against the best interests of my section as well as the grand interests of my country, while these Republican ex-Confederates and these Republican Union soldiers, these Republican native-born Representatives from the South, come here to cast 17 votes from the new South against this free-trade bill which would bring ruin to the South even more than to other portions of the Union. I hope the gentleman is satisfied with my answer.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The gentleman's eloquence, I will say, with proper respect to my friend, is only surpassed by his ignorance. One peculiarity of people who live North and are Republicans is that they not only want to regulate their own affairs but those of everybody else. Now, we from the South are supposed to know what are the interests of our section. We are sent here for the purpose of representing those interests by as intelligent constituents as any persons in this country. We have no feeling of opposition to the North; let its people make all the money they can——

Mr. McCOMAS. I can not yield for my friend to make a speech, though he is able to make a very good one; the time I have remaining is too short. He does not hesitate, by helping the Mills bill, to try to regulate and ruin the interests of my State—its coal, its glass, cement, and labor.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois (to Mr. HEMPHILL). What do you pay your laborers?

Mr. HEMPHILL. We pay them all we can afford to pay them under this miserable protective system, which takes almost everything to satisfy the demands of oppressive taxation.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. In Illinois a farm hand gets $20 to $25 a month, because we have diversified industries. In South Carolina such laborers receive but $6 to $7 a month. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEMPHILL. In addition to their wages we give them a home. I guaranty that we pay our laborers as much, counting provisions and home, together with actual cash, as similar laborers are paid in Illinois.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I will say——

Mr. McCOMAS. I can not yield further; I have something myself to say about that. In reply to the gentleman from South Carolina, who says Maryland is not a Southern State, I wish to say in 1861 your people, imbued with the poison of the subtile and able Calhoun, the virus from the fangs of secession, sent her commissioners who came to the people of Maryland and plead with her as a Southern State to go with them into secession, bankruptcy, and ruin. You called her then a Southern State. Although lying on the Potomac, and although a slave State, she vindicated her right to come farther North when she sent 46,000 Union soldiers to defend that flag which hangs over the Speaker's chair upon the field of battle when your war cry was free trade and slave labor and ours was protection to white labor and freedom to slave labor in this country. [Great applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman's own ignorance is narrow indeed when he restricts and limits the South to South Carolina. It was so once, but is no longer.

But when you say we are to be likened to the North and West, we in Maryland begin to rival their glowing activity. I thank thee, Jew, for that word. [Applause.]

ORGANIZED LABOR—BLAIR BILL—PROTECTIVE TARIFF.

Mr. Chairman, these three things affright the old Bourbon régime—organized labor, the Blair bill, and a protective tariff. Organized labor which in the freer States by manifold endeavors, through blunder and defeat, still is always groping upward toward the light, and destined under liberty and law to grandly help the uplifting of all mankind in this favored land. Organized labor, so blindly battled with by the leaders of the old South on this floor, will yet prevail, as in this modern world the strength of numbers ever ultimately prevails.

If these free-trade leaders are statesmen they should beware lest the black labor of the South, robbed of two centuries of education, of self-help, standing with its eyes blinded, may take hold of the middle pillars of our house, while our Philistines are sacrificing to their god Free Trade, and are making merry with our Southern people, and pull down our house upon us to avenge its two eyes.

The Blair bill, which is the surest remedy to ward off such awful calamity, whereby in separate schools the children of the slaves may be fitted for intelligent labor and citizenship which makes organized workers in contented homes the bulwark of the nation. The protective tariff which, linked with organized labor and national educational aid, will destroy proscription, prejudice, and sectionalism.

COAL AND IRON ON THE FREE-LIST.

The clamor of the Southern people, the stern protests from the mines and the towns disconcerted the plan to put coal and iron on the free-list, but these free-traders were not to be foiled. Anthracite coal is on the free-list and bituminous coal is not mentioned. They have put on the free-list "all mineral substances in a crude state and metals unwrought not specially enumerated or provided for. They do not specifically enumerate bituminous coal, which is a mineral substance in a crude state, nor iron which is metal unwrought, and the last section of the Mills bill repeals all laws or parts of laws in conflict therewith. They have openly put all the products of coal on the free-list.

The simple device of omitting to specify bituminous coal, repealing the law which did specify it, and putting it on the free-list as a "mineral substance in a crude state" will not long be hidden from the new South concerned for its coal and iron.

I now charge that since this bill was introduced here our free-trade Treasury chiefs have by a mere ruling repealed the tariff law which protected coal.

For a hundred years, since George Washington signed the first tariff act, bituminous and semi-bituminous coal of commerce have been protected. All the semi-bituminous coal of the Atlantic slope, the coal of Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, much of the coal of Pennsylvania has been protected. Suddenly, in March, our Secretary declared that all coal with less than 20 per cent. of volatile combustible matter is anthracite, and therefore free. It matters not that anthracite averages less than 5 per cent. of volatile matter.

For the first time the Cumberland coal of my own State and the Pocahontas coal of Virginia are declared to be anthracite by the Treasury, though still called semi-bituminous by all mankind.

The bituminous coal of Swansea, Wales, and the bituminous coal of Canada are already coming into our ports and will not be stopped unless this House shall declare that a free-trade Secretary can not legislate and thus enlarge the free-list at will to give the railroad, the gas, and steam-ship monopolies free trade in coal before the Mills bill has passed. And I would vote to impeach the Secretary of the Treasury who has dared to usurp the functions of Congress, who has boldly put bituminous coal on the free-list in defiance of the law.

THE AMERICAN SYSTEM—ITS SPLENDID DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the lamentations of the other side, who forget that for eleven years they have controlled this House, and for three years past ruled this country. If the plain people, the working people of my country, can be diverted, by these querulous complaints, from the greatness of the American protective system and the splendor of its development as fashioned by the national Republican party during the recent twenty-five years, they indeed are our people—

Like the people—

To borrow from an old philosopher—

who when they went to Olympia could only perceive that they were scorched by the sun, and pressed by the crowd, and wetted by the rain, and that life was full of disagreeable and troublesome things, and so they almost forgot the great colossus of ivory and gold, Phidias's statue of Zeus which they had come to see, and which stood in all its glory and power before their perturbed and foolish vision.

I believe rather that the vast majority of our people will, with our foremost statesman, again declare for that policy which inspires labor with hope and crowns it with dignity, which gives safety to capital and protects its increase, which secures political power to every citizen, culture and comfort to every home. [Great applause.]

Mr. HEMPHILL. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, simply, if the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS] will give me his attention for a moment, that in my remarks a few moments ago I desired to express my understanding of his lack of information as to the condition of things in the Southern States. My remark had reference exclusively to that, and was intended in no sense to be offensive.

Mr. McCOMAS. I appreciate that. I could not understand the gentleman from South Carolina as intending to give or myself as desiring to take offense at what he has said.

Mr. HEMPHILL. It was only that I did not think the gentleman had sufficient personal knowledge of the subject upon which he was then speaking to enable him to advance opinions of that character.

Mr. McCOMAS. I hope to have the opportunity of witnessing in person, at no distant date, the condition of affairs there, and especially would I like to see an election held.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will be delighted to see the gentleman there on such an occasion, and promise to show him an election where there is a voter for every vote.

Mr. HOUK. But counted differently from the way they are cast.

Mr. HEMPHILL. No, sir; counted just as they are cast.

Mr. PERKINS. That would undoubtedly be a rare sight, which a man might be justified in going so many miles to see.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Very well; we will be very glad to show it to gentlemen who choose to favor us with their presence there.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I claim no superior knowledge as an expert in the "dismal science." I can not assume to be as well informed on the tariff question as the learned gentlemen who have heretofore spoken upon the subject, nor do I hope for one moment that what I may say will afford any specially valuable contribution to the economic thought or literary excellence of this discussion. But believing as I do, that the subject under consideration is one of supreme importance, and of the utmost interest to every section of our common country, I have felt constrained to record my convictions and express some reasons for the faith within me.

During the brief period of my Congressional service I have witnessed two occasions in this House which impressed themselves in an extraordinary degree upon my observation. They attracted great public attention and will not soon pass from the memory of those who were then present. I allude to what occurred on May 6, 1884, and June 17, 1886. On the first of these dates the enacting clause of the tariff bill as then proposed was stricken out by a vote of 159 yeas to 155 nays; on the last the House refused to enter upon the consideration of a kindred measure by a vote of 140 yeas to 157 nays. The results of these votes, the political complexion of which is well known, were greeted with applause by the protectionists, and the country was given to understand that the burdens of war taxation, indefensible as they are in times of peace, should continue to oppress the people. In the face of Executive recommendation, in spite of popular clamor for tax reduction, and the consensus of the best political economists of all parties as to the absolute necessity for legislative action, in the presence of a constantly accumulating revenue beyond the requirement for an economical administration of the Government, and the inevitable consequence of an abnormal and prodigious surplus in the Federal Treasury, aside from the palpable injustice and obvious impolicy of perpetuating the existing system of taxation, there could not then be found in this great House of the people a sufficient number of their chosen Representatives who would even allow time and opportunity to investigate or reform apparent abuses, or in any manner relieve the tax-payers from confessed oppression.

When, however, on the 17th of April of this good year, the motion was made by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means to begin the consideration of the bill now before us, no voice was heard in opposition. High-tariff men, Republicans and Democrats, "opened not their mouths." It seemed to be realized on all sides that remedial action could not longer be delayed, that the last continuance had been granted, and the time for trial had arrived.

What the fate of the pending bill shall be no one can safely prognosticate. It is within the power of the protectionists to defeat it—to strangle and destroy it ere final consideration is reached; to obstruct and wear it out. But whatever may be the result, I sincerely hope that no Converse will be found on this side of the Chamber to take the initiative in its decapitation, that no man who calls himself a Democrat will draw the first dagger or deal the first blow. In view of the conditions that surround us, and the intrepid stand taken by the President, I can not perceive how any Democrat can afford to antagonize the general proposition now submitted in the direction of reducing taxation and simplifying the processes of its collection. It is possible, as intimated, for the opposition to prevent the passage of the bill in its present shape, or as it may be amended, to prevent any relief contemplated by its provisions, and thereby maintain the present status of the tariff schedules. If any bill of the sort shall pass, it will be the result of Democratic persistency and aggression, and by the grace and permission of the Republican party both in the House and in the Senate.

If there be no tariff legislation the Republican party will be responsible for the failure. One thing is certain: the Democrats are inflexibly determined to crowd and press this great issue before Congress and the country. The fight has been going on for years. The agitation will not cease until something is accomplished. The people in the factory and in the field, in the shop and at the shambles, whether they live by the expenditure of brain or brawn, at the North or in the South, everywhere throughout this great country, expect and require some certain and definite action, some decision and settlement of the question. They can not and will not brook further suspense. The Armageddon of American politics is at hand. The lines are being drawn. Choose you this day whom you will serve. He that is not for us is against us. If a Democrat favor a continuation of war taxes, let him go to the camp of the enemy; if a Republican love country better than partisanship, let him join the ranks of reform; if any patriot prefer the general good to special advantage and class benefit, now is the time to show his colors. Listen to the authoritative declaration of your respective parties four years ago:

> The Democratic party has failed completely to relieve the people of the burden of unnecessary taxation by a wise reduction of the surplus. The Republican party pledges itself to correct the inequalities of the tariff and to reduce the surplus.—Republican Platform of 1884.
> That change is necessary is proved by an existing surplus of more than $100,000,000 which has yearly been collected from a suffering people. Unnecessary taxation is unjust taxation. * * * The Democratic party is pledged to revise the tariff in a spirit of fairness to all interests.—Democratic Platform of 1884.

Read the message of the Union's Executive, who is charged with conserving the public weal, at the beginning of this Congress. He emphasizes the gravity of the situation. Look at it as you will, it sounds the note of alarm and can not be disregarded. He has hoisted the danger-signal and the world has seen it. Our safety and prosperity depend upon heeding the warning and putting into practical operation the plain behests of representative duty.

Gentlemen of the House, after all, the great body of our constituents are homogeneous. Tax-payers have kindred interests and cognate sympathies. Political parties, it is true, are necessary factors in republican institutions. Party alignments were formed in the very incipiency of our Government, and will and ought always to exist. I believe there always have been and ever will be conscientious citizens of the American Union who entertain different views and conflicting sentiments on questions of public policy. I do not believe that any party has now or ever will have a monopoly of all the virtue and purity, or all the vice and profligacy, which adorn on the one side, or degrade on the other, the administration of governmental affairs. There are good men and bad men alike in every human association. Evil communications will corrupt the good manners of all the sons of Adam.

But in the presence of a common danger, in the blazing light which unmistakably reveals the absolute necessity for a conservation of the best interests of the Republic, there must and will be found sufficient unity of purpose and concentration of effort to meet, in some measure, the demands of the situation. Selfishness must be made to yield to the paramount requirement of the general good and public welfare.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me unnecessary to repeat the current platitudes and generic postulates which ever attend a tariff discussion. The diverse constructions of constitutional power and purpose are known of all men. The infinite variety of transformation and verbal adjustment of old statement, the artistic modern formulation of ancient dicta, however ingeniously constructed, can make no substantial addition to what has so often been announced. What I said in the Forty-eighth Congress in this connection is perhaps equally applicable to the present time:

> It were practically impossible, at this day, for any man to suggest anything new or essentially different from the manifold thought and treatment which the subject of Federal taxation has received in this country from time to time. It has engaged the attention and inspired the research of governmental philosophers for more than a century, and statesmen and essayists have in turn given it their current contributions. It has been so often discussed, critically considered, and profoundly explored that the very language employed is generic, the platitudes identical, the illustrations parallel, the methods threadbare. With a very slight adjustment of transposition, and the elimination of modern data, it will be discovered upon close inspection that much of our recent literature upon this subject is but the adroit reproduction of what was said scores of years ago.

It is not assumed by the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means, nor any one else, that the bill reported is perfect, nor is it expected that it shall be exempt from legitimate criticism. There are, perhaps, many objections which may be urged against it, but it will serve at least as the ground-plan for the interchange of representative opinion and the foundation for legislative judgment. It seems to me that we ought to discuss its defects and commend its merits in the spirit of fairness and concession, and strive to meet on some common ground. I am for the bill, with some amendments. If they can not be had, I will take it as it is and give it an earnest support as the best that can now be accomplished. My most serious general objection to the bill is that it is too protective. It leaves the duties on many articles far too high, which at earlier periods in our history would have been regarded as monstrous. Its chief reductions, amounting to $46,645,112.48, are made by additions to the free-list and subtractions from excise or internal-revenue sources. I am not sure that the importation of articles upon which imposts are lessened will not be stimulated to such an extent as to increase the revenues now derived therefrom. In that event, however, some benefit would result in favor of the mass of consumers. There is more required of us than merely stopping an inflow of surplus. That, of course, is an important desideratum, but a thorough revision and adjustment of the entire tariff law is absolutely needed.

Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to discuss specially only one feature of the bill, and that is section 3, which relates to wool and the manufactures thereof, to be found on pages 27 to 29. By its terms all wools are placed upon the free-list, while articles made from wool are taxed upon an average of 39.87 per cent., ad valorem. Wool contributes to the proposed reduction its present average ad valorem of 29.60 per cent., while its manufactures are only made to surrender 29.05 per cent. This, in my judgment, is disproportionate, and I give notice that at the proper time I shall either move or support an amendment which will reduce the duties on woolen manufactures to an average ad valorem of 25 per cent. Just here I beg to reproduce a portion of my former speech, submitted April 22, 1884, bearing upon this subject:

I may fail to convince the opposition, and may not satisfy the sheepmen of the country, that the proposed reduction in the tariff on wool will not injuriously affect the wool business; that it will not measurably embarrass that interest and depress prices. I might content myself by saying—what ought to be a conclusive reason—that it is unjust and unconstitutional to tax the great body of the people to protect that or any other interest; that protection to one sheep-raiser, if it increases the cost of the consumer's necessities, means oppression and injustice to fifty other good citizens engaged in other pursuits, and that the conscientious discharge of apparent duty is infinitely above and beyond any consideration of the mere consequences involved.

But I do not believe, in the presence of living facts and the truth of history, that high tariffs on wools necessarily bring high prices to the wool-grower. I am not prepared to state the exact extent to which the character of wools produced in Texas enters into competition with that imported from foreign countries; but feel warranted in the statement that it is limited.

Mr. Hurd, in his recent admirable speech, said:

"There are three grades or classes of wool in the market—first, the superfine or the Silesian wool; second, the intermediary or combing wool; and third, the coarse carpet wool. Of these America does not produce the superfine wool or the carpet wool, and it can not produce them. Therefore no duty on them can be of any benefit to the farmer of this country. He does not grow them.

"As to the intermediary grade this is the situation: The wools of the foreign countries have a fiber and texture which our wools do not possess, and the American manufacturer needs them to mix with American wool to produce the best results. No man can make a good suit of clothes made from American goods alone. From England, from France, and other parts of the world we want the wool with their fiber to make the best product for our manufacturer in his work of supplying the home demand.

* * * * * * *

"I believe every pound of American wool of intermediary grade that comes into this country will make more valuable every pound of wool raised here. The basis of my proposition on this point is that the foreign wool does not come into America in competition with American wool, but to supplement its deficiencies. This is no idle theory of mine."

As to the general effect of the tariff on the prices of wool in this country I take the liberty to quote in addition the following extract from a very able published letter of Senator J. H. Slater to the secretary of the wool-growers' convention of Oregon, of date December 30, 1883:

"It has been demonstrated over and over again from the statistics of wool prices in this country, covering a period of many years, during which time wool has been subjected to varying duties, sometimes practically prohibitory, at other times letting in the lower grades entirely free, with a moderate duty upon the higher and firmer grades, that the domestic product has always borne better prices under low tariffs or when wool was free than during periods of high duties. This fact has been reiterated in this country and elsewhere many times by publicists of the highest character.

In corroboration of this statement I invite attention to the following quotations from the forcible speech of Hon. WILLIAM M. SPRINGER in the last Congress:

"In 1867 the wool-growers of the country and the manufacturers of woolen goods succeeded in inducing Congress to impose protective duties on the importation of foreign wools, and also to impose such additional duties upon importations of foreign woolen goods as would compensate them for the loss they would sustain by reason of the duties on the raw material. The tariff upon wool prior to 1867 had been fluctuating under various acts of Congress from 1824 to 1865. Some of these acts place the duties very low. From 1858 to 1861 wool costing 20 cents per pound or less was on the free-list, and all other wools paid a duty of 24 per cent. ad valorem. From 1862 to 1864 the duty on wools costing 18 cents per pound and less was but 5 per cent. ad valorem; and over 18 cents and less than 24 cents it was 3 cents per pound; and over 24 cents per pound in price, 9 cents per pound in duty.

"Between 1865 and 1866 the tariff on wool costing 12 cents per pound and less was 3 cents per pound, and costing over 12 cents up to 24 cents per pound the duty was 6 cents per pound, and between 24 cents per pound and 32 cents per pound the duty was 10 cents per pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem; and on all wools costing over 32 cents per pound the duty was 12 cents per pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem. The act of August 28, 1866, slightly changed these duties, but they remained substantially the same until the taking effect of the act of March 2, 1867, the law now in force. I will not recapitulate the various tariffs imposed by the act of 1867. The classification prepared for Government experts embraces one hundred and sixty-eight different standard samples of wool to be taxed under this law. The duties, however, vary from 18 to 110 per cent.

"These burdens are very unequally distributed on the different classes of wool, carpet wools being taxed at the rate of from 18 to 39 per cent. ad valorem, while fine wool pays from 37 to 88 per cent. in the grease, and from 31 to 96 per cent. if washed, and from 73 to 110 per cent. if in scoured condition. It will be seen that the high tariff upon fine washed and scoured wools has had a marked effect upon the manufacture of woolen goods in this country, and has worked greatly to the injury of both the wool-growers and manufacturers, as will be seen as I proceed further.

"The wool-growers felicitated themselves after the passage of the act of 1867 upon the success which had attended their efforts in securing a protective tariff on their product; but we will see how far their expectations have been realized. Their object in securing tariff legislation was to prevent foreign wools from competing with their products. They desired to practically exclude many classes of wool from our markets in order that they might receive greater prices for all they might raise. I shall be able to prove that, so far from realizing their expectations, the market has actually been depressed; that in the States east of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers the number of sheep has vastly decreased, and that the price of wool has averaged less per pound since the high tariffs were imposed than prevailed previously under the low tariffs.

* * * * * * *

"I have stated that since the passage of the protective tariff act of 1867 up to the present time, a period of fifteen years, the price of wool in this country has been less than it was for the fifteen years next preceding that time. This proposition is not left to conjecture or speculation. Fortunately for the position which I assume, the most accurate and reliable data upon this subject have been preserved, and herewith I present for careful examination the following statement furnished by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department.

Statement showing the average price of medium American washed clothing fleece wool from 1824 to 1881, inclusive.

JOSEPH NIMMO, JR., Chief of Bureau.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
February 3, 1882.

The average price for the fifteen years preceding 1867 was 58.8 cents per pound. The average price for the fifteen years succeeding 1867 was 48.6 cents per pound. These statements, supported as they are by facts and figures, are exceedingly cogent and to my mind unanswerable. But be that as it may, with me the solution of the matter, as before intimated, does not depend upon the possible results to one class of business enterprise, but upon doing what is right. I can not, as a public representative, sworn to support the Constitution, seeking general justice, economic administration, and fair dealing to the entire people, ask that wool be protected, if it has to be done at the expense of all other interests and thereby lay the foundation for the protection of everything else which clamors for class legislation. I consent to and shall vote for the reduction on wool as proposed by the bill under consideration, as well as for all other reductions contemplated, as far as they go, believing that to the extent of such reductions the general well-being of the people will be promoted. But while this is the case I wish to contend that an average reduction of 15.06 per cent. on wool is not met by an average reduction of only 19.99 per cent. on the manufactures of wool, as estimated under this bill.

The following statistical statement, prepared at my request by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, shows the operations of the tariff upon wool and the manufactures thereof, and the relative difference in the results of the old law and the act of March 3, 1883:

JOS. NIMMO, JR., Chief of Bureau.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Bureau of Statistics, March 7, 1884.

From this it appears that the duty on the character of wools therein stated was decreased, while that upon woolen manufactures was increased as indicated, under the act of the Forty-seventh Congress. The inequality was glaring enough under the old law. The reasonable proportion and adjustment of rates would have demanded under that a very considerable reduction on the manufactures of wool to have equalized them with those upon the raw materials. And now while the present bill limits the maximum rate of duty on wools and woolens at 60 per cent. ad valorem, and is pro tanto a relief to the people, yet I think it preserves and perpetuates, to a greater or less extent, many of the original vices, and in addition provides:

"That nothing in this act shall operate to reduce the duty above imposed on any article below the rate at which said article was dutiable under 'An act to provide for the payment of outstanding Treasury notes, to authorize a loan, to regulate and fix the duties on imports, and for other purposes,' approved March 2, 1861, commonly called the 'Morrill tariff.'"

This clause prevents, it is true, a 20 per cent. reduction on some characters of wool, but comes, I think, materially to the aid of certain woolen manufactures, and allows the duties thereon to remain too high. I do not favor any indorsement of the maladjustment or cabalistic features of the existing tariff law. In my judgment the pruning ought to be thorough and the reformation radical. "What is worth doing at all is worth doing well." If existing conditions are condemned, it seems to me that "the ax ought to be laid to the root of the tree;" if the tares are to be separated from the wheat, why not collect them all, and apply the fire? I believe in an intrepid policy and a heroic treatment of this national disease. If it be wise and proper to agitate the tariff question—and that it is I entertain no doubt—the agitation, it seems to me, should be comprehensive, and the work of reformation extend all along the line.

No skirmishing, no half-way measure, no temporizing expedient will elicit popular commendation or endure the test of enlightened criticism. If the desired and necessary legislation can not be accomplished—and under the present composition of Congress I fear it is hopeless—a courageous assertion of principle, an exhibition of the faith within us can be made. Now, I have no adverse criticism to make upon the pending bill, save the propriety of eliminating therefrom the defects and inequalities which characterize the past enactments; if they are to furnish the model, if it were left to me, I would lop off their excrescences, heal their deformities, and eschew their vices. But if in the judgment of wiser men it will be now impracticable to obviate these imperfections, I shall support the bill in its present shape in the interest of harmony and concert of action. For one, I am willing to lay upon the altar of the common country every selfish consideration, and that my people shall rely upon their natural resources, their own protective energies, the legitimate profits of their own pursuits, unaided by any tribute to be extracted at the toil and expense of their fellow-men.

It is neither impolitic nor improper to demand an equivalent concession at the hands of others. The humblest shepherd, who in the solitude of the Western prairies attends his flock and listens to the bleating of his lambs, is the peer of the grandest millionaire in the crowded city, whose music comes from the hum of his spindles and the clang of his machinery. The one is just as good, just as nobly born, just as American, just as much entitled to consideration as the others. Equal rights is the transcript of the paternal mind, planted in the corner-stone of our republican edifice, and when by ruthless hand removed, the stately structure will be in ruins.

Mr. Chairman, I ask indulgence to discuss this clause of the bill from a Texas standpoint.

I have before me the report of the Comptroller of Public Accounts of the State of Texas for the year ending August 31, 1887, which contains statements showing the assessment of property for taxation in that State for the year 1887, as taken from the official rolls of the different counties. In it I find the number and value of sheep rendered for taxes for the years 1886 and 1887. It shows for the year 1886 4,543,765 sheep, valued at $5,282,814; for the year 1887, 4,275,394 sheep, valued at $5,016,674. The number of decrease from that of 1886 is 268,371, valued at $266,140. Mr. Dodge, the Statistician of the Department of Agriculture, estimates the number of sheep in Texas in January, 1888, at 4,523,739, with an average value of $1.52 per head, amounting in the aggregate to $6,864,744. I quote from him the following estimate of the number, average price, and total value of sheep in all the States and Territories of the United States.

It is, I think, worthy of note that while the average value of sheep per head for the whole country is placed at $2.05, the lowest average, where sheep-raising is of special importance, is given to Texas and New Mexico. The fleeces of this quality of sheep, however, would, it is believed, be in greater demand for purposes of manufacturing admixture with the finer wools that would be imported, as a result of the removal of the present duties on wools. The average value of sheep per head in Texas, as shown by the Comptroller's report, is only $1.13. This, however, is from the standpoint of taxable valuation and rendition.

Mr. Chairman, I have taken the pains to make a careful computation of the number and value of sheep in the counties which compose the Congressional district which I have the honor to represent in this body, and I discover that the number, as shown from the most authentic sources at my command, is 1,035,396, valued at $1,196,932, a greater number than that found in the entire State of Indiana, and almost equal to that of Missouri or Colorado. There are but ten of the States and Territories which contain more sheep than the Eleventh Congressional district of Texas; and yet I shall vote for free wool without any fear of injuring the people of my district or retarding the well-being and prosperity of my State.

Let us examine and see if the wool-growers of Texas have any just grounds for opposing the free-wool clause of the bill, and whether their complaints and resolutions against their delegation in Congress are well founded. Of course we deem it impossible to either convince or conciliate our Republican constituents, and such Democrats as cling irremovably to the tenets of protection. But there are those who do not believe that the mere owning of sheep or investment in wool-growing are adequate causes for a transfer of party allegiance, and it is not every sheep-raiser in Texas that will vote the Republican ticket. Some, yea, many, of them are Democrats, and will continue to be Democrats, "in whom there is no guile."

In January, 1883, as shown by the Comptroller's report, there were 4,491,600 sheep in Texas. This was during the high-tariff period, and before the duties on wool were reduced by the act of March 3, 1883. The number appears to be slightly greater in 1886 and less in 1887; and it is not improbable, I think, that the official assessment for taxation may show some falling off for 1888. Much, if not all, of the decrease may be attributed to disease, the severity of recent winters, insufficient shelter, and the fact, as stated in the late report of Mr. Dodge, that "some of the flock-masters in Texas have sent considerable numbers to New Mexico." There has been no greater, and I think far less decline in the profits of this industry than has attended other business pursuits and avocations; nor do I believe that the tariff duties before or since the act of March 3, 1883, have been of any appreciable advantage to the Texas wool-grower, nor specially augmented the prices of the quality of wool grown by him.

In the rush for purchase and investment a few years ago, owing to the profitable utilization of our cheap lands and the supposed fortunes that sheep-raising would yield, there was much of improvident speculation by many persons not experts in sheep values, and having no practical experience in their necessary treatment and preservation. Poor management, the scab, cold weather, and want of proper knowledge and attention will produce their own consequences, whether there be high tariffs, low tariffs, or no tariffs at all. In Texas we have cheap pastoral lands in great abundance at $2 to $3 per acre, indigenous and nutritious grasses, and ordinarily mild climatic conditions. Herding expenses are comparatively inconsiderable, and when the methods of sheep-growing are properly understood and observed, it must and always will be, as a rule, reasonably profitable. Waiving the point as to whether a tariff on wool is necessary in other States, where lands are worth from $50 to $150 per acre, where sheep require artificial and cultivated food, where expenses are heavy, where only fine wools are produced, I can not perceive why there should come any wail from the Texas sheep-pen at the prospect of free wool, or that it shall ever be said of our shepherd in any event—

He left his crook, he left his flocks.

May it not be presumed that should the wool industry through any possibility deteriorate elsewhere, it would find its appropriate transfer and diversion of its energies to our inviting region? The selfishness involved precludes further pursuit of this proposition. It is not unlikely, I think, that some high-tariff advocates dread Texas competition as much as foreign importation.

There has been for several years—

Says Mr. Dodge—

a deportation of sheep from Pennsylvania to the cheaper grasses of the far West.

There are less sheep now in the whole State of Pennsylvania by 51,041 than in my Congressional district. I commend this statement to the careful consideration of my friends from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROWELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. LANHAM. Certainly, if it be pertinent to this branch of the subject.

Mr. ROWELL. Do you believe that the price of wool will go down by the amount of tariff tax taken off?

Mr. LANHAM. I can show you, sir, from the reports of the fifteen years preceding and succeeding the protective tariff act of 1867 that the prices of wool absolutely were higher under a low tariff than under a high tariff. I can establish that, I think, by authentic data.

Mr. ROWELL. Then you believe that clothing will cost more under free wool than with wool protected?

Mr. LANHAM. No, sir; I do not believe it will, for reasons which I will endeavor to explain.

Paradoxical as it may appear to my friend from Illinois, I believe that with the repeal of the duties on wool, higher grades of wool grown abroad would be imported for admixture with American wool. The effect of the tariff has been to give to foreign manufacturers a practical monopoly of such wools of Australasia and South America, and they have been able to manufacture and sell to us large quantities of manufactures, notwithstanding our high duty on woolen goods. Our woolen mills by reason of this fact have been seriously crippled, and consequently the market for American wool greatly depressed. By giving our domestic manufacturers foreign wools at the same prices paid by their British competitors to mix with native wools, they will be able to pay as good or better prices for the home product, and yet furnish cheaper and better goods to the consumer. Be this as it may, I would remove all possible doubt, by reducing the duties on woolen manufactures to an average ad valorem of 25 per cent., as before stated.

Mr. Chairman, I desire for the purpose of comparison, and to show that the wool industry has suffered no greater reverses in the shrinkage of values, or from other causes than those which have befallen other enterprises, to allude again to the report of the Comptroller of the State of Texas. I find that in 1886 there were rendered for taxes 6,955,248 cattle, valued at $60,852,938; in 1887, 7,081,976, valued at $51,008,550, an increase in number for 1887 of 126,728, but a decrease in value of $9,844,338, and the average value of cattle per head is placed at $7.20. From the same report I ascertain that there were 2,317,396 cattle in my district, valued at $19,596,380. In view of these statements, is there any valid reason why the cattleman should be forced to pay any tribute to the sheepman?

I regret that I am not prepared to show to what extent the business of the farmer went down during the same period.

They were years of unprecedented drought, dearth, and desolation. There was scarcely sufficient bread for the eater or seed for the sower. The distress which obtained in the agricultural counties of my district is simply indescribable. They appealed to the State Legislature and to Congress for relief, and private charity was dispensed with a liberal hand. Congress passed a bill providing for a distribution of seeds in these drought-stricken counties through the Commissioner of Agriculture. The President vetoed it, and told us that it was the duty of the people to support the Government, and not the duty of the Government to support the people. I am glad to say that there is now a splendid prospect for abundant harvests in this afflicted region; but what bounties of Government, what protective tariffs will enhance the value of the farmer's products? What will his wheat and corn be worth per bushel and his cotton per pound? He must work "day in and day out," "from weary chime to chime," live on frugal fare, and study the hard problem of how to "make buckle and tongue meet," looking alone to his own strong arm and the blessing of Providence. Talk about factory hands, and operatives in machinery, and corporations' servants, and Government employés, and eight-hours-a-day-law laborers, and bestow all deserved sympathy upon them; but there are none of them who, in my opinion, are not better paid in proportion to the amount of labor performed than the average tiller of the soil, and none of them who would exchange places with him. The fact is there are too many of the American people who have a distaste for sweat and solar exposure. Is there any reasonable excuse that I could offer to the farmers of my district should I vote to keep a tax on wool for the supposed benefit of the sheep-raiser, for them to pay?

I, for one, am not prepared to return to my constituency without aiding, as far as I can, in removing the oppression of the unnecessary and unjust taxation they are now compelled to bear. They are too sensible to believe that the yoke of war taxes is easy and its burden is light. The wool-grower is just as good as the farmer, the mechanic, the blacksmith, the professional man, but he is no better. He has no special claim for legislative favoritism beyond that enjoyed by the humblest consumer in the land.

But is the tariff now imposed or any tariff on wool in reality beneficial to the wool-growers? I answer this question by quoting the conclusion of the report of Mr. Morrison, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in the last Congress, upon a resolution providing for the restoration of the tariff of 1867 upon wool. He says:

In conclusion, your committee submit that the duty upon imported wool is proved, by testimony derived both from argument and experience, to be injurious to all classes and beneficial to none.

It drives from our markets many kinds of wool not raised here, but which are indispensable to a successful manufacture of woolen goods.

It gives to European manufacturers the exclusive use of these wools, and therefore a monopoly of the manufacture of goods made of them, and consequently of the markets of the world.

It confines American manufactures to a restricted choice of materials and so to the production of a limited class of goods, with which the home market is periodically glutted.

It makes it impossible for our manufacturers to export woolen goods, and by confining them to the home market leads to ruinous fluctuations of prices, resulting in frequent closing of the mills and their sale at disastrous sacrifices.

It cripples the only customers of our wool-growers so seriously that the market for wool is periodically in an unhealthy condition.

It prevents the home manufacturers from buying the foreign wools which could be used in mixture with American wools, and thus lessens the demand for American wools, instead of increasing it, as intended.

It has given the European manufacturer control of all foreign wools; it has thus caused the importation of foreign wool to come in the manufactured form; and the more the duty has been raised, the more disastrous have been the results to the American wool-grower.

It has furnished a good excuse for heaping heavy taxes upon the clothing of the people, and it has thus taxed every wool-grower to an amount far exceeding the whole benefit which he has ever imagined that he would derive from the tariff, without giving him that imaginary benefit.

It has reduced the wages of workmen in the woolen manufacture; it has ruined numerous investors, who were enticed into this manufacture by the delusive promises of a high tariff; it has greatly hindered our trade with our natural customers in South America; it has made clothing dearer in America and cheaper in Europe; it has injured all classes and helped none.

Your committee therefore recommend that the resolutions lie on the table, but that the prayer of the convention of textile workers in Philadelphia should be granted, that the duties on wool should be repealed, and the duties on woolen manufactures reduced to at least an equal extent.

If the logic of these statements be unsound, and if the facts do not warrant the conclusions reached, then the only reason for insisting upon a tariff on wool is that it is of benefit to a particular class, and comes to the aid of those engaged in a particular business, and the wool man is placed in the position of asking that the great body of the people be taxed in his behalf. He must say the tariff will bring him higher prices and a better paying business, and that he wants tribute extracted at the expense of his fellow-man to sustain his private enterprise. If the tariff give him personal bounty at public expense, it is unjust, unwarranted by constitutional authority, and at war with the essential principles of republican institutions; and he has no right to demand or expect it; if it does not have this effect, he can invent no reason for its imposition.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard much during this discussion of pauper labor in Europe, Cobden clubs, and free-trade England. I deem it not inappropriate to invite brief attention to two of England's greatest men, and what they have said of American institutions and American policy. It seems to me that some useful instruction may be derived from their respective declarations. John Bright, one of the best and purest of English statesmen, in reply to a letter from the editor of the North American Review, asking whether England would return to protection, after making some historical statements as to English policy in the past and giving his opinion as to its future course, said:

It is a grief to me that your people do not yet see their way to a more moderate tariff.

Not to free trade, but a more moderate tariff. Do not the conditions which surround us demand a more moderate tariff? Who can successfully gainsay the proposition?

They are doing wonders, unequaled in the world's history, in paying off your national debt.

That is true, and greater wonders in this respect have been since accomplished.

A more moderate tariff I should think would give you a better revenue, and by degrees you might approach a more civilized system. What can be more strange than for your great free country to build barriers against that commerce which is everywhere the handmaid of freedom and of civilization?

I should despair of the prospects of mankind if I did not believe that before long the intelligence of your people would revolt against the barbarism of your tariff. It seems now your one great humiliation; the world looks to you for example in all forms of freedom. As to commerce, the great civilizer, shall it look in vain?

This letter was written on the 25th day of April, 1879. These are the words that came from the author of the repeal of the Corn Laws; from that grand man who devoted his magnificent energies to opening up a foreign market for American breadstuffs and the products of American farmers. To the ears of some they may sound "quite English, you know," but I firmly believe they involve a just criticism and express the living truth. Shall we respond to the suggestions for a "moderate tariff," or shall we in this day and generation continue in force the grievous exactions levied for purposes of war? Shall we not answer his question, unmoor our commerce, and send it forth to the utterm[illegible] parts of the earth with the joyous speeding—

Beat it on, thou restless ocean;
Let thy winds its canvas swell!
Heaves our heart with proud emotion,
As it goes far hence to dwell!

[Applause.]

Under the "moderate tariff" of 1846 to 1861, in the halcyon days of the Republic, long before this letter was written, our country had prospered in an extraordinary degree; there was steady and substantial progress in all the elements of national growth and greatness. Is it any wonder that our people, having experienced the beneficence of this "moderate tariff" in years gone by, and which, but for the war, would in every human probability have remained undisturbed, should now, when peace has resumed her wonted sway, "revolt" against the harshness and severity of that system, unexcused and inexcusable only as a temporary measure, and solely instituted for purposes of war? The revolt has come, and it is here to stay until all the just cause of complaint shall be fully and finally removed.

I have given you one English view of our situation since the war, and dating back less than a decade.

I desire now to invite your attention to another perhaps less inviting English opinion of American institutions as entertained by an equally eminent man. It is full of admonition and worthy of the most careful consideration at the hands of every thoughtful and patriotic citizen of this country. I believe that I do a public service by recalling it to your notice. On May 23, 1857, Lord Macaulay wrote a letter to Henry S. Randall, the author of The Life of Thomas Jefferson. It is not found in The Life and Letters of Macaulay, and hence may have escaped that general observation it would have otherwise received. From it I quote the following:

I am certain that I never * * * uttered a word indicating an opinion that the supreme authority in a State ought to be intrusted to the majority of citizens told by the head; in other words, to the poorest and most ignorant part of society. I have long been convinced that institutions purely democratic must sooner or later destroy liberty, or civilization, or both.

In Europe, where the population is dense, the effect of such institutions would be almost instantaneous. What happened lately in France is an example. In 1848 a pure democracy was established there. During a short time there was reason to expect a general spoliation, a national bankruptcy, a new partition of the soil, a maximum of prices, a ruinous load of taxation laid on the rich for the purpose of supporting the poor in idleness. Such a system would in twenty years have made France as poor and barbarous as the France of the Carlavingians.

Happily the danger was averted; and now there is a despotism, a silent tribune, and enslaved press. Liberty is gone; but civilization has been saved. I have not the smallest doubt that if we had a purely democratic government here the effect would be the same. Either the poor would plunder the rich and civilization would perish, or order and property would be saved by a strong military government and liberty would perish. You may think that your country enjoys an exemption from these evils. I will frankly own to you that I am of a different opinion. Your fate I believe to be certain, though it is deferred by a physical cause. As long as you have a boundless extent of fertile and unoccupied land your laboring population will be far more at ease than the laboring population of the Old World, and while this is the case, the Jeffersonian polity may continue to exist without causing any fatal calamity.

But the time will come when New England will be as thickly peopled as Old England. Wages will be as low and will fluctuate as much with you as with us. You will have your Manchesters and Birminghams, and in those Manchesters and Birminghams hundreds of thousands of artisans will assuredly be sometimes out of work. Then your institutions will be fairly brought to the test. Distress everywhere makes the laborer mutinous and discontented, and inclines him to listen with eagerness to agitators, who tell him that it is a monstrous iniquity that one man should have a million while another can not get a full meal.

In bad years there is plenty of grumbling here, and sometimes a little rioting. But it matters little. For here the sufferers are not the rulers. The supreme power is in the hands of a class, numerous indeed, but select; of an educated class, of a class which is, and knows itself to be, deeply interested in the security of property and the maintenance of order. Accordingly, the malcontents are firmly yet gently restrained. The bad time is got over without robbing the wealthy to relieve the indigent. The springs of national prosperity soon begin to flow again; work is plentiful, wages rise, and all is tranquility and cheerfulness. I have seen England pass three or four times through such critical seasons as I have described. Through such seasons the United States will have to pass, in the course of the next century, if not in this. How will you pass through them? I heartily wish you a good deliverance. But my reason and my wishes are at war, and I can not help foreboding the worst. It is quite plain that your Government will never be able to restrain a distressed and discontented majority. For with you the majority is the Government, and has the rich, who are always a minority, absolutely at its mercy.

The day will come when in the State of New York a multitude of people, none of whom has had more than half a breakfast, or expects to have more than half a dinner, will choose a legislature. Is it possible to doubt what sort of legislature will be chosen? On one side is a statesman preaching patience, respect for vested rights, strict observance of public faith. On the other is a demagogue ranting about the tyrany of capitalists and usurers, and asking why anybody should be permitted to drink champagne and ride in a carriage while thousands of honest folk are in want of necessaries. Which of the two candidates is likely to be preferred by a workingman who hears his children cry for more bread? I seriously apprehend that you will, in some such season of adversity as I have described, do things which will prevent prosperity from returning; that you will act like a people who should in a year of scarcity devour all the seed-corn, and thus make the next year a year not of scarcity, but of absolute famine. There will be, I fear, spoliation. The spoliation will increase the distress. The distress will produce fresh spoliation.

There is nothing to stop you. Your Constitution is all sail and no anchor. As I said before, when a society has entered on this downward progress, either civilization or liberty must perish. Either some Cæsar or Napoleon will seize the reins of government with a strong hand, or your Republic will be as fearfully plundered and laid waste by barbarians in the twentieth century as the Roman Empire was in the fifth, with this difference, that the Huns and Vandals who ravaged the Roman Empire came from without, and that your Huns and Vandals will have been engendered within your own country by your own institutions. * * *

Did the "sunset of life give him mystical lore?" Have these gloomy forebodings, these dark and pessimistic predictions been in any measure fulfilled? Have our boasted high wages to the laborer brought him content? Have our Manchesters and Birminghams been moved by love and consideration of their employés or instigated by their own greed?

Let strikes and lockouts and riots answer. Let "pools" and "trusts" and combinations reflect.

In England the supreme power is in the hands of a class. The sufferers are not the rulers.

Majorities do not rule.

Mr. Chairman, far be it from me to widen the breach between the rich and poor, or play the rôle of the ranting demagogue described by Macaulay. I would not have the poor to despise the rich nor the rich to oppress the poor. I hate the spirit of envy and contemn the methods of the mere agitator who seeks to stir up strife among a people of the same country, bound by the same laws, and among whom sentiments or sympathy and community of feeling should be encouraged. The avenues of wealth should be open to all; but no man or set of men has the right in this country to be legislated into wealth. I firmly believe that class legislation has had the inevitable effect of building up monopolies, resulting in colossal fortunes and concentrating in the hands of a few of our citizens a rulership as antagonistic to the genius of our institutions as would be that of crowned heads.

The logical tendency of high tariffs is, to use the trite and familiar statement, to make the rich richer and the poor poorer, thereby intensifying the discontent of the people. A continuation of such a system of legislation may hasten on the conditions which may still further sustain the apprehensions and prophecies of Macaulay.

Here all our citizens, unrestrained by accident of birth and unfettered by caste, participate in the exercise of political power, and I believe that through their virtue and intelligence our institutions can be made to withstand every test and overcome every shock they may receive, and the government of the people, by the people, and for the people preserved. May the day never come when it shall pass from the earth. Fortunately our death-strifes are over and our war-dissevered sections are reunited, and I trust we are fully prepared to combine our hearts and hands in the grand movement for greater and more glorious national attainments.

Mr. Chairman, I listened with unusual interest to the splendid peroration of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] a few days ago, wherein he spoke of the South. It was graceful in diction, beautiful in imagery, and elegant in delivery. I thank him for his intended compliment to that section of the country from whence I hail; but, sir, I do not agree with him when he says that "this measure bodes no good to the South." On the contrary, I think it comes to her as a "glory-beaming star" from the dark clouds of misrule and class legislation; it gives her joyful assurance of the dawn of a better day. It tells her of a grander development and greater industrial freedom. It sets before "her uplifted brow" the rainbow of commercial promise, "with its wing on the earth and its wing on the sea." It speaks to her of a new and happier era in which the strings of her harp, long silent, shall be attuned to the music of progress and prosperity. It tells her the raw materials which lie at her feet in rich profusion will invite and welcome the idle and dormant capital which seeks investment; it tells her that the mighty possibilities she possesses shall have ample opportunities for culture and expansion; it assures her of equal privileges and a fair show in every aspiration; it tells her the distinctions and partialities in the blessings of Judah and Issachar shall be leveled, and that no longer shall her sons crouch between burdens, bow their shoulders to bear, and become servants unto tribute.

Improve and pass this great measure of reform, expunge from the statute-books the barbarism of war taxation, reduce the burdens of the Government to a peace basis, take no more money from the people than is absolutely required for economic public use, stay the hand of monopoly, insure equal and exact justice to all and exclusive privileges to none, and then indeed, will the South be rehabilitated and her people inspired with a loftier patriotism, a purer devotion to this glorious Union, and a stronger affection for her brethren of the North. Join with her in the declaration that the war is over and its temporary exactions no longer required, that good-will and national fellowship shall prevail, and all her sons will shout for joy:

Alleluiah! Peace omnipotent reigneth!

[Great applause.]

At the conclusion of the remarks of Mr. LANHAM the following dialogue occurred:

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I believe the gentleman from Texas has not fully occupied his time, and I desire to ask him a favor in the shape of a question. Will the gentleman allow me to do so?

Mr. LANHAM. I will hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I am not certain but what I shall desire to circulate the gentleman's speech in my district.

Mr. LANHAM. Allow me to say that I shall be glad to present the gentleman with as many copies as he may desire.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I shall pay for the copies which I may circulate. That will make them more valued. But I ask the gentleman if he will be so kind as to insert in his speech, after what the Englishman, John Bright, said, the resolutions that have been passed by one or more gatherings of Texan Americans since the agitation of this bill commenced, so that we may know what Americans in Texas think as against what John Bright, of England, thinks.

Mr. LANHAM. In the revision of my speech I will endeavor to give due reflection to the gentleman's suggestion. Doubtless I have already referred to what the gentleman alludes to.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Unless that is done I will decline to circulate the document.

Mr. LANHAM. I am much obliged to the gentleman, but I do not desire that he shall make my speech for me or select for me matter in addition to what I have submitted. Have I any time left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seven minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. LANHAM. I reserve that time.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I suppose if Massachusetts was to divide to-day upon the question of protection or free trade the number of people in favor of protection would outnumber its opponents by a vast majority not easily computed in figures, and I am sure in my own Congressional district such a division would result in a majority of more than 10,000 in favor of the champion of the protective side of the argument, and I dare say that even such an estimate would fall below the actual figures. So far as I am personally concerned, therefore, having been born among a people devoted to the principle of protection, I do not feel it at all necessary to define my position upon that question, and I am therefore averse to occupying the time of this House in traveling along the well-beaten thoroughfare of general tariff discussion. Much has been well said upon that subject, and more will be submitted in the line of general discussion, but there are several byways still to be explored, not in the way of any new discoveries but simply in developing certain well-understood principles which every one must admit, but which have not perhaps been as fully analyzed as to make their simple logic clearly brought out in support of the general theory, just as we all come to realize the absolute truth of certain physical laws, the existence of which we all understand and firmly believe, but which are so commonplace in our daily experience that we have never taken the particular time to examine into them and make the simple application.

We live in an age of great physical and mental activity. Wonderful inventions of mind and matter are crowding each other so fast that in the hurried race we hardly see whence they come or where they lead. Theories and isms of all sorts seize upon the people and rush them into great extremes, disorganizing and disarranging old-established rules, and leading us into a way of discarding what is old and tried for experiment and theory. Just now the medical profession finds itself antagonized by a new and strange psychical force, which, overturning facts and argument, seems to have worked its way into the imagination of the people, that all disease is a pure fancy of the imagination; that one is never sick—we sometimes think we are—but the evidence of the sickness is but the warning of a violation of the divine will and the setting up of our own finite will against the infinite; that if we could only follow closely enough to the way marked out by infinite wisdom we should all preserve the perfect body and entire immunity from disease and dissolution; that if it were possible for man to follow out with unvarying exactness the divine guidance there is no reason why we should not live forever, and our span of life is but to be measured by the closeness with which we guide our existence to the divine standard. Such, in a word, is the theory of the Christian scientist of the day, whose strange fancy has pervaded the homes of the people, has found a place among the musty folios of the literary man, has disturbed the professional man in his studies, and by the very force of its inertia seems to have passed within the closed doors of the Committee on Ways and Means and dominated the deliberations of that great committee. So that it may be truthfully said, if no other credit is to be given, that these learned gentlemen have evolved a new school of Christian-science political economy. Is not the analogy complete?

To them facts have seemed entirely unimportant. No diagnosis required, no expert knowledge of symptoms; simply the existence of a diseased condition of the mind. Has not the chairman of the committee repeatedly demanded of the country only a hopeful state of mind and all will be well?

Only recently in his speeches at Providence and elsewhere he assures the wool-grower that with free wool the increased consumption will be so great that better prices will surely come to them, while to the wool manufacturer he turns with the cheering assurance that under this bill he will pay so much less for his wool that in spite of all other circumstances prosperity will be thrust upon him. Thus it is that again we find the Administration ever in advance, and with a progression which is certainly remarkable, applying the soothing balm of the "faith cure" to the inflamed and feverish condition of our trade and national commerce.

But this "Mills bill" is in other respects a most remarkable document. Regarded simply as a device for reducing revenue, without acknowledging the principle of protection, this bill is entirely inadequate. It should go much farther, for under the most liberal construction of its most ardent admirers too small an amount will be saved to the country to give it credit as a revenue bill. Yet it is quite susceptible of proof that it would not only not reduce the revenue, but under its operation, should it become a law, it would increase the revenues by more than $11,000,000 over the present receipts, so that as a bill to reduce the revenue it is an utter and complete failure.

But if it be said, on the other hand, that its purpose is to recognize some protection to certain industrial enterprises which have grown up under protection, then the fault of this bill is that its framers—who in the nature of things could have no expert knowledge whatever of the industries affected—have persistently refused to take the testimony of interests involved, where such testimony has been offered, but with a persistency, unique in such matters, have seemed to seek the advice of those who from their prejudices or the nature of their business are entirely opposed to the application of the protective principle to any of our industries so far as they are able.

Let me illustrate this point. Suppose you write to me for the best formula for making the most palatable and nutritious bread? If I really desired to give you the best information I could secure, which would be really of advantage to you, I should not apply to a person who had some patent device by which he was able to substitute for the true ingredient of that article a certain compound which would apparently answer the purpose. Not at all. I should first apply to my cook, if I had a good one, for information, and then I would supplement that evidence by inquiring of the cook of my neighbor, if he had one with a bread-making record, and if their two stories corresponded I should be willing to submit that consolidated information for your benefit, with a firm belief that I was giving you what you wanted; or, better still, if there was a national association of cooks, and that association had met in convention and had carefully considered the bread question, and had expressed their opinion as the best wisdom they had on that subject, then I would cheerfully give you that information, with the firm conviction that you were getting the best possible expert opinion on the subject of bread-making, which, if carefully followed, would insure you peace in your domestic circle and good digestion.

Precisely in this way this committee might have worked. For there is hardly a protected industry in this land which is not able in some way to present the testimony of experts upon the exact condition and needs of such industry, and all such information would be entirely reliable and trustworthy, for I am sure no one is willing to say that the name of Barabas is written upon the foreheads of the manufacturers of this country.

Having failed then to take expert testimony upon these great questions, the majority of this committee have utterly failed to encourage the slightest support in favor of the theory that this bill has for its purpose the encouragement of our vested enterprise, built up upon the principle of protection. But more than all this, when the majority of this committee have thus obviously failed in their duty in this respect and have insisted upon reporting to this House a bill clearly the result of their application of the "faith cure" principle to industrial enterprises, and have sat with closed doors refusing to recognize the authority of this House in its purpose of forming committees that they should sit as a court in judgment of all cases coming before them, and after patient and exhaustive hearings of all evidence submitted, upon that evidence, in the light of its bearing upon the "general welfare" of the country, shall make up their judgment upon the preponderance of evidence submitted.

When such a committee have reported to the House a measure upon which they have not taken expert evidence, and have placed that measure before the House, where of course such expert evidence can not properly make itself heard, except in way of amendment or substitution, then such a committee has utterly failed in its duty to this House, to the people, and to the industries assailed, and such a bill ought in perfect fairness to be recommitted to that committee with instructions to take advantage of such avenues of expert information, so close at hand and available. If this committee have taken such evidence, and if this bill is a deliberate judgment based upon such evidence, then perhaps this charge can not lie against it; but if the charge is not proved to be absolutely unfounded, then I dare say the propriety of such action by the House will not be disputed.

But I wish to leave this particular bill for the present, and in a temperate manner, without rhetoric, to undertake in a hasty way the development of a fact which I think must be patent to all—that a protective tariff, so adjusted as to meet the wants of the people, is a most powerful stimulant to the intelligence of mankind, and indirectly aids to the comfort, the happiness, and the prosperity of man, not alone in this country, but throughout the entire breadth of the civilized world.

If, while watching a balloon ascension in the presence of some person who was unfamiliar with physical theories, one should say to him that the force of gravity compelled all material objects, of whatever kind, to fall toward the center of the earth, one would expect him to say in reply: "But all things do not fall to the earth. I have just seen that balloon shooting up into the sky; and the rising smoke from every chimney in the world contradicts your theory. The law of gravitation must be made very plain to me before I can be induced to go contrary to the evidence of my own senses."

This person's position is a fair illustration of the attitude of the free-traders toward the theory of protection as applied in and for this country. They insist that the tariff is a tax upon the whole people for the benefit of a favored class, and that a tariff upon any article enhances the cost of that article to the consumer by exactly the amount of the tax.

Let me quote from the message of the President upon that point:

But our present tariff laws, the vicious, inequitable, and illogical source of unnecessary taxation, ought to be at once revised and amended. These laws, as their primary and plain effect, raise the price to consumers of all articles imported and subject to duty, by precisely the sum paid for such duties. Thus the amount of the duty measures the tax paid by those who purchase for use these imported articles. Many of these things, however, are raised or manufactured in our own country, and the duties now levied upon foreign goods and products are called protection to these home manufactures, because they render it possible for those of our own people who are manufacturers to make these taxed articles and sell them for a price equal to that demanded for the imported goods that have paid customs duty.

So it happens that while comparatively a few use the imported articles, millions of our people, who never used and never saw any of the foreign products, purchase and use things of the same kind made in this country, and pay therefor nearly or quite the same enhanced price which the duty adds to the imported articles. Those who buy imports pay the duty charged thereon into the public Treasury, but the great majority of our citizens, who buy domestic articles of the same class, pay a sum at least approximately equal to this duty to the home manufacturer. This reference to the operation of our tariff laws is not made by way of instruction, but in order that we may be constantly reminded of the manner in which they impose a burden upon those who consume domestic products as well as those who consume imported articles, and thus create a tax upon all our people.

The protectionist insists that a protective tariff is not laid, and could not be laid for the benefit of a class, but rather for the general welfare of the country, and that the inevitable result of a protective tariff has been to eventually bring down the cost of the article taxed to a figure which is lower than that article sold for before a duty was laid upon it, and the result of such competition has been abundantly shown, not alone in this country, but in Great Britain, and upon the Continent even, in the improved quality of the clothing of the people, the excellence in design, and the general additions of comforts and even luxuries, comparatively unknown before the imposition of the tariff of 1861.

Let me mention, right in this connection, one or two striking illustrations upon this point, not, of course, in the way of presenting anything new, but simply in the way of driving in a little deeper the nail already started. During the last nine years of the famous Walker "revenue-reform" tariff, and previous to 1861, the average production of the useful commodity of pig-iron was but 798,488 tons, and during that period the output was about the same, at all events it showed no increase. But in 1863, as soon as the industry had begun to feel the stimulating effect of the tariff of 1861, then the production began to increase in a most astonishing ratio, while the prices decreased, until, during the year 1863, the output increased to 947,604 tons, and in 1886 the industry had become so well settled, the workmen so skillful, and the plant in such good condition, that what was less than 800,000 tons as the annual production in 1861 had increased to more than 6,000,000 tons, and during this period the price had steadily decreased, so that the country was receiving the benefit of this enormous production, and at much less money per pound.

Who can estimate the advantage to the country at large in increased comfort, in the development of industrial skill, in inventive genius which came to the people in the sections of country immediately affected? Why, under the "revenue-reform" tariff it was impossible to successfully establish the industry of making steel in this country. Time and time again the experiment was attempted. Experts were brought here from abroad, the most skilled labor employed, with the invariable result that foreign competition could come in, and did come in, and force the courageous experimenters into bankruptcy, and thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars were swept away, like the early mists, in the vain endeavor to establish a new industry upon our shores in competition with outside manufactures.

But when the tariff of 1861 came, opportunities once more arose, and the growing demands of our country, as the most promising and hopeful market of the whole world, stimulated internal industries as they had external. The market was not yielded by the outsider without a struggle, but under the tariff just alluded to we did succeed, and not only saved our own market practically for ourselves, but by the spirit of competition thus aroused, in a way to which I shall allude further on, we succeeded in reducing prices in a most unheard of degree and to a most remarkable extent.

In 1868 we made in this country of all kinds of steel 30,000 tons; in 1878, 819,814 tons; in 1886, 2,870,003 tons; while during that period we have reduced the price of steel rails in America, which was $158 per ton in 1868 to $26 per ton in 1886, while the price in England, by means of this protective tariff of ours, was reduced from $61.50 in 1868 to $18 in 1886, though it must be said in fairness, however, that this reduction is not wholly due to the influence of competition under the tariff of 1861, since, during that period, the royalties on Bessemer steel ran out. But the decline without that is ample to point the moral. So that I am confident that whenever you make the application of this general rule with reference to any of our industries you will find the same result—an enormous lowering of prices, increased competition, better goods, and a round advantage in a thousand ways to the people at large.

Particularly is this so with reference to any commodity the manufacture of which was not attempted in this country prior to 1861, and which was really created by the tariff of 1861. I have at this moment in mind the carpet industry in its finer grades, almost entirely developed in this country within twenty-five years. The statistics of the carpet industry are not as complete as in many other industries, yet we have no difficulty in noting the great development since 1871, when many of the patents expired. Previous to that time the number of looms on Brussels and Wilton carpets did not exceed one hundred looms (power) and the market was controlled by English makers who regulated the prices. To-day there are 1,225 looms running on Brussels and Wilton and the importation of carpets has almost ceased; the import last year being 190,118 yards Brussels. Body Brussels sold within the recollection of all before me but a few years ago in crude colors and wretched designs for $2.75 to $3.50 per yard, while to-day you can buy the best Brussels from the finest looms, with the most delicate colors, the most original and charming designs, for $1.25 per yard at retail; while for those who do not buy Brussels, but prefer the tasty ingrains, there has been the same advantage, and they buy to-day at 75 cents per yard what they paid $1.35 to $1.50 for but a few years ago.

I quote the wholesale prices in the New York market:

NEW YORK, March 17, 1888.

New York wholesale carpetings during the years—	1871.	1880.	1888.
Crossley's tapestry	1.45	1.08	.75
Five-frame Crossley's brussels	2.30	1.67	1.22½
Five-frame Bigelow brussels	2.15	1.50	1.07½–1.10
Smith's tapestry	.....	.97½	.67½
Lowell ingrain	1.30	.90	.57½

Thus it is domestic competition has cut down prices to the lowest margin of profit. Let me show you how naturally this all comes about through perfectly simple methods. Suppose a man wishes to start the manufacture of some commodity not hitherto made in this country, say woolen cloth? He borrows money with which to build his mill, to supply it with the requisite machinery, and to carry on his business until he begins to get returns from his sales.

Suppose he produces 100,000 yards of cloth in a year, that being, we may say, as large a product as might be safely attempted by any one until his operatives and himself had acquired a sufficient technical experience, and that it cost him $1 a yard, and that he sells it at $1.10 per yard? His profit will be 10 cents a yard, or $10,000. In figuring his cost of production two classes of expenses appear:

First. Those which depend directly upon the amount of work produced, such as the cost of wool, of labor, of coal, etc.

Second. Those expenses which remain are very nearly fixed in amount, no matter what the amount of his product may be. These fixed expenses would consist of the interest upon his capital and such items of general expense of management, taxes, insurance, etc. Suppose that his fixed expenses have been 10 per cent. of the total cost of production, or 10 cents for each yard of cloth produced? If, now, at the end of the year his operatives have become skilled and his business is so well established that he may venture to increase his product, he takes steps with that end in view. He finds that by crowding his machinery together he can make room for some more, and by increasing their speed and making use perhaps of recent inventions he can produce just twice as many yards of cloth as he formerly made in the same mill. Practically he is under no greater charge in respect of the fixed expenses now, that he is making 200,000 yards a year, than he was formerly, when he could make but half that quantity; and as the cost of this item was formerly 10 cents a yard, now that he produces twice as many yards for the same sum total, the cost of fixed expenses is but 5 cents a yard.

The cost of his fabric will now be 95 cents a yard. If he can still sell at $1.10 he will be making 15 cents a yard profit, instead of 10 cents a yard as formerly; and observe that he not only has an increased profit, per yard, but he has twice as many yards to sell, so that by doubling his production he has raised his profits from $10,000 to $30,000. What will be his position now with regard to a competitor who is just entering the field? We have seen that a product of 100,000 yards is all that this latter can venture upon at the start, and that therefore his cloth will cost him $1 a yard to make, whereas our larger manufacturer is making 200,000 yards at a cost of 95 cents a yard. The latter can now sell his entire product at the cost price of his smaller rival and still make his original profit of $10,000; or better yet, if he can sell 100,000 yards at $1.10 he may offer the other 100,000 yards to the customers of his rival at 90 cents a yard, or 10 cents below the cost price of the latter, and still make his profit of $10,000. Or if he desires to ruin his competitor, he can sell the other 100,000 yards at 80 cents per yard, and still without a loss on his year's business. In the latter case the small man would find that whereas every yard of cloth he made cost him $1 a yard, he could only sell it for 80 cents per yard.

Now, then, coming back to the question, "How can putting a tax on an article lower its cost to us?" let us suppose that in 1861 we imported from England, say, all the woolen cloth which we used, and at that date there was no mill in this country which produced woolen cloth, because for various reasons it could not be manufactured so cheaply here as in England. In 1861 a tariff is passed which lays a tax on all woolen cloth coming to this country, and the price of these cloths is for a time, enhanced by exactly the amount of the tax. At the increased price which the cloth is now sold for, an American, whom we will designate as A, thinks he can manufacture it and sell it at a profit. Naturally his early attempts are made upon the cheapest and coarsest varieties, because they offer fewer obstacles to his unskillful laborers.

He succeeds in producing an article which is crude and cheap, but he is able to sell it at a price just a little below the cost of a similar imported article, with the tax added, and he makes a profit. Meantime another ambitious American, B, has been attempting to produce the same cloth. He offers his production to the same purchasers who have bought from A. They inspect his cloth, and they tell him they have bought as good cloth and as cheaply elsewhere, and there is no object in changing. B has now the alternative of making a better cloth to sell at the same price A is receiving, or of making his price lower than A's. B shrinks from the attempt of making a better cloth, and prefers to sacrifice some of his profits. He lowers his price, therefore, and undersells A.

But by this time other enterprising Americans have been watching this business development, and, attracted by the profitable industry A and B have succeeded in establishing, at once enter into the manufacture of the same class of goods, and presently the shops are flooded with cheap cloths, made by all these competitors; and since there are now more of these cloths offered than are needed at the price, these makers are obliged to lower their prices considerably. They accordingly reduce prices to the lowest possible margin, and they continue to sell their wares.

The original maker, A, by this time finds that whereas a short time previously he could command a price for his cheap cloth which was equal to the English price with the tax added, now he is compelled by the competition of B and others to sell it at a price very much lower than that; so low, in fact, as to make his venture hardly a profitable one. But by this time his operatives have become more skillful, and he decides to attempt the manufacture of a higher grade of cloth, which so far has not been made here, and upon which the tax offers him a new and profitable field. He thus again escapes competition for awhile, but not for long; the energetic manufacturers have also become skillful, and they follow wherever A leads, so that the old story of reduction in price by competition to the lowest possible terms is repeated over and over.

In the mean time B has been studying the lesson of greater production. He increases the capacity of his factory again and again. He is on the alert for every labor-saving device. Some of these are invented by his own employés, perhaps, who have become alive to the needs of the occasion.

B remains a manufacturer of cheap cloth, but his mills are on a scale which is hardly to be found elsewhere in the world, and his needs form the great incentive to that branch of invention which has, during the last twenty-five years, so increased the producing power of all machinery. He has thus been of immeasurable service to his countrymen in a twofold manner, by reducing the cost of the cloths he has made, but more than that, in inspiring the inventive genius of all about him, who, catching the spirit of his work, have found themselves pressing forward to the greatest possible success in every direction of industrial activity.

It is in this manner that every field of possible industry has been explored by American manufacturers since the tariff of 1861 was passed, and no new field has been enjoyed by any one alone for more than a brief season. A reduction of prices has been effected which can only be measured by the keen enterprise of the American character; but the tariff has had a twofold effect in lowering the price of any taxed article which has been manufactured in this country. While we have been watching the course of the American manufacturer, what has been happening to his foreign competitor? He has not been idle, we may be sure. Up to the tariff of 1861 we have supposed that he held all the trade of this country in woolen cloths. His market is removed by more than 3,000 miles from his workshop, and such competition as he has from other European manufacturers is remote and not very active. We are obliged to buy of him, for we can go nowhere else.

He is rich, and his operators are skillful. He can manufacture cheaply, and he sells almost at his own price. By virtue of his size and skill he can defeat all attempts at competition in this country, and he is not obliged to make his cloths very tasteful or attractive, as any one who can remember our woolen fabrics of twenty-five years ago will testify. Our tariff comes, and he soon discovers that he has competition here upon the cheaper of his fabrics. He lowers his prices (observe the first effect of the tariff), and we have seen that he can afford to lower them a great deal, so low indeed that if it were not for the tariff no American enterprise could stand against him; but he only lowers them upon the cheap cloths, for as yet there is no occasion to change them upon his better fabrics. Later on, when our manufacturer, A, begins to make the higher grades, he lowers his prices on them also.

But this does not avail him, for, thanks to protection, though he may push them hard, he can not undersell them to their ruin. He, too, resorts to increased production and improved machinery, hoping that in that way he may still export at least the surplus of his increased output, which, as we know, he can afford to sell relatively low.

It is in vain, for his American competitors have now acquired considerable skill; they understand the advantage of great production better than he, and their own internal competition has already so lowered prices that it is almost hopeless for him, handicapped with the tariff tax on his cloths, to attempt to place them in competition with those of American makes.

He is driven, therefore, to improve the quality of his cloth and to devise new and tasteful combinations, for his only hope for American trade now being to offer to it a fabric which the American manufacturers (lacking in technical experience) have not ventured to attempt. This he is doing to-day. Constantly inventing new goods and fanciful designs, sending them to this country at large prices, turning a part of his looms to such manufacture for sale in this country to our wealthy people, at a fancy price, while this increased value to him upon this American output enables him to run his regular styles for his home trade and to undersell his home competitors and still have his entire business yield him a profit.

Every season the "novelties" sent by foreign manufacturers are sold at wholesale in this country at prices perhaps ruling at $1 per yard, which our manufacturers would gladly produce at 37 cents; but because they are "novelties" and are fashionable, our wealthy people will buy them, and before our manufacturers can commence the manufacture the season is over, and new "novelties" in dress goods take their place. Such "novelties," as a rule, are not serviceable, and are largely bought by people who can afford to pay larger prices to be in fashion. Thus, for the sake of clearness, and to make my argument consistent, I have spoken entirely of woolen goods in the illustration of the great benefit of the tariff, in stimulating the ambition of our people, and of lowering prices both in this country and elsewhere; but it will be apparent that the illustration applies to every article the manufacture of which has obtained a foothold in this country. So bright a man as Mr. Watterson, it is to be expected, should notice this wonderful lowering of prices, for in his recent article in the Atlantic Monthly he says:

> It is assuredly true that in the last twenty-five years there has been a decline in prices. There have been causes operating universally which have lowered to a remarkable degree the price of most manufactured articles.

And again:

> Perhaps the most striking fact of recent industrial history is the improvement in the manufacture of steel rails, by which the price in England has fallen from $61.50 in 1868 to $18 in 1886. In the same time the price in America, which was $158 in depreciated currency, declined to $26 in 1886. It is customary for the protectionists to point to this steel-rail industry as convincing proof of the value of the tariff in decreasing prices, but as the price has fallen in England far below the American level, the cause can not be local. It must be general; it must be due to an influence that works effectively elsewhere as here. This influence is the inventive genius of the age.

I have pointed out what this influence has been, how stimulated, and how its power has been exercised. In the case of steel rails especially, for which America is the largest market in the world, it will readily be seen that both American and English manufacturers would use every device of vast production and improved methods to effect and maintain their sales. The inevitable result of such herculean efforts throughout twenty years is told in the figures quoted by Mr. Watterson. It will be seen that our tariff has had a profound influence upon the industrial situation of the world at large. It gave birth to the keen and potent element of American competition with which European industries found themselves confronted in the American market—a market which was of the highest importance to them, even in 1861, but which has grown enormously in purchasing power since that date, and toward which to-day their eyes are turned with an eager longing.

It has not only brought down prices throughout the world, but it has added improvements in utility, in quality, in variety and taste. And if it has imposed unwonted anxiety upon the foreign manufacturer, at least the foreign consumer may thank it for carrying down their prices simultaneously with our own. I spoke in the beginning of the astonishment of the unbeliever when he was told of the law of gravity and its universal application in the presence of the balloon ascension. We see a little clearer now what the illustration meant. If a law of nature so eternal and absolute in its action as the law of gravity, and which deals with but a single physical property of matter, shows such a seeming contradiction in its manifestation as this of the balloon flight, we may expect to encounter many apparent anomalies, many matters which will require the explanation of an expert, when we come to consider the effects of an economic force such as the protective policy in this country.

For this economic device is in no way akin to a law of nature or an "eternal principle." It is a mere tool of civilization, to be used at the proper time and in the right place, and to be laid aside when its usefulness has passed. It is like a carriage which is invaluable when traveling upon the land, but preposterous as a means of conveyance upon the ocean. It may be serviceable in one country and worse than useless in another, or its use may be wise at one period of a nation's existence and folly at another. It may be safely said to be applicable in those countries which possess natural advantages not fully developed, of climate, of mineral wealth, and of territory, and whose inhabitants are suited by temperament and by intelligence for the pursuit of industrial enterprises. And since it has to do not with such simple elements as the force of gravity, with which we have compared it, but with the daily lives of 60,000,000 people; since it has not only modified our national habits and characteristics, but has also been modified in its action by them, we need not be surprised if its aspects are many and confusing, and if the channels in which it runs are often intricate and obscure, nor that equally able and honest men should hold such directly contradictory opinions upon it, as are daily expressed.

Without doubt the controlling objection in the minds of those who oppose a protective tariff is the belief that they are being taxed for the benefit of the manufacturing classes, and that the cost to them of everything they purchase is enhanced by the amount of the duty which would be levied upon such articles were they imported. These statements are constantly being made by free-traders and are the burden of Mr. Cleveland's tariff message.

The protectionist, on the other hand, asserts that the invariable result of protection has been to lower the price of the protected article, for the reasons already stated. Here we have the free-trader asserting that the balloon goes up, and the protectionist protesting that its eventual fall is inevitable.

Of course it is impossible in a practical way to lay a tax with mathematical exactness. It not unfrequently happens, in practice, that taxes are laid where slight immediate benefit seems to accrue to those who pay the largest share of the tax. A conspicuous instance of this is seen in the postal service of the country, where the people are taxed to sustain post-routes which are not yet self-sustaining. Yet all admit the wisdom of the course pursued, nor do they regard the pioneer who, leaving the comforts and luxuries of civilized life, starts into the unknown country, there to build up cities and add to our habitable territory, as receiving undue benefit from the taxation of the many, though here we may appear to be "taxing the many for the favored few," but which is in fact for the "general welfare" of the United States.

Either the tariff has been conducive to the "general welfare" of this country—or it has been harmless, in which case it deserves no attack—or it has been injurious. And since we have had it in full operation for twenty-five years, those who assert that its protective features are inimical to the general welfare should by this time be able, and should be required to point out definitely just where and when this loss has been sustained. Collective wisdom upon any subject is what gives strength and positiveness, and upon the subject of a protective tariff we have the collective wisdom of work-people who, while interrogated singly upon some subject which concerns their material prosperity, may be vague and hesitating in their replies, yet when they have had time to arrive at a tolerably unanimous judgment, that judgment may be relied upon as the correct decision for them.

By some inscrutable process of reasoning, perhaps not far removed from instinct, they reach the wise conclusion as surely as the herd, caught in the storm, finds the most strategic point of shelter in the field. This, of course, amounts to saying that the wisdom of individuals, however gifted, is not so great as the wisdom of a multitude of individuals.

In the immense influx of working-people to our shores, aggregating in the last year 518,592 souls, we have the testimony of a multitude of individuals from all nations, to the general welfare of our country under a protective tariff. And the objection that these people are attracted by other inducements, such as "republican institutions, free schools, free land, good soil, genial climate," is not a sound one, for all these attractions existed long before the tariff of 1861, and, so far as they could attract, their drawing power was much greater at that time, yet we find that during the twenty years before that tariff but 4,756,398 came to our shores, while from 1866 to 1886, after our tariff had begun to show the fruits of such a policy, immigration increased to the astonishing figures of 8,129,553.

And this naturally leads me to say that after all we are a nation of plain people. We make our greatest advances, witness our best prosperity as we keep closer to the simple, plain teachings of our fathers. As a nation we are toilers, we work for our daily bread, we legislate for ourselves and our country, and we want no interference in legislative matters to turn us from our simple ways.

The protective tariff is for the people. There can be no doubt upon that point in the mind of any one who carefully considers the question in its widest bearings. So far as there is any inequality in the workings of the tariff, they fall most heavily where they should, upon the rich, who can bear them, and it is significant that the enemies of protection are almost always found in the wealthier classes, and almost never among the poor.

If I desired to inflict tables of figures upon you, I could show you conclusively that under this system our working people are better paid and live almost as cheaply as in other countries even as it is, while the immense advantage they derive in their dress, their habits of life, the education of their children, their little homes, their accumulated savings in our banks all over the land, tells a story of richness, happiness, contentment which figures would not begin to express. It is the rich who complain. They are not content with American-made articles, and their luxurious tastes lead them to desire articles for which the total demand in this country is not sufficient to induce their manufacture here. They are forced to make their purchases abroad, or have them made for them; and the prices of all imported articles whose manufacture is not attempted in this country are necessarily enhanced by the amount of the duties. Thus it is that our protective tariff, for obvious reasons, exercises its effective work in lowering prices along the lines of goods in which the poor are more interested than the rich. It is true the rich can live better abroad. The luxuries they crave, the imported cloths for their garments, their fine hats, gloves, shoes, umbrellas; their elegant carriages, their superb harnesses, the thousand and one articles deemed essential to their comfort, must pay a duty if they are brought into this country; but in all things conducive to the comfort and happiness of the plain people, America is indeed the sought-for land.

We may spend our time here attempting to pass labor bills and labor legislation for the benefit of the working people, and so far as we strive for that interest we do well; but we can do more for these people, and therefore more for the general prosperity of our country, by wisely looking into the results of the protective tariff in this country and shaping our action in a line with the result of that investigation, than by all the purely labor legislation we shall be able to accomplish.

When I read the speech of my colleague from Massachusetts, with its wealth of imagery and its exuberance of statement, the temptation was great to make a particular refutation of many of his extravagances, from authentic figures, readily at hand; but as he himself allowed but one night for reflection to pass over his head before coming before the House to correct certain glaring misstatements, I think it may be safely left to his good judgment to thoroughly purge his speech of many other inconsistencies, before this debate is exhausted.

The cotton, the flax, hosiery, and woolen industry in my section of the country are deeply interested in the defeat of this bill, and when the proper times comes I shall hope to be heard upon each of them.

In the mean time, I leave this question for the present, save only calling your attention for one moment to the peaceful contentment of our manufacturing people. When men put their money, their brains, and their ambition at stake, and start out as pioneers in any new industrial development, it is the duty of the Government, under the Constitution, if such development will conduce to the general welfare of the country, to protect and defend them from ruinous competition abroad. This question of a tariff is the one great topic of conversation to-day among the people in all the industrial sections of the country. These men know their own interests, as only experts can, and they are watching the course of their Representatives upon this issue.

I have tried to express the feelings of my own people upon this question, and I should be remiss in my duty to them, if I failed in any degree to do my utmost to preserve for them, and by this I mean for the whole country, the continuance of a policy of legislative protection under which they have prospered, and which, if we can judge anything from past experience, offers such bright promise in the future.

I wish I could take this body of men to the heights opposite the city of Lowell, Mass., where, with one glance of the eye sweeping up and down the stream, would be literally seen miles of cotton mills, perhaps the finest in the world, equipped with the most ingenious labor-saving machinery known to this wonder-working age, and filled from basement to roof with a thinking, throbbing army of intelligent and skillful men and women.

Standing upon this spot in the early evening as the sun goes down, you would see first from one and then another of the thousands of windows the lights flashing out; twinkling and flashing as they are reflected from the bosom of the flowing river, they rival in brilliancy the stars of an October night. Listen, and the bells ring out their peal, the gates fly open, and from them issue thousands of working men and women, well clothed, well fed, well housed, pleasant to look upon, happy and contented, moving quietly to their own homes in many cases—the ideal laboring wage-earners of a New England manufacturing city.

I draw for your imagination no fancy picture, but one to be seen at any time, in hundreds of our manufacturing towns, varying in degree but rarely in quality. These people to-day are watching the result of the deliberation upon this bill, and anxious to know whether, face to face with a true knowledge of their condition and their desires, with the picture of their progress and prosperity in colors which must appeal to the honest sense of justice which prevails in every American, you will in the slightest degree turn from the principle of a policy which has done so much to make this country great and powerful.

Every man looks upon legislative matters more or less prejudiced by his own surroundings and environment. For that reason I come to this question with a deeper interest, perhaps, than to any other measure presented or likely to be presented at this session of Congress.

I see the fortunes of my own people in this measure, and my interest is natural and intense. [Applause.]

Mr. CARUTH. Mr. Chairman, if I properly understand the derivation of the word "tariff," its origin is not such as to commend it to the admiration of man. At Tarifa the Moors levied their duty and collected their customs from those whose ships, driven by adverse winds, were forced, in order to escape destruction at sea, to suffer a robbery on shore.

If, as has been charged, this "bantling" brought forth in secrecy and darkness which has been carried into this House in the arms of the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means, is of unknown parentage, it can be said in its favor that it can not have so base an origin nor be of so foul an extraction as the robber-born idol which our protectionist friends on the other side of the House hug to their breasts and worship with a devotion like that which the sin-cursed Israelites fell down to and adored, the golden calf their hands had made.

This tariff is a most insidious enemy. It works in silence and under cover; and whilst it pretends to be giving us "protection" it is really stealing our substance and destroying our lives. It is not the highwayman who boldly gallops up on the public road and demands "your money or your life," but the sneak-thief who in an unconscious moment filches your purse or the burglar who robs you of your possessions in sleep's unconscious hour. It holds to the false doctrine of Othello—

> He that is robb'd, not wanting what is stolen,
> Let him not know it and he is not robb'd at all.

Under pretense of receiving a benefit the American people are now yielding to its exactions and paying its demands. In buying a hat one does not stop to think that he is buying and paying for not only the cost of making, the reasonable due of the manufacturer and the dealer, but that he is paying besides, as his tribute, his duty, his tariff to the maker of that hat, 54 per cent. of its entire cost.

In arraying himself in his ordinary apparel one does not stop to think that he has not only paid for the material of which it is made, its reasonable market value, for the skill and labor of the tailor who fashioned it, but he has also paid a tribute of 50 per cent. of the cost to the manufacturer for patriotically engaging in the business! When one lays himself down upon his couch at night, to court the company of "tired nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep," in the present comforts of his surroundings he does not let his thoughts dwell upon the fact that he has not only purchased the wool of which the blanket which covers him was made, at a fair price in the open market, that he has not only given to the labor employed in its making its just wage, but he has also paid as a gratuity to the individual, or, more likely, the corporation, who furnished it almost as much as the entire cost of material and production.

In supplying almost all the wants of life, to almost all trades and callings, "the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick-maker," the tariff requires that dues shall be paid. We are told that this mighty freebooter, this pirate who has robbed us on the sea, this thief who has stolen our substance on land, is not our enemy, but the cause of national prosperity, the promoter of our best interests, our truest friend and our stanchest ally.

I do not pretend, Mr. Chairman, to that profound knowledge of the tariff which some of my colleagues on this floor possess; I have not made that the study of my life. I have been employing my brain with legal questions rather than with economic problems. But, sir, there are certain facts, which come to every person of observation, so plain that a wayfaring man can not err therein. They are connected with the subject of this debate, and to their consideration it is my purpose to address myself. I think it does not require a student of political economy to know that a "tariff" is a tax, and when we strip the question of the useless garments of show in which it is clad; when we take off the purple and the fine linen, the silks and the satins; when we strip it of the domino in which it has been masquerading, there is seen the horrid features which we have been taught to tolerate only on the ground of necessity, but which we can never be taught to court or adore.

I said it was a tax, because I had no better word with which to describe it; but I am unjust to the word, and crave its pardon, for a tax is a rate or duty laid by government on the property of an individual, and with that the citizen purchases the sheltering care of the government—the aid of its army in war, the care of its police in peace, for the protection and preservation of the rights of citizenship. But a tariff, such as we now discuss, which raises money that the government does not need and cannot legitimately spend, is not a tax, but a tribute paid by the weak to the strong—to the individual for personal advantage, not to the government for the public good.

That government, Mr. Chairman, is the best government, those laws are the wisest laws, which contribute to the benefit of the most people, which bless the many and not the few. It is in recognition of this fact that those who hold to "protection for protection's sake" cry aloud, whilst with one hand they filch the gold from the purse of the citizen, and with the other blind his eyes to the act. "It is for the public good." It has ever been thus from the foundation of the world. Deceived into security by the false promises of the serpent, man fell, and from then till now—

> Falsehood puts on the face of simple truth
> And masks in the habit of plain honesty
> When she in heart intends most villainy.

If I believed for one moment that it was for the public good, would promote the general welfare to maintain in this country a system of protection in order that manufacturing interests might be fostered, the people employed, labor rewarded, and the general welfare secured, I would not here and now lift my voice in favor of a measure looking to the reduction of a duty and a lessening of the tributes of the tariff. I hold it my duty, in the administration of the trust confided to me, not to be restricted, as a member of the law-making body, simply to that which will benefit the people who constitute the special constituency by whom I am here accredited, but to look to the common good, the general welfare of the whole country; to know no North, no South, no East, or no West, but to regard these only as the component parts of a great country, united under one Government, owing allegiance to one flag, which, thank God, now waves in triumph "over the land of the free and the home of the brave."

I find the people constituting that country in this condition: That of the 17,392,099 persons engaged in all industrial pursuits in the United States, according to the census of 1880, there were employed in mechanical, manufacturing, and mining occupations 3,837,112; in trade and transportation, 1,810,256; in personal and professional callings, 4,174,238; and in agriculture, 7,670,493. When I come to apply the rule laid down that "wise laws are those which confer the greatest good on the greatest number," I find that under the exaction of the present tariff system about four-fifths of the people are paying tribute to about one-fifth; in other words, that under the exactions of this tariff four men are suffering that one may live. When I find one man made happy and prosperous under the existing law, I find that happiness and prosperity purchased at the expense of the misery and destitution of four of his fellow-citizens. I stop and ask myself, "Can this be fair, honest, and right?"

A tax is only justifiable under the plea of necessity. It is an exaction from the citizen enforced by the sovereign power, and the justification is that it is levied to meet the needs of the Government. When that need ceases the tax should cease, unless its continuance shall be shown to be for the purpose of conferring some benefit on the body of the people. What benefit do these taxes, levied originally to maintain an army and a navy, to carry on a war to preserve the integrity of the Union, confer? Why in time of peace should these taxes still be collected and the unneeded excess be buried like the "unused talent?" To this our friends on the other side answer that it is necessary for the protection of the American toiler; that it is to clothe and feed the struggling masses; that it is to maintain the dignity of American labor. If, Mr. Chairman, this were true, I would hesitate long before I would yield my support to the principle embodied in the pending bill. But the plea, Mr. Chairman, comes to us from a suspicious source; it must be investigated. Republicans present it, and their party has never been the friend of the laborer.

The Democratic party has ever won the allegiance of the working classes. It is the people's party. Not much individual wealth has been found within its ranks, and it has ever fought the battles of the people against restrictions and monopolies. It has ever battled for the enlarged liberties of the citizen and contended for the reserved rights of the States and the people. On the contrary the Republican party has ever advanced with stealthy but steady step towards the enlargement of the powers of the Government and the restrictions of the rights of State and citizen, and when the cry comes from the throats of the Republican party that it is urging protection in the interest of the American workmen, that cry is to be heard with caution.

The distinguished gentleman who has the honor to be the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and who opened this discussion, has, I think, demonstrated by indisputable facts and figures the fallacy of the position that the tariff affects the wages of the workingmen. And a leader of the working classes, who gathered around him recently in the city of New York such a number of supporters from the toiling masses, has gone further in the direction of unfettered trade than either the Democratic platform or the chosen representative of the party, the bold and thoughtful President of the United States. That labor leader, Henry George, said:

> The cry of "protection for American labor" comes most vociferously from newspapers that lie under the ban of the printers' unions; from coal and iron lords, who, importing "pauper labor" by wholesale, have bitterly fought every effort of their men to claim anything like decent wages; and from factory owners who claim the right to dictate the votes of men. The whole spirit of protection is against the rights of labor.
> We thus see from theory that protection can not raise wages. That it does not, facts show conclusively. This has been seen in Spain, in France, in Mexico, in England, during protection times, and everywhere that protection has been tried. In countries where the working classes have little or no influence upon government it is never even pretended that protection raises wages. It is only in countries like the United States, where it is necessary to cajole the working classes, that such a preposterous plea is made, and here the failure of protection to raise wages is shown by the most evident facts.
>
> To discover whether protection has or has not benefited the working classes of the United States it is not necessary to array tables of figures which only an expert can verify and examine. The determining facts are notorious. It is a matter of common knowledge that those to whom we have given power to tax the American people "for the protection of American industry," pay their employés as little as they can, and make no scruple of importing the very foreign labor against whose products the tariff is maintained. It is notorious that wages in the protected industries are, if anything, lower than in the unprotected industries, and that though the protected industries do not employ more than a twentieth of the working population of the United States there occur in them more strikes, more lockouts, more attempts to reduce wages than in all other countries.
> In the highly protected industries of Massachusetts official reports declare that the operative can not gain a living without the work of wife and children. In the highly protected industries of New Jersey many of the "protected" laborers are children whose parents are driven by their necessities to find employment for them by misrepresenting their age so as to evade the State law. In the highly protected industries of Pennsylvania, laborers, for whose sake we are told this high protection is imposed, are working for 65 cents a day, and half-clad women are feeding furnace fires. "Pluck-me stores," company tenements and boarding houses, Pinkerton detectives and mercenaries, and all the forms and evidences of the oppression and degradation of labor are, throughout the country, characteristic of the protected industries.

So when a protectionist claims that a war tariff must be maintained in order that we may protect the dignity and honor of American labor and save it from competition with the pauper labor of Europe, tell him his position is untrue. If protection benefits the wages of labor, why do the statistics of the country show that higher wages are paid by unprotected industries than by protected industries? Do you deny it? Why then do the figures show that the annual average wages of all persons employed in manufactories in this country was but $346 per annum, much less than the average of those who give their attention and their labor to unprotected occupation, and why is it that the record shows that in many instances the highest wages were paid the workingmen during the period of low tariffs? I cast my eyes over this House and my glance falls upon the intelligent features of those who are the accredited representatives on this floor of the working-people, and I ask, how stand these men upon this question? Surely they know the needs of the people who sent them here; they have worked in shop and factory and gained a place in the National Council by their devotion and zeal in the cause of labor, and desiring myself to be found with the friends of honest toil I ask the question, how do they stand on this great contest which agitates this House and the country? I find them in favor of the reduction of these war taxes.

With many of my colleagues I was in the city of Philadelphia the other day to witness the new movement on the part of our Government to place its Navy on a respectable footing on the high seas. Whilst in that metropolis of protection, Pennsylvania, I saw in the Philadelphia Record the following article:

The five Congressmen from Philadelphia whose hearts yearn for the interests of workingmen may find profitable reading in the resolutions adopted last week by Philadelphia workingmen, at a meeting called by workingmen, officered by workingmen, and managed by workingmen according to their own notions. These two resolutions are particularly noteworthy:

"Resolved, That we especially request that wool be made free in the interest of the 60,000 textile workers of our city, who, with free wool, would compete with the world and obtain the privilege of making the finer grades of goods from which the present tariff excludes them.

"Resolved, That we emphatically protest against petitions to Congress that have been or are being signed in the mills and factories, either under the direction of the foreman or otherwise, being accepted as the free expression of the sentiments of workingmen, as the manner in which these signatures are procured is but a species of slavery."

Observing these things what could I say to our protection friends who claim that this high tariff was in the interest of labor? I could but reply that experience and history both proclaim in unmistakable voice that they are endeavoring to delude the American people with false statements, frighten them from the enjoyment of the fruits that lie before them by a wretched scarecrow. But protection has added, it is true, to the number of our millionaires; it has built up vast business concerns in which are invested large sums of money. It has congregated the wealth of the country until in America it is accepted as axiomatic, "the rich have grown richer and the poor poorer." The lines of demarkation in the United States between wealth and poverty have become wider and more distinct. It is the wealth and not the talent of the country that is dominating in governmental affairs.

It has not been long since, Mr. Chairman, that an illustrated paper, whose mission is ridicule and laughter, pictured the highest branch of the law-making power in America as so many money-bags holding various large amounts and crowned with the head of the particular legislator; and it is because wealth has with the power of its dollars purchased position, defied the courts of justice, and held undisputed and unchecked sway in the land, that there have been combinations made and societies formed, looking to the leveling of these inequalities, and in their frenzy endangering the peace and safety of the Republic. A great danger to this country is threatened by the aristocracy of wealth. Let us heed the warning of the poet—

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates, and men decay.

By the aggregation of wealth represented in these manufacturing enterprises, these corporations, grown gigantic because they monopolize the field of some particular industry, "trusts," "combines," combinations, and conspiracies against the money of the people, have been formed, to add other dollars to the pile they have already wrung by the hand of extortion from the purse of the defenseless citizen. Greed and avarice hold their sway in the land, and gold—

> The yellow slave,
> Will knit and break religions; bless the accurs'd;
> Make the hoar leprosy ador'd; place thieves,
> And give them title, knee, and approbation
> With senators on the bench.

It is the power of this wealth that labor fears. It is the "combine" of this capital that labor fights. It is this hated system which has augmented wealth and chained labor that wise statesmanship demands shall be abrogated. It is argued that, relying upon the faith of the Government, capital has made investments and "plants;" that it has been encouraged by the prevalent tariff laws which have been maintained in peace as well as in war, and that it would be a governmental wrong to take from these industries the aid which has been given them, at the expense of the consumers of their manufactured articles.

But it is claimed that if we remove the governmental support they will fall; that destruction and ruin would follow the enactment of a revenue-tariff law. I thought as I listened to the glowing and deserved tribute paid to the "New South" the other day by the distinguished and eloquent Representative from the State of Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] of that time, within the memory of many gentlemen upon this floor, when it was contended by the Representatives of the South in the American Congress that the abolition of slave labor would mean the destruction of their wealth, the irretrievable ruin of their section, that their homes would rot to the ground, their fields lie idle, their lands be waste. No argument could convince them of their error; no eloquence could convert them from this belief. It took a horrible war; it took shot and canister and shell. It took the blood of valued lives to remove the peculiar institution of the South, to alter the nature and condition of its labor. Not a quarter of a century has passed since then, and what is the result? Let the answer be made in the language of the eloquent Representative from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]:

I rejoice that there is a new South, a new industrial South, born of the throes of war, but full of hope and full of courage. She stands to-day with uplifted brow facing the dawn of a mighty future. Her loins are girt for a new race. With unfettered hands she smites the earth, and fountains of unmeasured wealth gush forth. Beneath her feet she feels the stir of a marvelous life. Her pathway is already illumined with the light of blazing furnaces. Her heavens are aglow with the break of a new day. All hail its on-coming!

> "Aid its dawning, tongue and pen:
> Aid it, hopes of honest men;
> Aid it, paper; aid it, type;
> Aid it, for the hour is ripe,
> And our earnest must not slacken into play;
> Men of thought and men of action clear the way."

The entire people of the South thank God that slavery has been abolished and none but freemen live within the borders of our country. Owing its origin to a revolt against a trivial but unjust tax, and holding to the maxim of "millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute," the United States has forever cherished a repugnancy to the tax-gatherer. The South has ever murmured against the unjust tribute exacted from her people to enrich citizens of the North and the East. As the South contended that without slave labor she could not exist, so now the North contends that protection is her only safety. As the South found that the liberation of her slaves was the commencement of her greatness, so the North will find that the adoption of a wise and just system of taxation will awaken her every energy, and, desiring to excel in the race for wealth and power, new impetus will be given to her enterprise, and competition—

> Will lend to every power a double power
> Above its functions and its offices.

To reach the desired end there should not be and will not be a recourse to arms. That industrial revolution in the North is to be brought about not at the expense of the blood and treasure of the nation, not by a revolt of those who have no protection against those who are protected, but by wise counsel in the legislative bodies, by mutual concession and conciliation, by a gradual emancipation, if you will, of the American people from this slavery to monopoly. The President of the United States, as wise as he is courageous, tells us:

Our progress toward a wise conclusion will not be improved by dwelling upon the theories of protection and free trade. This savors too much of bandying epithets. It is a condition which confronts us—not a theory. Relief from this condition may involve a slight reduction of the advantages which we award our home productions, but the entire withdrawal of such advantages should not be contemplated. The question of free trade is absolutely irrelevant; and the persistent claim made in certain quarters, that all efforts to relieve the people from unjust and unnecessary taxation are schemes of so-called free-traders, is mischievous and far removed from any consideration for the public good.

The simple and plain duty which we owe the people is to reduce taxation to the necessary expenses of an economical operation of the Government, and to restore to the business of the country the money which we hold in the Treasury through the perversion of governmental powers. These things can and should be done with safety to all our industries, without danger to the opportunity for remunerative labor which our workingmen need, and with benefit to them and all our people, by cheapening their means of subsistence and increasing the measure of their comforts.

The distinguished gentleman who now presides with so much dignity, impartiality, and wisdom over the deliberations of this House, and who the State from which I am accredited in this body proudly calls her son, in assuming for the third time the position of Speaker of the House of Representatives, said:

Investments made and labor employed in the numerous and valuable industries which have grown up under our present system of taxation ought not to be rudely disturbed by sudden and radical changes in the policy to which they have adjusted themselves, but the just demands of an overtaxed people and the obvious requirements of the financial situation can not be entirely ignored without seriously imperiling much greater and more widely extended interests than any that could possibly be injuriously affected by a moderate and reasonable reduction of duties.

It is with that spirit that we should approach the final action upon the pending bill. I favor the independence of these States; I believe this country capable of producing from her fertile soil all that is necessary to supply the wants of her people. I know her capable of calling into being by her mechanical skill every instrument necessary to till her soil or gather her fertile harvest; I know her genius can invent and supply all the comforts and needs of life; I know the songs of her poets fall with sweetest melody, and that the productions of her pen give food to human thought and impetus to human action; I know that her gallant sons fear no enemy on tented field. These are indeed free and independent States. I favor with heart and soul a home supply and a home market. I would be proud to see our products carried in our ships, sailing under that star-spangled banner, with our trade ruling the markets of the world.

America, thank God, fears no competition with any country on the globe. With a government where the accident of descent does not give position, where each of her sons is by birth "a peer of the realm and a prince of the blood," where high station may be attained by honest exertions, and where wealth bows at the feet of genius and surrenders her possessions at the bidding of industry—when we remember that not four centuries have passed since the eye of the white man first saw through the mists of ocean the outlines of this hitherto unknown country; that not three centuries have passed since the smoke of the first white settlement on these shores sought the skies; that but little more than a century ago, rebelling at an unjust tax, in the infancy of her power, she proclaimed to a wondering world that her colonies "were and of right ought to be free and independent States," and that we are soon to celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of her constitutional government—we stand amazed at her rapid growth and at the mighty achievements of her arm and brain, and cry:

Who shall place
A limit to the giant's unchained strength,
Or curb his swiftness in the forward race.

I look forward to the time when, freed from unjust and restrictive laws, fearing none in the competition of skill and talent and power, these States of ours, this grand Republic, shall conquer all opposition, and, fulfilling the prophecy, show herself to be "the queen of the world and the child of the skies."

I could not, Mr. Chairman, close these remarks without referring to the opening speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the "father of the House." In the conclusion of his address he took occasion to pay his respects with a sharp but, he says, not unfriendly tongue to the State I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor. Although I honor and respect the venerable gentleman who gave utterance to the sentiment, I can not let his statement go unchallenged to the world. I shall say nothing of complaint at the fact that, made our guest, feasted upon the best our hospitality could afford, he has seen fit to complain like Justice Shallow:

I wished your venison better; it was ill-killed.

Whilst I thank him for the tribute paid to that unmeasured wealth which lies within her bosom, whilst I thank him for the encomiums passed upon her stout sons and fair daughters, I do resent the statement that Kentucky is a laggard; that she is behind her sister States. I do repel the charge that to "speak of her as a leading State, a progressive State, or even a prosperous State, would be to indulge in bitter irony."

The gentleman told us the other day that, like all old men, he lived in the past. He seems to have forgotten the past of Kentucky. Living on the border-land which separated North from South, she saw the war cloud gathering and tried to arrest the storm; she saw the troubled waters and spoke, "Peace, be still!" But the angry waves heard her not. On the floor of this House her revered Crittenden, parting the lips of age and experience, spoke the words of conciliation, but hatred and passion heeded them not.

Torn by conflicting sentiments, on the one hand, revering the Government of her fathers and loving the flag of her country, on the other, bound by kindred institutions, by ties of association and blood, to her sister States of the South, Kentucky hesitated. She endeavored to make her soil neutral ground, where in peace and unarmed the men of the North and the sons of the South might meet in safety. But that was not to be. Two of her sons were high in authority; the people of the South had made one Kentuckian their leader and the Union had inaugurated as its President another of her sons, the grand martyred and immortal Lincoln. The tocsin of war sounded; the martial spirit of her people could not be restrained. Some rushed with her Morgan, [her Buckner, her Breckinridge to the South, whilst others seized the Stars and Stripes and followed her Whittaker, her Rousseau, her Nelson, and her Buell to the field. How well Kentucky bore herself on the tented field, in charging the cannon's mouth, let history the record tell. Her purest blood stained the battle plain; her best loved gave up their lives to the cause they had espoused. When the end came, when the banner of the Confederacy was trailed in the dust of defeat, back to the Kentucky home they loved so well came the survivors of the war, wearing the victorious blue or clad in the conquered gray.

What greeted them? Their State had been the scene of border and guerrilla warfare; blackened ruins marked the path of the departed armies. Untilled fields, deserted homes, silent forges, spoke the desolation war had made. These soldiers of the North and South saw that the future of that great State depended upon their exertions. The motto of the grand old Commonwealth is "United we stand, divided we fall;" and forgetting that they had faced one the other in the deadly hate of battle the blue and the gray joined hands and marched forward to a grand destiny. What have been the proud achievements of twenty-three years? Kentucky has taken into the equality of citizenship those who formerly owned themselves her property. She has opened for them schools of instruction which challenge comparison with those of any people in the world; and notwithstanding the poverty of that race Kentucky to-day, when she spends a dollar for the education of a white child, gives a dollar for the education of the negro. I find her increase in population from 1870 to 1880 to be 22.98 per cent., while the increase in boasting Pennsylvania was but 21.60 per cent. I find her the eighth State in the Federal Union in point of population. I find, too, that the great Commonwealth of Kentucky is free of debt, but that the State of Pennsylvania is cursed with a debt over and above its available assets of ten and a half million dollars.

But why enlarge on that subject? You listened, gentlemen, to the noble and eloquent defense made by my distinguished colleague who has had the honor in the past to preside over the destinies of that great Commonwealth as its governor, and you must know and feel now that Kentucky needs no defender, and you ask the question, why does the gentleman from Pennsylvania complain that Kentucky is a laggard? because, forsooth, she has not produced as much pig-iron in the past year as the gentleman thinks she should. With her vast forests which timber her lands, with the untold wealth which lies buried in her bosom, with her fertile soil, Kentucky has ever held wide her hospitable arms to all who seek a home within her borders. She fears no comparison.

Conquering her territory foot by foot from the savage red men, she earned then the title of "the dark and bloody ground." But for the preservation of the public peace, for the obedience to law, for the love of order, her sons fear no comparison. It is only in some portions of that State where they forget that the war is ended, and where they vote the Republican ticket "with readiness and dispatch," that the law is at times ignored and defied.

But Kentucky, gazing not back on the past, but living in the present and working for the future, looks forward to a career full of the promises of prosperity and wealth under just enactments wisely administered, and she is here to-day to lift her voice and cast her vote in favor of the people of the whole country and against the greed of monopoly. [Great applause.]

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 1062) to increase the appropriation for the erection of the public building at Wilmington, Del.;

A bill (S. 1726) to provide for the erection of a public building for the use of the post-office and the Government offices at the city of Atchison, Kans.;

A bill (S. 2198) to provide for the building of a railroad bridge at Little Rock, Ark.; and

A bill (S. 2624) to provide for the enlargement of the dimensions of the wharf at Fortress Monroe.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. 1325) providing for the purchase of additional ground in the city of Indianapolis, Ind., adjoining the post-office site, and for the improvement of the building thereon, and appropriating $125,000 therefor.

BRIDGE AT OMAHA, NEBR.

Mr. MCSHANE. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the consideration of the bill which I send to the desk, and that it be now considered.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6440) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at or near Omaha, Nebr.

Mr. LYMAN. I feel obliged to object to the consideration of that bill at this time.

DUTY ON LIME.

Mr. MOFFITT. I ask unanimous consent to present a short memorial from certain lime manufacturers of my district and adjoining counties. I desire that it shall be printed in the RECORD, and that it be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The memorial is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

We, the undersigned, manufacturers of lime in the counties of Warren, Washington, and Saratoga, State of New York, do most respectfully and earnestly call your attention to the following facts affecting the interest of the people of this and other border and coast States, and particularly said counties:

The large beds of limestone in these counties have caused an industry in the manufacture of lime, which has existed for many years, gradually increasing to upward of forty kilns, with daily capacity of 4,000 barrels, and representing a large capital invested in quarries, lime-kilns, store-houses, boats for transportation, etc.

The entire cost of this article, other than the value of the rock in the bed and the wood and timber in the tree for burning the lime and stock for barrels, is made up of labor, to wit:

The shaving of hoops and sawing and dressing of stock for and the making of barrels or casks, quarrying, preparing, and delivering the rock to kilns, burning, drawing, and barreling the lime, chopping and gathering wood for fuel, and delivering the lime to boat or cars when ready for shipment, thus giving employment to many and benefiting, directly or indirectly, the whole community.

Some years ago a large amount of lime was annually shipped from the States into Canada, but later the duty imposed by the government encouraged the building of kilns at various places near our border, thus providing not only for home consumption, but with the advantage of cheap fuel, barrel stock, and labor they are now shipping a large amount into our markets. It is claimed that these advantages amount to more than 20 cents per barrel in their favor, thus producing so cheap that the basis of duty is but 30 cents per barrel, exclusive of cask, the cask when so filled being admitted duty free.

The present duty, i. e., 10 per cent ad valorem, therefore costs them but 3 cents per barrel, or but little in comparison to the difference in the cost of labor there and here.

We therefore most respectfully petition your honorable body to not only remove lime from the free-list but to impose a specific duty corresponding to that of the Dominion Government.

S. B. WEST.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8956) for the relief of S. B. West, administrator of Thomas Becton, deceased, and that it be now considered. This bill was objected to the other day by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR]. He now withdraws his objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay S. B. West, administrator of Thomas Becton, deceased, of Lenoir County, North Carolina, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,585, being for stores and supplies taken and used by the Army of the United States during the late war, as found by the Court of Claims.

Mr. SOWDEN. Reserving the right to object, I call for the reading of the report.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. It was read the other evening.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. STONE, of Kentucky) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred miscellaneous document—claim of S. B. West, administrator of Thomas Becton, deceased—have examined the same, and report as follows:

The Committee on War Claims of the Forty-ninth Congress, not being clearly and fully advised of all the facts in the case, referred it to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts, under the provisions of the Bowman act. Said claim has been returned to the committee with a report that the claimant was loyal to the Government of the United States throughout the war, and that stores and supplies of the value of $1,585 were taken from the decedent by the Army of the United States.

Your committee report herewith a bill for the relief of S. B. West, administrator of the estate, and recommend its passage, and ask that the miscellaneous document be printed as a part of this report.

[Court of Claims. Congressional case No. 1263. S. B. West, administrator of Thomas Becton, deceased, vs. The United States.]

FINDINGS OF FACT.

At a Court of Claims, held in the city of Washington on the 19th day of March, A. D. 1888, the court filed the following findings of fact, to wit:

The claim in the above-entitled case for supplies or stores, alleged to have been taken by or furnished to the military forces of the United States for their use during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, was transmitted to the court by the Committee on War Claims of the House of Representatives on the 24th day of January, 1887.

G. Wm. Z. Black, esq., appeared for claimant, and the Attorney-General, by Lewis Cochran, esq., his assistant, and under his direction, appeared for the defense and protection of the interests of the United States.

On a preliminary inquiry the court, on the 5th day of December, 1887, found that the person alleged to have furnished the supplies or stores, or from whom they were alleged to have been taken, was loyal to the Government of the United States throughout the said war.

The case having been brought to a hearing on its merits on the 27th day of February, 1888, the court upon the evidence, and after considering the briefs and the arguments of counsel on both sides, find the facts to be as follows:

I.

The said decedent during the late war was a farmer, and resided in the county of Lenoir, in the State of North Carolina.

II.

It is alleged by claimant that during said war, at the place aforesaid, there was taken from the said decedent by the military forces of the United States, for their use, stores and supplies of the kind and value, to wit:

8,000 pounds of pork, 20 cents	$1,600.00
2 beef cattle, $25	50.00
400 bushels of sweet potatoes, $1	400.00
1 mule	150.00
100 barrels of corn, $5 per barrel	500.00
12,000 pounds of fodder	180.00
100 cords of wood, $2	200.00
100 bushels of potatoes, $1	100.00
2,500 pounds of bacon, 25 cents	525.00
10 barrels of pork, $30 per barrel	300.00
20 bushels of potatoes, $1 per bushel	20.00
Total	4,125.00

III.

The court upon the evidence finds that during said time, at said place, the said forces for their use took from the said decedent stores and supplies of the aggregate value of $1,585.

IV.

It does not appear that any payment has been made for said property.

Filed March 19, 1888.

JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SOWDEN. I will have to object.

The objection was subsequently withdrawn.

There being no further objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE AT DULUTH, MINN.

Mr. NELSON. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5191) for the construction of a bridge across the canal entrance to the harbor of Duluth, Minn.

Mr. HAUGEN. I object to the consideration of that bill at this time.

MAIL ROUTE 30100.

Mr. WILKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask, by unanimous consent, that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8965) to authorize the Postmaster-General to cancel mail contract on route No. 30100, and for other purposes, and the bill be now put upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized to terminate the mail contract on route No. 30100, with Charles P. Truslow, and to place the mails at legal rates for transportation, and cause the same to be carried on and by the New Orleans and Gulf Railroad from New Orleans to Bohemia, supplying all intermediate offices along said route, and to advertise and contract with the lowest responsible bidder for carrying the mails over the balance of said route from Bohemia to Port Eads, with weekly side supply to Pilot Town, for and during the unexpired time of said Truslow's contract: Provided, That said Postmaster-General shall not terminate said Truslow's contract, nor place the mails on said railroad for transportation, nor contract for its carriage from Bohemia to Port Eads, with supply to Pilot Town, unless he first receives a bid for the latter service, and has let the contract for the performance thereof at a price which, when added to the cost of carrying the mail by railroad from New Orleans to Bohemia and supplying the intermediate offices, does not exceed the amount now paid to said Truslow for the same service under his contract.

The report (by Mr. MONTGOMERY) was read as follows:

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to whom was referred House bill 5148, submit the following report:

The original bill proposes to cancel the contract of Charles P. Truslow to carry the mails on steam-boat route No. 30100, from New Orleans to Port Eads, La., which contract extends to June 30, 1890.

Your committee, on the facts fully presented in a communication from the Acting Second Assistant Postmaster-General, which is appended and made part of this report, think that the contractor, Charles P. Truslow, ought to be relieved from the hardships which a change in the methods of transportation over this route have brought about. But, in order that the Government may lose nothing by this change, we recommend that the original bill do lie on the table, and that the substitute therefor submitted with this report do pass.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 9, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of House bill 5148, forwarded by you to this office, being a bill for the relief of Charles P. Truslow, mail contractor on steam-boat route No. 30100, from New Orleans to Port Eads, La., and in reply to submit the following statement:

Prior to December 20, 1885, the service on said route was performed under a contract with N. L. McGinnis, at a compensation of $22,719.16 per annum.

On December 18, 1885, the Postmaster-General, deeming it for the good of the postal service, exercised the authority conferred on him by the act of Congress dated May 4, 1882 (22 Statutes at Large, 53), and annulled the contract of McGinnis from December 20, 1885, entering into contract with The Red River and Coast Line, Charles P. Truslow, president, for exactly the same service for the balance of the regular contract term, namely, from December 20, 1885, to June 30, 1886, at the rate of $12,600 per annum.

For the next succeeding contract term, from July 1, 1886, to June 30, 1890, the same service was advertised in the regular quadrennial advertisement, under which but two proposals for carrying the mails on this route were received, namely:

	Per annum.
Louis A. Jung	29,973
Charles P. Truslow	7,600

The latter proposal was accepted, and Mr. Truslow is now under contract to perform the service until June 30, 1890.

The service required is as follows:

Six round trips per week between New Orleans and Burns, 83 miles,
Three round trips per week between Burns and Port Eads, 41 miles.
One round trip per week between Head of Jetties and Pilot Town, 12 miles.
Offices to be supplied, 26.
The mails to be carried in safe and suitable steam-boats.

It is represented that Mr. Truslow took the contract for carrying the mails at a very low rate because he had several steam-boats engaged in the passenger and freight traffic between New Orleans and Port Eads, and had practically a monopoly of the river trade below New Orleans; but that since he began service under the contract a railroad has been constructed from New Orleans down the eastern bank of the river for a distance of 50 miles, to a point called Bohemia (5 miles below the post-office of Pointe à la Hâche), and that the said railroad has secured so large a part of the river trade along its line as to amount to a monopoly.

It is further represented that were it not for his mail contract, which compels him to run his steam-boats at a very great loss, Mr. Truslow would withdraw them from the trade entirely.

If Mr. Truslow's representations are true (which the Department has no reason to doubt), he will undoubtedly suffer a great hardship if he is required to continue service under his contract to the end of the contract term.

The present contract pay is only about one-third of the pay prior to December 20, 1885, and there is no question but that the service can not be performed for the amount now paid, in the absence of other business to be done in connection therewith.

Application is now pending in the Department for the establishment of mail service on the New Orleans and Gulf Railroad between New Orleans an Bohemia. If, in order to secure superior service, this application should be granted, it would then be necessary, and under the contract the Department has the right, to curtail the steamboat service so as to require six trips per week between Bohemia and Buras, three trips per week between Buras and Port Eads, and one trip per week between Head of Jetties and Pilot Town. This curtailment would reduce the contract pay (a pro rata deduction for all service dispensed with being required by law and by the contract) to $3,277.73 per annum, and in all probability would not only not improve his present position but would subject him to still greater loss. In the opinion of this office, the service below Bohemia, if relet, would cost fully as much as the present contract pay for the entire route.

Mr. Truslow has applied to the Department to be released from his contract, but the Department, although convinced that to require him to fulfill the contract would cause him great hardship and involve him in large pecuniary loss, can not grant him the desired relief.

The facts in the case are submitted for your consideration.

Very respectfully,

D. HAGERTY,
Acting Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

HON. J. H. BLOUNT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. WILKINSON. I would state, Mr. Speaker, that this bill does not involve the expenditure of a dollar by the Government. The contract can not be changed until a mail contractor is found who will step into the other contractor's shoes and do the work for the same price.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILKINSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

P. A. LEATHERBURY.

Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask, by unanimous consent, that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3008) for the relief of P. A. Leatherbury, and that the same be put upon its passage.

There was no objection, and the motion was agreed to.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to pay P. A. Leatherbury, of Accomack County, Virginia, the sum of $601.27, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, that being the amount paid by him to Lucy Roberts, on pension-checks numbered 6863 and 6864, which were afterward recalled and canceled, and returned to the Treasury.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be in force from its passage.

The report by (Mr. BOWDEN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred House bill 3008, beg leave to submit the following report:

That Perry A. Leatherbury became a bona fide purchaser of a check of the amount of $1,301.27 from Lucy Roberts, said check having been issued by the United States in payment to the said Lucy Roberts, widow of Nelson Roberts, for pension.

The committee find also that the Department discovered, after the issuing of the check, that the claim for pension was fraudulent, but not until after the purchase, in the ordinary course of business, by Mr. Leatherbury, paying $601.27 therefor, and giving his due-bill for the balance, which balance he refused to pay after ascertaining that the check was repudiated by the Government.

The committee, therefore, believing the claim for reimbursement of the amount paid on said check a just one, recommend the passage of the bill.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE, the second section was struck out.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL LAND DISTRICT, OREGON.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to report at this time from the Committee on Public Lands for present consideration Senate bill 555, to establish an additional land district in the State of Oregon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the districts of lands subject to sale under existing laws at Lakeview, La Grande, and The Dalles land districts, in the State of Oregon, as are contained in the following boundaries shall constitute a new land district, to be called the Harney land district, bounded as follows: Commencing at Snake River, in the State of Oregon, on township line between townships 12 and 13 south of second standard parallel; thence west to northwest corner of township 13 south, of range 24 east of Willamette meridian; thence due south to the southwest corner of township 29 south, of range 25 east of Willamette meridian; thence due east to the boundary line of the State of Oregon; thence north on said boundary line to the place of beginning.

SEC. 2. That the location of the office of said district shall be designated by the President of the United States, and may be changed from time to time by him as the public convenience may seem to require.

SEC. 3. That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a register and a receiver for said land district, who shall respectively be required to reside at the site of the office, and be subject to the same laws and entitled to the same compensation as is or may be prescribed by law in relation to other land offices in said State.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has this bill been reported from the Committee on Public Lands at this session?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to report the bill at this time, and it is read, the right to object being reserved.

Mr. SOWDEN. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. HERMANN) was read, as follows:

Your committee, to whom was referred Senate bill 555, establishing a land district in the State of Oregon, beg to say that this is a duplicate of H. R. 1762, already favorably reported by this committee, except that in the Senate bill there is a clerical error in this, that words "twenty-three" (number of range) should be "twenty-four," so as to read, "of range 24 east." We recommend that said words "twenty-three" be stricken out and that said words "twenty-four" be substituted, and, as thus amended, that the Senate bill pass instead of House bill 1762; and as to the urgent necessity of this land district we append a report (No. 189) made by us on the House bill heretofore reported by us:

"The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred H. R. 1762, beg leave to report that they have carefully examined the facts necessitating the establishment of an additional land district in the State of Oregon, and find that—

"Oregon embraces a land area of 60,975,360 acres, or greater than New York and Pennsylvania combined.

"About two-thirds are now fully surveyed and capable of settlement, and the remainder are arable, grazing, and timber lands.

"The present land districts in that State are all very large and each contributes an excess over the maximum land business, and yields to its officers the maximum salaries and commissions allowed by law.

"The proposed new district is located in Eastern Oregon, until in late years in the occupancy of Indian tribes, and the necessity for the present establishment is occasioned by the rapid settlements which are induced there by the large area of vacant agricultural lands subject to homestead and pre-emption.

"The proposed boundaries embrace about 9,308,160 acres and are 150 miles distant from the east to the west and 102 miles from north to south. The nearest land offices at present by the usually traveled route to the settlers in the center of the new district are Lakeview, distant 160 miles, and La Grande 180 miles; and the communication is only by wagon-roads. These great distances impose much cost and inconvenience to every settler who makes a home on the public domain, and greatly retards the growth and development of the country. The creation of this district will reduce the three districts from which it is taken, bringing their outer boundaries within easier access to the local offices, while not disturbing their present earnings much, if any, below the maximum limited by law. The least district in area of those from which the new district is taken will still be in excess of 8,000,000 acres.

"This committee reported the necessity for this new district in the last session of the Forty-ninth Congress, and the Senate passed a bill similar to the present, but it failed to pass the House for want of consideration. The Department then and now recommends the establishment of this additional district, the Commissioner of the General Land Office reporting to the committee that 'it will serve the convenience of a great number of settlers and be in the interest of the public service,' and therefore is approved.

"We accordingly report said bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, with the following amendment: Substitute the word 'four' in line 13, page 1, for the word 'three;' and strike out, in line 14, the words on said parallel line.'"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

The amendments recommended by the Committee on the Public Lands were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HERMANN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN M'FALL.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5591) for the relief of John McFall.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John McFall, of St. Louis, Mo., the sum of $350, being value of two horses, the property of said McFall, and used by him while lieutenant-colonel of the Twenty-sixth Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and by the quartermaster of said regiment turned over to the Government while the said John McFall was absent from said regiment on detailed duty as a member of a court-martial convened for the trial of Brigadier-General Sweeney, in 1864.

The report (by Mr. STONE, of Kentucky) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5591) for the relief of John McFall, report as follows:

That this is a claim for two horses turned over to the Government in 1864 by Col. John McFall, late of the Twenty-sixth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry. Claim stated at $350.

The proof shows that John McFall was lieutenant-colonel of said regiment, and was the owner of two horses; that some time in 1864 the claimant was detailed as a member of a general court-martial, and whilst in the performance of his duties as a member of the court-martial his regiment moved to Savannah, Ga., and the horses turned over to Lieut. J. M. Berry, the quartermaster of said regiment; that the said regiment was mustered out in January, 1865; that the horses were turned over to the Quartermaster's Department, and the claimant never recovered them.

Your committee are of opinion that the claim is a just one, and report back the bill and recommend its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

YORK HARBOR AND BEACH RAILROAD.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the Committee of the Whole House discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7509) granting to the York Harbor and Beach Railroad Company a right of way.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the right of way, 4 rods in width, across the military reservation at Fort McClary, in the town of Kittery, in the State of Maine, be, and the same hereby is, granted to the York Harbor and Beach Railroad Company, a corporation created by the laws of the said State of Maine, and said company is authorized to construct, maintain, and operate its railroad on said right of way, according to the location thereof, as recorded in the office of the commissioners of the county of York, in the State of Maine, and described in the license issued by the War Department to said company on the 16th day of June, 1887.

The report (by Mr. MAISH) was read, as follows:

The memorial of the York Harbor and Beach Railroad Company, asking for the passage of this bill, explains so fully its objects that your committee adopts it as a part of this report, and recommends the passage of the bill with the following amendments:

Insert between the words "the" and "license," in line 11, the words "temporary revocable;" also add, after the words "eighty-seven:"

"Provided, That the Government may, at any time, terminate the aforesaid right of way whenever it may be deemed necessary for military purposes or the sale of the property."

The letter of the Secretary of War accompanies this also as a part of the report.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, March 23, 1888.

SIR: In reply to the request of your committee, dated the 16th instant, for the views of the Department upon House bill No. 7509, Fiftieth Congress, first session, granting to the York Harbor and Beach Railroad Company a right of way across the military reservation at Fort McClary, Maine, I have the honor to state that no objection exists to the adoption of the measure. I beg to suggest, however, that in line 11 of the bill, before the word "license," the words "temporary revocable" should be inserted.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

Hon. R. W. TOWNSHEND,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives.

MEMORIAL.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, York Harbor and Beach Railroad Company, a corporation created by charter from the State of Maine, respectfully represents:

That by virtue of its charter it has constructed a railroad from a point in Kittery, on the Portland, Saco, and Portsmouth Railroad, through the villages of Kittery, Kittery Point, and the town of York, and Union Bluffs, so called, in the town of York.

That the military reservation at Fort McClary, in said town of Kittery, extends from the ocean back to the high-water line of a body of water known as Barter's Creek Cove.

That it was necessary to construct said railroad between the ocean and said cove, and that it was impracticable to construct the same wholly below the line of high water on said cove, and said company has located and constructed its railroad partly over lands parcel of said military reservation.

That the land included in said location is not used, and is of such character that it can not be used for any purpose in connection with said fort.

That said location does not divide said reservation to any appreciable extent, but is upon the edge thereof, next to said Barter's Creek.

That the construction and maintenance of said railroad will be of great benefit to said fort and all persons who may occupy it.

That upon application, duly made to the honorable Secretary of War, permission was granted to said company to construct its railroad over and across the military reservation at Fort McClary aforesaid, and to maintain the same until the adjournment of the next session of Congress.

Said railroad company therefore prays that permission to maintain its said railroad over said premises as now located, and as described in said license from the War Department, may be granted to it.

Dated this 2d day of December, A. D. 1887.

THE YORK HARBOR AND BEACH RAILROAD COMPANY,
By DRUMMOND & DRUMMOND,
Its Attorneys.

There was no objection, and the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of the bill and amendments.

The amendments recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REED moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The hour of 5.30 p. m. having arrived, the House, under the order, took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. MCMILLIN as Speaker pro tempore, who directed the Clerk to read the following:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, May 2, 1888.

I hereby designate Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN to preside at the session of the House this evening.

JNO. G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

TARIFF.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, taxation is not a sentiment, but a stern, cold fact, a burden upon the people. Excessive taxation imposed in any manner and called by any name is odious to the American people.

From the time when King George imposed an oppressive tax on the subjects of the infant colonies down to this good hour the American mind and heart have always detested oppressive taxation. It is a well-settled rule of political economy that no more taxes should be collected than the actual needs of the Government demand. President Jackson on this subject declared the safest and simplest mode of obviating all difficulties which have been mentioned is to collect only revenue enough to meet the wants of Government and let the people keep the balance of their property in their own hands, to be used for their own profit.

We have arrived at that period in our country's history when the circumstances demand that we collect only what is absolutely necessary to support the Government, for the actual expenses of the Government were never so great as now, as the estimated expense of the Government for the year 1888 amounts to $316,817,785.48; and in this connection I submit a table prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the receipts and expenditures for the year ending June, 1888.

FISCAL YEAR 1888.

For the present fiscal year the revenues, actual and estimated, are as follows:

Source.	Quarter ended September 30, 1887.	Remaining three-fourths of the year.	Total.

Total expenditures	121,121,152.01	195,696,633.47	316,817,785.48

Total receipts, actual and estimated	$383,000,000.00
Total expenditures, including sinking fund	316,817,785.43
Estimated surplus	66,182,214.57

Now, this vast sum of money has to be gathered from the hard earnings of the people, and it is all the same to them, as I hope to show, whether paid by direct taxation or collected from import duties. In addition to this, the farm lands of the country are involved to an amount which is alarming.

It is estimated that the lands in the following States are mortgaged as follows:

Indiana	$175,000,000	Iowa	$120,000,000
Ohio	350,000,000	Nebraska	25,000,000
Michigan	125,000,000	Kansas	100,000,000
Wisconsin	100,000,000	Illinois	200,000,000
Missouri	100,000,000
Minnesota	70,000,000	Total	1,365,000,000

The South also is largely indebted by mortgage on farms, but not to so large an amount as the Western States named above. Pending this discussion it has been admitted on this floor that the farms of the South and West are mortgaged to an amount between two and three billions of dollars. These loans were principally from Eastern capitalists; money which they had accumulated being the fruits of a high protective tariff, and to continue this system another quarter of a century will result in the South and West becoming laborers, if not the slaves, of these Eastern monopolies. The interest on this large sum of money has to be paid by the people, as well as the taxes to defray the expenses of the Government. Is not this of itself a potential reason why no more money should be collected, either by direct taxation or by way of customs duties, than is necessary for an economical administration of the Government? But, Mr. Speaker, by a system of high protective tariff we are not only raising revenue sufficient to defray the necessary expenses of the Government, but about $65,000,000 annually in addition thereto. This vast sum of money is accumulating in the Treasury of the United States, gathered from the hard earnings of the people, and strange as it may seem, when the Democratic members of this House make an effort to change this condition of things, to take this burden from the shoulders of the people, they are met by most persistent and stubborn opposition. The Republican members of this House are working with might and main to defeat all attempts to reduce taxation, especially on the necessities of life. Let us for a time inquire, what does all this mean?

The Ways and Means Committee have offered to the House a measure which proposes to reduce taxation on the necessaries of life. In a word, they say to the toiling people of this country, "We will reduce the surplus in the Treasury by a reduction of the duty on imported articles, so they shall have cheaper clothing, blankets, woolen goods, salt, sugar, cotton-ties, coal, and many articles in common use and of absolute necessity." To this reasonable demand the Republicans reply that by thus reducing the tariff on these articles you will injuriously affect the industrial interests of the East: "We are and have been the favorites of the Government, and under a system of high protective tariff, which has in a large measure broken down all competition and allowed our industries to control the markets of the country, our people have grown rich and strong, and we must not be disturbed."

This argument is equivalent to insisting that two or three millions of people engaged in manufacturing, for some cause deserve better treatment than the seven millions who rise early and toil late through the heat of the day in the fields to earn a living. For the Government to participate in such favoritism and invidious distinction between its citizens is to deserve censure, and for a particular class to grow rich under the fostering hand of the Government from the sweat and toil of the more unfortunate is not only wanting in fair dealing, but is a species of tyranny and intolerance that will not forever be borne by the great majority of the burden-bearing people of this country. It might not be improper to inquire in this connection what principle of constitutional law, of natural equity, or of administrative justice can be found in our Government which authorizes it to build up one industry at the expense of another; and is not the maintenance of such a principle contrary to the very genius of our free institutions? In the case of Loan Associations vs. Topeka, 20 Wallace's Reports, Justice Miller has said:

> To lay with one hand the power of the government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprise and build up private fortunes, is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation. This is not legislation, it is a decree under legislative forms. Nor is it taxation. A "tax," says Webster's Dictionary, "is a rate or sum of money assessed on the person or property of a citizen by governments for the use of the nation or state."

Taxes are burdens or charges imposed by the legislature upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes. Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, uses the following language:

> Taxes are defined to be burdens or charges imposed by the legislative power upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes.

And I would emphasize "public purposes." But our protective friends insist, and it is the burthen of their song, that if we change our tariff system we will affect the price of labor, and they hold up their hands in holy horror, and pretend that they are the true friends of the workingman. Pending this discussion, this argument has been so repeatedly and successfully replied to it would seem now entirely unnecessary to reply to it again. An investigation of this matter clearly demonstrates that the price of labor is not regulated by a protective tariff. It is not, as a rule, true that high tariff makes high wages and that low tariff reduces wages. In a large measure, wages are regulated by supply and demand.

The tariff is uniform throughout the United States, but wages are not, differing much in different localities. Workers in iron-furnaces in Alabama, Pennsylvania, and Rhode Island do not receive the same wages, yet the tariff on steel rails is the same; the wages of those engaged in the manufacture of cotton goods in Georgia and Massachusetts are not the same, yet the tariff on those goods imported into this country is the same. The tariff on coal is uniform, yet the wages paid those engaged in the coal business in Pennsylvania, Tennessee, and Alabama are not the same. The wages of farm hands are not uniform throughout the United States.

This proposition that tariff does not regulate the price of labor is clearly demonstrated by laborers' wages in England as compared with other countries. England is a free-trade country, while Austria, Germany, Italy, and France have high tariff, and what does an investigation of the question of wages show? Senator FRYE said, in a speech delivered in Boston, on what he saw in Europe:

> From all my observations made, and they were made as carefully as I could make them, and in all honesty of purpose, there is only one country in Europe that comes within half of our wages, and that is Great Britain; that in Germany, France, Belgium, and Switzerland they are not one-third our wages and in Italy one-quarter.

Is not the Senator good authority with our Republican friends? All of this shows most clearly that cost of living, density of population, and other things beside tariff regulate wages.

In this connection I append a table showing the prices of labor in certain countries where high tariff is maintained, and these wages refute the claim of high-tariff advocates—that high tariff insures high wages.

Table showing average weekly wages paid in the enumerated occupations in different European countries.

COST OF LIVING—MASSACHUSETTS AND GREAT BRITAIN.

Rents are 89.62 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain.
Board and lodging is 39.01 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain.
Fuel is 104.96 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain.
Clothing is 45.06 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain.
Dry goods are 13.26 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain.
Boots and shoes are 62.59 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain.
Groceries are 16.18 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain.
Provisions are 23.08 per cent. higher in Great Britain than in Massachusetts.
The above facts are taken from the report of the Massachusetts bureau of labor statistics for 1884.

In this connection I desire especially to call the attention of the seven millions of people in this country who are engaged in farming to the manner and extent that protective tariff affects their interest, and I here submit a table showing the rate of tariff duty imposed by the law as it now exists upon articles which are most in common use by the farmers of this country.

Schedule under act of 1883—present law.

I insist that the farmers of this country, although in numbers the largest, are not benefited by a high tariff, but, on the contrary, are shamefully discriminated against, and it is not so strange that their farms are heavily mortgaged when we come to understand how the tariff affects them.

Under the present law let us see what an ordinary family on a farm has to contribute to the Government. I submit a schedule of articles mostly used by a family as an illustration, and the duty on them, and also showing the reduction proposed under the Mills bill.

	Value.	Duty.	Net Saving.

Total cost under present tariff	501.00	189.27
Under Mills bill		104.98	84.29

*Average.

From the foregoing calculation it will be seen that the entire amount of goods purchased at the prices named amounts to $501, that the present duty on these articles amounts to $189.27, and the duty as proposed by the Mills bill would amount to $104.98, which deducted from the rate of duty under the present law would be a net gain of $84.29.

I have been induced to make this calculation as a basis upon which all consumers of such articles can find data upon which they can make an actual calculation (knowing what they consume and prices of same) and determine for themselves what benefit would accrue to them if the Mills bill should be enacted into law.

With the farmers of the South, if the present bill should become a law, much would be saved by putting hoop-iron for baling cotton on the free-list and by reducing the tariff on bagging from about 3 cents to about 1½ cents per yard. In marketing six million bales of cotton it will amount to many hundreds of thousand of dollars. Each farmer can make a calculation for himself, dependent upon the amount of cotton that he raises.

As 7 yards are used to the bale, at 10 cents per yard, including the present tariff—3 cents per yard—the cost of the bagging is 70 cents; but under the present bill, at 1½ cents duty per yard, the amount for a bale will be reduced to 59½ cents, a reduction of 10½ cents per bale. With ties on the free-list, at a saving of about 12 cents per bale, the two would make a reduction to the farmer on each bale of 22½ cents, and this on six millions of bales would amount to $1,350,000. This alone should commend this measure to the favorable consideration of the farmers of this country. While it can not be done in a cursory discussion, yet an analysis of the bill would present many other features as favorable to the farmers of the country as this.

Mr. Chairman, what is the bill that we present for your consideration? It is a bill which proposes to take $878,000 off of chemicals; $1,756,000 off of earthen and glass ware; $11,480,000 off of sugar; $11,000 off of tobacco; $331,000 off of provisions; $227,000 off of cotton goods; $2,042,000 off of hemp, jute, and flax goods; $12,330,000 off of woolens; $3,000 off of books and papers, and $1,079,000 off of sundries. It is also proposed to add to your free-list flax, hemp, jute, chemicals, and salt, tin-plate, wool, and other things, amounting to $22,189,000, making in all a tariff reduction of $53,720,000. It proposes to make reductions in the internal revenue of $24,455,000, or a grand total of tax reduction from tariff and internal-revenue sources of $78,176,000—more than a dollar and a quarter to every individual, or $6 for every family in the United States. And the plain, simple question presented here to-day is: Will we take this burden off or will we leave it on? Will we free commerce by leaving it unshackled or will we keep it hampered? Will we continue to hoard up a corrupting surplus or will we leave the money in the pockets of the people, where it justly belongs? These are the grave questions which confront us, and these are the subjects upon which we are to act:

	Per cent.
Present rate on dutiable goods	47.10
Proposed rate on dutiable goods	40.60
Present rate on articles affected by bill	54.16
Proposed rate on articles affected by bill	33.36

Several of the schedules of the more luxurious articles are not touched.

It would seem that it ought to demand the consideration as well as meet the approval of every true patriot in this country. It is based upon the principle that the necessaries of life should bear lightly the burdens of Government and that luxuries are the proper subjects of taxation. It will also be observed that many articles are put on the free-list which the poor and unfortunate are compelled to have, and it will be further observed that it places on the free-list many articles of raw material which will demand the labor of our working people to prepare them for use and consumption.

While in a short speech but little can be said as to what the present bill contains, yet I herewith submit a statement of some articles in common use which are placed on the free-list, and many more might be included:

Lumber, planks, sawed, etc.; hubs for wheels, laths and shingles; salt; wool, unmanufactured; flax, straw, and hemp; soap, potash, soda; log-wood and dye stuffs, spirits of turpentine, tin-plates, bricks, vegetables, needles, etc., figs, eggs, rough marble, tallow, feathers, and human hair.

If this bill is not constructed upon proper principles of political economy—if it is not so constructed our Republican friends should offer something better; but they offer nothing; "they object." While they are confronted with the accumulation of surplus in the Treasury—a policy which if continued will break down the great business interests of the country—yet our Republican friends content themselves by rising to the high plane of dignified patriotism and with emphasis say, "We object." It might be well for them to bear in mind that an outraged and oppressed people will hold them to an account, and by their votes hurl them from place and power. With a view, doubtless, to bring the bill under consideration in derision before the people, our Republican friends cry out "free trade." No one on this side of the House has contended for free trade, for we all know full well that it is the policy of the Government to raise revenue by import duties, and it will be well for our Republican friends to bear in mind that the people of this country are wiser than they think, and the cry of "free trade" will not shield them before the bar of the American people. If they defeat the purpose to reduce the surplus by a reduction on the necessaries of life, the consequences of such a defeat will lie at their own door.

The surplus as shown by the receipts and expenditures of the Government will appear by the following table:

Statement showing the expenditures of the Government from July 1, 1887, to March 31, 1888; the estimated expenditures for April, May, and June, 1888; the available balance in the Treasury March 31, 1888, and the estimated available balance for June 30, 1888.

Expenditures from July 1, 1887, to March 31, 1888	$244,068,137.00
Estimated expenditure for April, May, and June, 1888	64,931,863.00
Total for twelve months ending June 30, 1888	309,000,000.00
Available balance in the Treasury March 31, 1888		$104,573,930.34
Add estimated receipts for—
April	32,597,661.13
May	34,788,626.56
June	33,709,624.62
	101,095,912.31
Less estimated expenditure for April, May, and June	64,931,863.00
		36,164,049.31
Estimated available balance June 30, 1888		140,737,979.65

Deducting the expenditures from the receipts, we find that there will have been collected from the people, for public purposes, during the fiscal year ending the 30th day of June, 1888, $75,156,611.31 more than was necessary to meet the demands of the Government. But there was on the 31st day of last month an available balance, a portion of which came over from preceding years, of $104,573,930.34, and, if the estimated receipts for April, May, and June, less the estimated expenditures for the same months be added, we should have in the Treasury on the 30th day of next June an available balance of $140,737,979.65.

So great is the surplus, and so strongly it threatens the business interest of the country, that the President deemed it proper to devote his entire message, at the opening session of Congress, to this subject. And the country is to be congratulated that we have a President who is alive to the business interest of the country, and notwithstanding the severe criticisms of speakers and papers, who bow their neck to the dogma of high tariff, the President possesses the courage of his convictions, and, unmoved by flattery and undaunted by fear, maintains the rights of the people.

He has placed the success of his administration upon an issue, and the outlook will well justify the prediction that in the coming election from the North to the South and from the East to the West the people will say "Well done, faithful servant; continue longer in the high office to labor for the maintenance of free government."

One of the fruits or evil consequences of high protective tariff is the formation of trusts, which to-day seeks to control the material interests of this great country in its "Briarean arms."

The following is a list of a few of the trusts, together with the amount of bounty the present tariff seeks to allow them to collect from the people, also their expense for labor, and the excess of tariff bounty over the amount they pay in wages. Not one of these trusts could live were it not for the war tariff:

Name of trust.	Protected by duties averaging, per cent.—	Adjusted to guaranty a bonus in each $100 of product amounting to—	Their whole expense for labor in $100 worth of product being—
Salt trust	50	$33	$25
Earthenware trust	56	36	40
Bessemer-steel trust	84	46	9
Plow-steel trust	45	33	29
General steel trust	45	33	25
Nail trust	45	33	33
General iron trust	45	33	35
Copper trust	24	32	32
Zinc trust	52	28	25
Tin trust	32	24	24
Lead trust	74	43	65
Glass trust	55	36	45
Soap trust	26	19	8
Linseed-oil trust	54	35	3
Rubber-shoe trust	25	20	24
Envelope trust	25	20	11
Paper-bag trust	35	26	15
Cordage trust	25	20	12
Average		30	21

The above table, which is taken from a pamphlet entitled Tariff Chats, by Henry J. Philpot, of Des Moines, Iowa, well illustrates the glaring hypocrisy of the claim that the war tariff must be kept up so that these trusts and combines may receive protection against the labor of Europe. The average bonus which the tariff allows these eighteen trusts to exact from the people is $30 upon every $100 of their product, while their whole expense for labor amounts to only $24 upon every $100 produced, leaving $6 tariff bonus over and above the entire labor cost. I would like to inquire how long the war tariff must be kept above the entire cost of labor in order, as they say, to offset the difference between the cost of labor in this country and the cost of labor in Europe. In this connection it should be borne in mind by our Republican friends that the reduction of taxation heretofore made was in the interest of wealth. Incomes were taxed, and brought to the Treasury $72,000,000. This affected manufactures and was repealed. We laid a tax on the receipts of railroad companies, insurance companies, express companies, bank capital, bank deposits, and bank checks. These were all denounced as war taxes. They affected the rich and strong, and were repealed. Now, with a surplus in the Treasury, is it not high time that the burdens imposed upon the toiling millions who are not rich, who are not strong, who are carrying a heavy burden of tariff taxation, shall be lightened? And these millions who constitute the stay and support of the country feel that they are as much the favorites of the Government as those who with hoarded wealth by combines and trusts seek to crush them; and I now here declare in this warfare I am for the weak against the strong, for the oppressed against the oppressor, for the people against trusts, combines, and combinations, let them come from whatever source they may. [Applause.]

Mr. KERR. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. Yes, sir.

Mr. KERR. Notwithstanding those "trusts" of which the gentleman speaks, is there a single article the price of which is as high to-day as it was before the tariff?

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. What does the gentleman mean when he says "before the tariff?"

Mr. KERR. Before the tariff of 1861. Notwithstanding the "trusts," is there a single article which to-day is as high as it was before that act went into effect?

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. I will say to my friend that the vacillations or changes of prices of commodities are all relative. Before the war—at the time to which the gentleman doubtless refers—prices were largely affected by supply and demand, and were largely affected by the price of cotton.

Mr. KERR. That is your theory; but the fact is otherwise.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. Well, my theory or my opinion is based upon facts. Now I want to ask you a question.

Mr. KERR. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. I want to know whether you expect to stand here and insist that the present tariff shall be maintained on account of the fact that these "trusts" exist and are making fortunes for the persons who take part in them? Are you willing to aid these "trusts?"

Mr. KERR. No, sir; I am opposed to "trusts;" and that is why I am in favor of the tariff—because it you take it away you will have no protection at all against foreign "trusts;" you can not control them because they are not within the operation of your law.

A MEMBER. Are there any foreign "trusts?"

Mr. KERR. There always have been and always will be.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEWART] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. These interruptions do not disconcert me at all.

The morning papers contain a statement, worthy of consideration in this connection, concerning the formation of trusts. It is as follows:

IRON MANUFACTURERS ORGANIZED.

PITTSBURGH, PA., May 1.

The iron manufacturers of Pittsburgh and the Ohio Valley are hereafter to be more closely allied. An association has been formed and a commissioner appointed who will have full power, the same as a railroad commissioner, to settle all points of dispute. The association will deal with the prices and production, and will also have a committee to look after freight rates. A meeting will be held in Youngstown to-morrow and arrangements completed.

The country has witnessed with more or less alarm the details of "strikes," in many instances destroying property and sometimes human life; but so long as capital, under the name of trust, seeks by strong hand to oppress the people, what hope have we that strikes will not be continued?

Our Republican friends on the other side of this Chamber insist that it would be proper to reduce the surplus in the Treasury by a repeal of the internal-revenue laws, and if current rumor can be relied on our Republican friends are not agreed on that question, and I shall watch with anxiety their conduct when this part of the bill shall have been reached for consideration. Some of them say, "Let the States tax whisky and derive a revenue from it."

I have taken some pains to look into this question, and I find that out of the thirty-eight States, twenty-seven by their constitutions provide in terms that taxes shall be ad valorem and uniform. Now, I desire my friend who is to follow me to-night [Mr. DAVIS] to tell me, if taxes are to be ad valorem and uniform, how can we tax a dollar's worth of whisky in Georgia or Tennessee 50 cents, and a dollar's worth of corn or a dollar's worth of wheat only one-half of 1 per cent.? I want him to answer according to the rules of law, and according to constitutional principles, how he can do that.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. I will, shortly after I commence my remarks, refer the gentleman to the views of the last Democratic President on that subject.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. I am asking you the question—not any Democratic President. I want you to answer according to the principles of law.

Mr. DAVIS. I agree with the Democratic President on that point; he states the matter much better than I can.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. If I am right, the gentleman will follow the Democratic President in his views on this question.

Now, I answer, Mr. Chairman, if we repeal these laws we will create a deficiency; and if we create a deficiency of $60,000,000 I want to see the Representative, I want to look squarely in his face, who is willing here on this floor to create a deficiency in this way—to take the tax off whisky, to make free whisky, to make more orphans, more criminals, to fill our jails and our penitentiaries, and by so doing put a higher rate of duty on the necessaries of life. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KERR. With the permission of the gentleman, I will ask him another question. Is it not a fact that there are more ardent spirits consumed in this country to-day, notwithstanding the high tax, than ever before?

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. I do not know. Thank God, I do not drink the article; I do not buy it. I have no feeling akin to it in any way. But I do know that there are more people in the country than at any previous time, so that there are more consumers than there ever were before. [Applause.]

Mr. KERR. Yes; and there is more ardent spirits consumed in proportion to the population than ever before.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is so in Iowa, no doubt, where they have a prohibitory law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KERR. There is not any of it consumed in Iowa; and so far as I am concerned I never drank a drop of it in my life.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. Well, I say amen to that. May the Lord keep you in the good pathway of sobriety.

Now, I want to say that I have in my feeble way held court for five years in the State of Georgia; and of the eight counties in my district six were prohibition counties, and the others non-prohibition or free-whisky counties. I want to say as a witness on this subject that in the counties where the sale of intoxicating liquor was absolutely prohibited my duties in disposing of the criminal docket would occupy sometimes one or two days, sometimes half a day, while in the counties where there was free whisky I have scarcely ever cleared the criminal docket in less than three to five days. While it is no part of my argument to-night, I want to say that in our part of the country where there is prohibition it has added to the uprightness of conduct and the integrity of the people; yea, it has tended to promote a higher civilization; and for one my heart and my soul approve that policy.

Mr. KERR. Amen.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. Now, Mr. Chairman, turning aside from the argument I had prepared, I wish to say that if our Republican friends have discovered that the taxation on spirits is a proper source of income for the States, there is nothing to prohibit the States from levying such a tax, notwithstanding our Federal legislation. If there is no constitutional inhibition against State taxation on spirits, although the Federal taxation may be continued, this will not prevent the States from acting as the laws of the States may allow.

It will be remembered that at first the tax imposed by the Government on whisky was $2 a gallon. The tax is now 90 cents; and I see that a bill which has been distributed here, and which possibly reflects the views of somebody on the other side, proposes to reduce the tax to 50 cents a gallon.

Well, then, if it has been already reduced from $2 a gallon to 90 cents, why not, without changing this law, let the States tax it now if they want to, and if they have the constitutional authority to do so? The point I wish to make is this: That in those States where the authority now exists to tax it, where the law now authorizes a tax upon it, this bill does not prohibit them, nor does the bill stand in the way of their taxing it. This bill does not stand as a preventive of such legislation. That being so, let the States continue to tax it. But let us analyze that for a moment.

Let us say that the State of Georgia taxes it at the rate of 50 cents a gallon. My friend over there in Tennessee and his friends probably will not tax it but half that amount, or perhaps 10 cents on the gallon. What will be the result? Georgia must levy the tax in order to get the revenue in order to help out State institutions, to carry on the State government. The inevitable result of such a state of things would be that Georgia money would go into the other State because whisky is cheaper there. It would go to buy whisky in that State and yet have all the evil fruits and consequences to Georgia that do attend the use and consumption of whisky, and not make one solitary cent to pay any portion of the State expenditures. Mr. Chairman, the simple statement of the proposition, the simple suggestion of the question, is to argue it. There is nothing in it. Another argument in favor of the continuation of the internal-revenue tax for the present is this: Of the $118,000,000 raised, the North and West pay about $111,000,000, and the South about $7,000,000. This money is needed to pay pension claims and the interest on the public debt. Of the $80,000,000 paid to pensioners, most of that sum goes to the people of the North and West, and the same may be said of the $41,000,000 paid as interest on the public debt, as our Northern friends own most of the bonds. Is there not equity in requiring those who reap the benefit of a tax to raise and pay it? Take as an illustration Georgia and Illinois. The first pays about $300,000 and the latter about $23,000,000 internal taxes. What reply can be made to this argument; and is not this a matter worthy of consideration by those who are urging a repeal of the internal-revenue laws?

But, Mr. Chairman, the argument that the internal-revenue tax was a war tax and that the war is over is most fallacious, for the results of the war are still with us. While the war has already cost more than $6,000,000,000, yet it is quite probable that we are not more than half finished paying for the war. The annual expenditures for pensions will likely reach $100,000,000 at no distant day, and how long the Government will be called upon to extend its beneficence in this direction no one can foretell.

I sometimes have been made to rejoice in my heart of hearts, though not especially wedded to this system of taxation (but, sir, if my friends on the other side could only realize that down in my part of the country, where the colored population largely dominates in numbers, and realize the fact that with free whisky, or with whisky at 25 cents a gallon, any man, be he white or colored, could set up from three to five stills to every district in that State, and with a peck of corn buy a gallon of whisky, which in its inevitable results would be to strike down our form of civilization); I say sometimes I have thought that it was the work of Providence that this state of things, though having its objectionable features, had been visited upon us so that society there might be made tolerable, and so that the races might live with each other in peace and harmony.

But, sir, I desire, and I repeat now, I want to know where is the philanthropist, where is the believer in eternal truth, who loves his home and his country, who has a mind to think and a heart to feel, and who is in favor of Christian civilization, who is capable of rising to the plane of patriotism, that can say, "I want free whisky, more of it, whether better or meaner, and in order to get it will favor a higher tariff on the necessaries of life?" [Applause on the Democratic side.] God pity such a man! But, sir, I want to say that this is the only argument that I have heard for the reduction of this tax by our Republican friends.

Why, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that he who loves his race and loves his kind, the man who loves his home, who loves his wife and loves his children and his country, would rather look into their faces and say, "Cheaper food, cheaper blankets, cheaper dry goods, cheaper necessaries of life for you, cheaper coal, when the shivering cold winds of the winter's blast come, cheaper books, cheaper the things that maintain human existence; aye, all of these rather than cheaper whisky." That is my view of patriotism and love of country and love of home. [Applause.]

And, sir, as the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania advertises on the other side of the House, that he will at the proper time offer an amendment and put us to the test and see whether or not we will vote to repeal these laws, while I am willing, and say it now, to vote a repeal of the tobacco tax, as it is an article in common use and of merchandise, for one, I would if it digs my political grave, if it forces me to walk the path of political death, I shall vote, God giving me strength of mind to think and a heart to feel and an arm to strike, I shall vote for the cheaper necessaries of life and let whisky stay under the ban it is under to-day. [Applause.]

But, say my friends on the other side, we have heard even in the Senate and in the House that this law is oppressive. Why is it oppressive? Why, Mr. Chairman, do we not all remember; is it not fresh in our minds that we brought in a bill here early in the session making it the duty of the courts to appoint a commission in each county, making it the duty of the marshal to carry arrested parties to the commissioner in his own county; making it the duty of the party making the arrest to issue a warrant and in everything, as far as human thought and ability could do it, placing the administration of this law just as the State laws are administered? And do not all remember that this bill passed this House without a dissenting voice?

But to day, Mr. Chairman, in the other end of this Capitol, at the other end of this Hall, that bill is ready for consideration; and in addition to that the Mills bill contains almost similar provisions which, if enacted into law, will break down the hardships which have been endured under this law and the brutal manner which has been exercised in the enforcement of this law. Then, sir, if the law, as has been suggested, is not perfect, why not come forward like lawyers, as statesmen, as wise legislators and make it what it ought to be? Why stand stubbornly in the path of legislation and say only, in response to every appeal for relief from the suffering masses, "I object!" "I object!"

Now, sir, I wish to state that in my opinion it will not be the part of wisdom or the part of statesmanship, nor would it be our duty to our constituents and to the people of this great country to repeal this tax rather than give them cheaper clothing, cheaper food, cheaper shelter, to lighten the taxes bearing so heavily upon their shoulders. Will we refuse these demands and say, "No, we will give you free whisky?" But our Republican friends need not take encouragement from such a situation, for in my opinion there is a constituened behind them, should they vote for such a measure, that will by any by rise in its majesty and go forth like the storm, like the cyclone, and by its votes and patriotic endeavors sweep from place and power those who dare to vote against the relief they demand.

But I will not pursue the argument upon this point further; only to repeat and say, let the States tax it now as they need it, but simply see that it is uniform. Whisky is a luxury that men can live without. God has given man the power and capacity that will enable him to live without whisky, but he can not live without food; he can not live without raiment.

Let us, then, rather say cheaper food and raiment, and let this tax remain as it is. I want to say here and now, I would I had the voice to make the country feel and know that on this side of the Chamber, with all our force of hand, of mind, of purpose, as Democrats, I trust as patriots, I trust as men of thought, we will never cease until we see to it that the shoulders of the toiling millions of this grand and great country of ours shall be free of this iniquitous, oppressive taxation called high tariff. And, Mr. Chairman, while I do not say it in any partisan spirit, I feel that this is a great economic question. I feel that it is a question that from one end of this great country to the other largely, deeply, seriously affects every heart and every home. And, sir, I would appeal in the spirit of love and affection to all on the other side of the Chamber, and say to them, let us rise to a higher plane of patriotism, let us rise above partisan spirit, let us rise above individual passion, let us seek to consult our country's good, let us be inspired by love of home and love of country, and taking charge of this question, let us settle it as business men in a way which will scatter peace, joy, brightness, and sunshine all over this country.

Let us see to it when we reduce the surplus in the Treasury that we reduce it not by making the rich richer and the poor poorer; let us see to it that we reduce it not by bowing the neck to monopoly; that we reduce it not by yielding to the aggressiveness of capital; that we reduce it standing in the broad daylight as patriots; that we reduce it so as to carry the hallowed effect of our action to every hearthstone, and to every heart; that we reduce it in the name of eternal justice and right, by lifting the burdens of aggressive, wicked taxation from the shoulders of the people of this country, and especially from the mother's heart, from the father's strong arm, and the people will say "Yea, amen," when we pass that act. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there is possibly more truth than poetry in the words of Pope when he said:

> As for forms of government, let fools contest—
> That which is administered best is best.

To continue the surplus now in the Treasury can not be a proof of good government; it is not justified either by law or precedent; it is a menace against the peace and prosperity of the country; its tendencies are evil. It tends to reckless if not to corrupt legislation; to correct this evil calls for the exercise of good judgment, influenced alone by patriotic motives. Let us remember that we are American citizens, born to a common heritage and destined to a grander triumph than has ever marked the civilization of any age or people.

If we do this we will but do our duty; if we fail to do this the historian of to-day should hand us down to coming ages as both wanting in wisdom and too cowardly to do right. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to make a tariff speech. The subject has already been ably discussed, and I could only traverse ground previously covered. My purpose is to correct certain erroneous impressions regarding the industries of Massachusetts.

I confess to some surprise in seeing free trade so boldly advocated. In former time the Democratic party has not been so pronounced. Its last President, preceded by an unbroken line of predecessors, advocated discriminating duties for the protection of our industries, and urged specific instead of ad valorem duties for the purpose.

> In my deliberate judgment, specific duties are the best, if not the only, means of securing the revenue against false and fraudulent invoices, and such has been the practice adopted for this purpose by other commercial nations. Besides, specific duties would afford to the American manufacturer the incidental advantages to which he is fairly entitled under a revenue tariff.
> The present system is a sliding scale to his disadvantage. Under it, when prices are high and business prosperous, the duties rise in amount when he least requires their aid. On the contrary, when prices fall and he is struggling against adversity, the duties are diminished in the same proportion, greatly to his injury.

Northern Democrats up to a recent date have advocated protection and claimed that the party favored it. Indeed, incidental protection has been advocated by both parties North and South, except that extreme element which has always wanted the cheapest possible labor and cared nothing for diversified industries. The Republican party still maintains this policy, believing it to be a beneficent one for every class, interest, and section of our country.

Certainly the statistics, which are so familiar to you and which I will not quote, show the matchless progress of our country under the influence of a protective tariff. Indeed, the story of its vast increase in population, the development of its myriad industries, and enormous accumulation of wealth during the present generation reads more like an Arabian tale than a sober statement of fact. And this notwithstanding the country was desolated during the same period by the greatest war of modern times.

At the very acme of this prosperity, when everything bears witness to the benign influence of the protective policy, when even the Southern States, cursed by slavery first, then by war, and now by a malign and fatal policy which proceeds upon the false and wicked assumption that to prostrate another section is the way to elevate itself—I say when even the South is beginning to respond to this new influence, when manufactures are being established, her mines are being opened, her limitless resources are being developed, and Northern capital is pouring in to make her waste places blossom like the rose—when we are using our own products at home and extending our market every twenty years by an increase of population to the extent of an average European nation, and when our manufactures already equal in value those of Great Britain and in addition two-thirds of France, it is at this moment that the Democratic party, under the lead of the South, pronounces for free trade, denounces the protective tariff as an injustice, and attacks the Middle and Eastern States, which it claims are rolling in wealth through this robbery of other States, and draining the life-blood from the South and West. And still this tariff, were it not for an exceptional war tax levied in time of peace upon our domestic products, would not meet by many millions the ordinary expenses of the Government economically administered.

And this internal-revenue system is to be preserved with its army of office-holders, in order that the tariff may cease to be protective, and that free trade and unrestricted commerce shall prevail and British manufactures shall displace the products of our own labor on our own soil. When that day comes the American laborer will know whose hand has dealt the blow which has destroyed his occupation or reduced his wages to the lowest living point.

One might respect a straightforward assault which carried a theory to its logical conclusion, but it is difficult to entertain that sentiment for the policy which thinks free trade good enough for one's neighbor but protection better for one's self. The leaders in this free trade crusade insist upon free raw material when produced in the North, but they want a protective duty upon the coal and iron ore of Tennessee, Alabama, and Virginia and Maryland, and they also insist upon retaining the most obnoxious feature of the protective system—the duty only slightly reduced upon sugar, which will compel our people to pay $36,000,000 annually to protect the Louisiana sugar planters, who do not produce one-ninth of the sugar consumed in the country.

The gentleman from South Carolina strikes sturdy blows for free trade and denounces the iniquity of a protective tariff with a bag of protected rice upon each shoulder. It is understood that the gentleman from Michigan, who is also indignant at the injustice of a protective tariff, will at the proper moment move to restore the duty upon salt and lumber because free trade in those articles will not suit the voters of the Saginaw district. Am I wrong in the impression that my free-trade colleague will also try to secure a larger degree of protection to card clothing than is now given by the Mills bill, and that he has a pretty good prospect of success? All these gentlemen appear to be willing to sacrifice other interests upon the altar of free trade, but they have a reluctance to subject those of their own constituents to a like fate. These gentlemen deserve to rank with Artemus Ward's patriot, who was willing to send all his wife's relations to the war but preferred himself to stay at home.

Verily, consistency, thou art a jewel—in this case one of the largest size and purest water, which coruscates and blazes on the forehead of their argument like the head-light of a locomotive as they make their onslaught on the protective system.

But I do not wish to be betrayed into an argument on the general subject of the tariff, however tempting the theme.

My purpose in rising was to meet the charge that the manufacturing States, and especially Massachusetts, had grown rich at the expense of the agricultural States of the West and South, and that meantime the manufacturer, while accumulating wealth (and this charge was pointedly applied to Massachusetts), was paying the laborer wages which were slightly if at all above the European standard. Now, sir, I admit that Massachusetts has been fairly prosperous. She is an old State, and her prosperity has been fairly achieved by the industry, energy, thrift, and intelligence of her people exerted through many generations.

Through her long history she has had many vicissitudes, and it is to her credit that she has triumphed over them all, and occupies to-day a position which I need not describe or eulogize, for it is known to the people of this country and to mankind. In the early part of the century her people were engaged in commercial pursuits, but the embargo and the war of 1812-'15 greatly impaired and nearly destroyed her commerce. But she did not despair or rail at her sister States or persistently denounce the policy which caused her stately ships to rot in port and reduced her seamen to poverty.

She adapted herself to the new conditions which had been created, and which were alternately fostered and discouraged by the National Government. But on the whole she has prospered, and is a striking example of the benefits of a protective system. What she has done other States have done and are doing to their own advantage and to that of the general welfare of the country, and to the disadvantage of no State or section. Massachusetts is the third manufacturing State in the value of her industrial products. The great manufacturing as well as agricultural State of Illinois is the fourth, and Ohio the fifth. And these and other Western States are rapidly forging ahead, and will soon rival the Eastern and Middle States in the extent and variety of their manufactures.

It has, however, been so often charged upon this floor that Massachusetts was accumulating ill-gotten wealth, and that the Western States were suffering from the results of an unjust protective system, that I desire to make a comparison in order to test its truth. I will take the total valuation of Massachusetts and of Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Iowa, as shown by the official returns in 1880 and 1887. This is done in order to bring the results, as nearly as may be, to the present time, and show the relative progress and wealth during the first seven years of the present decade.

During this period Massachusetts has increased her total valuation $362,774,620, or 16½ per cent.; Iowa, $202,698,493, being 50 per cent.—about 200 per cent. more than Massachusetts; Wisconsin, $142,292,998, 32 per cent.; Michigan, $332,254,704, or 62 per cent., and Minnesota the extraordinary increase of $211,551,035, being 77 per cent.—more than four times that of Massachusetts. I hope my friend from Minnesota will not hereafter be so much alarmed at the wretched condition of his State or so indignant at the robberies which have been practiced upon her by the Eastern and Middle States.

I apprehend that these States have been benefited fully as much by the East as the East has derived advantage from them. The Eastern and Middle States have not only furnished a market for Western products, but it has poured its money and its manhood into the lap of the mighty West, building its railroads and cities, developing its mineral resources, and contributing effectively to its unparalleled increase in wealth and population. What the manufacturing States have done for the West they have done, and are now doing, in still larger measure to develop the resources of the South.

It will not be denied that the railroad system of the South, now rapidly extending, and the establishment of manufacturing and mining enterprises to so large an extent, and all of which are destined to work a revolution in her industrial condition, are due to the investment of Northern capital, and largely from New England and the Middle States. All this teaches the lesson that the prosperity of one section is not necessarily the adversity of another, but that, on the contrary, it sustains and benefits all. It encourages emulation and not envy, a fraternal and noble rivalry in the march of progress, and the cultivation of the arts of peace, and it discourages and condemns that bitter and destructive antagonism of feeling, policy, and supposed interest so baneful to the welfare and safety of our common country.

Mr. Chairman, before closing I wish to accomplish my chief purpose of disproving the charge that the laborers in the various industries of Massachusetts are but little better paid than those of Great Britain, and that they derive substantially no advantange from a protective tariff. To do this I shall quote from the most eminent statistician of our country, the Commissioner of Labor.

In 1883, while chief of the bureau of statistics of Massachusetts (and I may add that he still occupies that position), he instituted a very careful and extended inquiry into the rates of wages paid in that State and Great Britain.

He employed personal agents of the bureau to make the necessary investigations, and after considerable difficulty in securing information in Great Britain, while he had none in Massachusetts, he secured reliable data upon which his comparison is based.

He gives the rate of wages paid in twenty-four industries which are common to Great Britain and Massachusetts. He states that they cover 74.9 per cent. of the total products of the manufacturing industries of Massachusetts and establish the complete representative character of these statistics.

He states that he has sought to determine with mathematical accuracy the percentage of difference in the rates of wages paid in Massachusetts and Great Britain in industries common to each. The industries referred to are as follows:

1. Agricultural implements.
2. Artisans' tools.
3. Boots and shoes.
4. Brick.
5. Building trades.
6. Carpetings.
7. Carriages and wagons.
8. Clothing.
9. Cotton goods.
10. Flax and jute goods.
11. Food preparations.
12. Furniture.
13. Glass.
14. Hats: Fur, wool, and silk.
15. Hosiery.
16. Liquors: Malt and distilled.
17. Machines and machinery.
18. Metals and metallic goods.
19. Printing and publishing.
20. Printing, dyeing, bleaching, and finishing cotton textiles.
21. Stone.
22. Wooden goods.
23. Woolen goods.
24. Worsted goods.

He first gives the highest average weekly wages of men, women, young persons, and children, and the percentage of difference, and a summary of the average highest weekly wages; then a similar statement of the lowest average weekly wages, and of the average weekly wages.

As the result of his extremely careful analysis and classification of the tables of figures which he has prepared, he arrives at the following conclusion:

GRAND RESULT.

1. If Massachusetts is credited with the average wages paid and Great Britain is credited with the high wages paid—the Massachusetts wages are higher in twenty-three out of the twenty-four industries considered, the percentage in favor of Massachusetts, in all the industries, being 48.28.

2. If both Massachusetts and Great Britain are credited with the average wages paid—the wages in Massachusetts are higher in each of the twenty-four industries considered, the percentage in favor of Massachusetts, in all industries, being 75.94.

3. On an industry basis, the average percentage in favor of Massachusetts, in 23 industries, is 65.05.

4. Taking the wages paid per hour as the basis, the average in Massachusetts is higher in each of the 24 industries, the percentage in favor of Massachusetts, in all the industries, being 70.88.

5. On the basis of establishment pay-rolls, the percentage in favor of Massachusetts is 97.39.

The percentage that will truly and fairly indicate the higher rate of wages paid in Massachusetts in the industries considered, as compared with the wages paid in the same industries in Great Britain, must be found somewhere between the extremes here given, namely: 48.28 per cent. and 97.39 per cent. The results shown in sections 4 and 5 are not based upon as complete data as those shown in sections 1, 2, and 3, and neither percentage can be fairly used in determining the grand result.

The mean of 48.28 per cent. and 75.94 per cent., as we have previously shown, is 62.11 per cent., and this approximates so closely to the general average 65.05, as shown in section 3, that we state as the grand result of the comparative weekly wages investigation in Massachusetts and Great Britain for the year 1883:

That the general average weekly wage of the employés in twenty-four industries in Massachusetts is 62 plus per cent. higher than the general average weekly wage of the employés in the same industries in Great Britain.

He also finds—

That wages by the hour in Massachusetts exceed those of Great Britain by 70.88 per cent., and the excess is shown to exist in every industry considered.

He then compares the wages paid in Massachusetts and Great Britain from 1860 to 1883, with the following result:

In the ninety industries, in Massachusetts and Great Britain, supplying statistics of average weekly wages for the period between the years 1860 and 1883 the wages of at least one and a quarter millions (1,250,000) of employés are represented.

In the ninety industries considered, from 1860 to 1883, the general average weekly wage was 75.40 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain.

If we examine the manufacturing and mechanical industries by themselves, 84 in Massachusetts and 35 in Great Britain, we find, in these industries, that the general average weekly wage, from 1860 to 1883, was 73.02 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain. If we confine our comparison to the 37 industries which supply an exact comparison, that is, an average figure in both countries for the same industry, we discover that the general average weekly wage in these 37 industries in Massachusetts, from 1860 to 1883, was $10.17, while in Great Britain it was $5.57, or, the general average weekly wage was 82.59 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain. A further examination of these 37 fully comparative industries shows that in 8 the percentage in favor of Massachusetts was less than 60, in 7 from 60 to 80, in 11 from 80 to 100, and in 11 over 100 per cent., reaching as high as 191.6 per cent.

By the industry presentation, the percentage in favor of Massachusetts in ninety industries from 1860 to 1883 was shown to be 75.40 per cent.; by the yearly consolidation (on nine yearly bases instead of ninety industry bases) we find it to result in 79.57 per cent. in favor of Massachusetts. The mean of these two percentages is 77.49 per cent. The result of the comparative wages investigation from 1860 to 1883 is—

That the general average weekly wage of the employés in the industries considered was 77.49 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain.

GRAND RESULT.

1. The number of employés whose average weekly wages are represented in the comparisons from 1860 to 1883 is at least one and a quarter millions.

2. In the comparisons, 88 industries in Massachusetts and 39 in Great Britain were represented. The Massachusetts wages were higher in all the industries compared, the percentage in favor of Massachusetts, on an industry basis, being 75.40.

3. The purely manufacturing industries entering into this comparison numbered 84 in Massachusetts and 37 in Great Britain. In these industries the percentage in favor of Massachusetts was 73.02.

4. Complete comparisons were possible in the case of 37 industries having wage statistics for both countries. In these industries the percentage in favor of Massachusetts was 82.59.

5. On the yearly basis, Massachusetts from 1860 to 1883, and Great Britain from 1872 to 1883, the percentage in favor of Massachusetts is 79.57.

6. Wages in Massachusetts are 28.35 per cent. higher than they were in 1860.

7. Wages in Great Britain are 9.74 per cent. higher than they were in 1872.

The mean of the percentages shown on the industry basis in section 2 (75.40) and on the yearly basis in section 5 (79.57) is 77.49, which figure is the result of the comparisons from 1860 to 1883. This result not only verifies beyond question the result obtained in Part II, namely, 62+ per cent., but it also shows that the extreme figure, for 1883 alone, found in Part II, namely, 75.94 per cent. (see page 119) is less than the average per cent. in favor of Massachusetts from 1860 to 1883.

The grand result of the comparative wages investigation in Massachusetts and Great Britain for the years 1860 to 1883 is, that the general average weekly wage of the employés in the industries considered in Massachusetts was 77+ per cent. higher than the general average weekly wage of the employés in the industries considered in Great Britain.

He then makes a careful comparison of the cost of living, and arrives at the following results:

Comparisons for 1883 between Massachusetts and Great Britain enable us to secure the following results: Groceries were 16.18 per cent. higher in Massachusetts; provisions were 23.08 per cent. higher in Great Britain, while fuel was 104.96 per cent. higher in Massachusetts.

Dry goods.—From the high, medium high, medium, medium low, and low prices for dry goods, we secure two percentages, both in favor of Great Britain. If all goods in all grades are compared we find that dry goods were 13.26 per cent. higher in Massachusetts in 1883 than in Great Britain. If the comparison is made on the basis of all goods in the medium, medium low, and low grades, from which workingmen obtain their supplies, the figure in favor of Great Britain is .9, or less than 1 per cent.

Boots, shoes, and slippers.—In 1883, if all goods in all grades are included, boots, shoes, and slippers were 62.59 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain. If the comparison is confined to the medium, medium low, and low grades, then these articles were 42.75 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain.

Clothing.—If all goods in all grades are considered, the specified articles of clothing were 45.06 per cent. higher in Massachusetts in 1883 than in Great Britain. If the comparison covers only the medium, medium low, and low grades, then the articles considered were 27.36 per cent. higher in Massachusetts. The low grade alone shows that prices in Massachusetts were 18 per cent. higher, while the high and medium high grades indicate that prices in Massachusetts were 56.57 per cent. higher.

Rents.—A very full showing of rents for Massachusetts and Great Britain in 1883 supplies the following result: Rents were, on the average, 89.62 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain. The average rent of one room in Massachusetts was 66 cents per week, $2.86 per month, and $34.38 per year. The average rent for various sized tenements can be easily computed on this basis. In Great Britain the average rent for one room was 35 cents per week, $1.51 per month, and $18.02 per year. Computations for tenements can be made as in the case of Massachusetts.

I give his conclusions:

That on any basis of yearly expenditure the prices of articles entering into the cost of living were on the average 17.29 per cent. higher in Massachusetts in 1883 than in Great Britain, that of this figure 11.49 per cent. was due to higher rents in Massachusetts, leaving 5.80 per cent. as indicative of the higher cost of living in Massachusetts, as compared with Great Britain, as regards the remaining elements of expense.

We have seen, on page 151, ante, that the Massachusetts workingman expends 48.41 per cent. more for the support of his family than the workingman in Great Britain. (The average families referred to (page 151) are virtually of the same size, for the slightly increased size of the average Great Britain family is compensated for by a greater proportion at work in Great Britain, and this proportion is the same as the ratio between Massachusetts and Great Britain as regards size of family and persons at work.)

Of this 48.41 per cent. 5.80 per cent. is paid extra for articles which could be purchased 5.80 per cent. cheaper in Great Britain; 11.49 per cent. is paid extra to secure more and larger rooms and more air space than the workingman in Great Britain enjoys, while the remainder, 31.12 per cent., indicates also an extra amount expended by the Massachusetts workingman to secure better home surroundings and to maintain the same higher standard of living, as shown for rent, as regards other expenses, which standard is higher than that secured by the workingman in Great Britain.

Distinguishing the figures indicating the greater expenditure for living in Massachusetts (48.41 per cent.) from those indicating the higher cost of living (17.29 per cent.), we find, as a grand result, that the higher prices in Massachusetts are represented by 5.80 per cent.; that increased accommodations in housing and the general higher standard of living maintained by Massachusetts workingmen as compared with the standard of living of workingmen in Great Britain is represented by 42.61 (11.49+31.12) per cent. out of the total greater cost of 48.41 per cent.; or, stated as a direct ratio, the standard of living of Massachusetts workingmen is to that of the workingmen of Great Britain as 1.42 is to 1.

I will also quote from House Executive Document No. 54, 1884–'85, the report of Consul Lathrop on factory labor in the west of England:

Consul Lathrop selects Trowbridge, a factory town of 12,000 inhabitants in his district, as a place which shows factory life in England in its most favorable light. It is entirely a manufacturing town, in the middle of a fertile agricultural country. It has given many operatives to American mills, and in all its labor conditions may be considered representative of the best phases of English factory life.

The average wages of the men in the Trowbridge woolen factories are estimated at $5.44 per week. The average wages paid to 418 women in one leading factory are given as $2.66 per week, and in another at $3.02 per week. These wages, adds the consul, would not support life unaided; but, generally, these women are the wives or daughters of the male operatives; neither could the male wages alone sustain the average English families, and so the children in their turn contribute to the general fund by also working in the factories. Boys and girls, when employed, earn from $2.25 to $2.40 per week. Thus, to enable a Trowbridge family to live, every member—husband, wife, and children—works in the mills.

It will, therefore, be seen that the conditions which surround labor in this representative factory town are not much different from the conditions which prevail in similar towns in France and Germany. "Notwithstanding the favorable agricultural conditions which surround Trowbridge," adds the consul, "giving the working-people cheap and wholesome food products, aided by flourishing co-operative stores, the combined earnings of the family are barely sufficient for its support." The operatives are steady and law-abiding, and drunkenness is rare.

In reporting thirteen interviews with Trowbridge operatives, purposely selected for their steadiness and trustworthiness, representing the best element of factory life, Consul Lathrop says that only two were able to save anything. One of these has a weekly income, earned by himself and three children, of $8.03 per week, the other a weekly income, earned by himself and wife, of $7.20. Without the labor of the wife the family resources are insufficient, and when the husband and wife both work the home suffers and the children are neglected.

Consul Lathrop concludes his report with the following comparisons between labor in his district and in the United States:

"1. No class of laborer is as intelligent as the corresponding class in the United States.

"2. In consequence of this the laborer here is not so valuable to his employer as in the United States. He is less receptive and retentive of ideas, requires more oversight and direction, and accomplishes less in a day.

"3. His wages are less than in the United States.

"4. There is not a corresponding cheapness in the price of commodities. Rent is cheaper, but if the laborer spends less here in other directions it is because he does without or buys inferior articles, and not because the general necessaries of life are cheaper here than in the United States.

"5. The employment of women is more general than in the United States. There is some female member contributing towards the support of almost every laborer's family.

"6. The laboring classes are not so self-respecting or respected here as in the United States."

Consul Shaw writes respecting the manner of living in Manchester, as follows:

American work-people, as a whole, would not live under the conditions in force here among operatives, nor could they be induced to adopt the English system. Here whole families live in the mills and are satisfied to do so. Here the children are compelled to help pay the family expense.

Great numbers of houses visited by me contained each only one living room, and this served as kitchen, dining-room, sitting-room, and in some instances also bed-room. Into some of these small houses large families are crowded, and the manner of life is almost necessarily demoralizing and unfortunate.

I will now read a statement just received showing the average rate of wages now paid in a Fall River mill, and for the accuracy of which I vouch, and would add that the same wages are paid in all the mills of the city, and I have no doubt represent fairly the rate of wages paid elsewhere in the State.

Average pay per week of-
Mule spinners	$11.00
Weavers	7.75
Carders (men)	7.50
Carders (women)	7.00
Slasher tenders	10.00
Children (ring spinning)	4.25

These wages, as shown by data in my possession, are 50 per cent. higher than in 1860, before the passage of the Morrill bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will explain also the difference between the wages of labor in free-trade England and protective Germany.

Mr. DAVIS. I have confined my statement strictly to Great Britain.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the object of citing these statistics?

Mr. DAVIS. My object is simply to show the difference between Massachusetts and Great Britain; Great Britain being a free-trade country and Massachusetts a protective State. Now, if the gentleman [Mr. SPRINGER] has an argument on the other side, of course he can make it, but not in my time.

Mr. SPRINGER. But do not you know that in Germany, which is a protective country, the difference is just as great the other way?

Mr. DAVIS. There may be other causes affecting wages there, but I can not go into that question now. The statement has been made here repeatedly that the workingman in Massachusetts receives little if any higher wages and is in no better condition than the workingman in Great Britain, and it is to show the error of that statement that I have produced these figures.

Mr. SPRINGER. If it were true——

Mr. DAVIS. I can not permit further interruption, because my remarks will occupy the whole of my time.

Mr. SPRINGER. We will give you all the time you want.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say, however, in passing, that I believe it is well understood that since the protective tariff has been increased in Germany her laborers are getting better wages and their condition is improving, and the same is true of France. That may go some distance toward answering the gentleman's question.

Mr. SPRINGER. But in all the protective countries of the world, except the United States, labor is cheaper than in Great Britain.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish also to correct the impression that enormous profits have been made in cotton manufacturing in Massachusetts, and will read the following statements giving the dividends of mills which include the bulk of the business in New England for a series of years, and also a statement giving the dividends of the Fall River mills for a number of years:

Dividends paid by fifty-two corporations, having $53,182,000 capital stock, manufacturing cotton goods in Maine, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts have averaged during fourteen years, 1874 to 1887, inclusive, 6.149 per cent. per annum.

Dividends paid by seventy-five corporations, having $70,681,000 capital stock, manufacturing cotton goods in Maine, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts, have averaged during six years, 1882 to 1887, inclusive, 5.952 per cent. per annum.

Mills in Fall River, having a capital stock of $13,361,330, have paid annual dividends averaging during fourteen years, since 1873, 5.23 per cent.

I think these statements will disabuse the minds of gentlemen of the error that large profits have been made in the cotton business of Massachusetts. The average profits have been moderate, and the cost to the consumer has been reduced to a minimum. It may fairly be said that in this industry protection has done its perfect work, and no better argument can be urged in its behalf than the history of the cotton-manufacturing industry of Massachusetts. It furnishes a product to the American people far cheaper than they could otherwise have obtained it, and it has built up flourishing communities, which have furnished the best of markets for the products of other industries in every portion of our country.

There are in my own district two cities numbering 100,000 people and employing more than 2,000,000 of spindles in this industry, and consuming one-twentieth of the entire cotton product of the South. I need hardly suggest the importance of these communities as consumers of the various products of all the sections of our country. Let me also say that in the city of my residence, the Manchester of America, nine-tenths of whose industries have sprung up since 1860, we have, according to the popular standard of this day, no rich men and no grasping monopolies.

Our industries are organized under the corporation laws of the State, by which the moderate subscriptions of individual stockholders are aggregated into the capital stock of the corporations, many of which have hundreds of stockholders.

But we are a fairly prosperous community, and the eleven millions and a half of deposits in our savings banks prove that our workingmen have their full share in our prosperity. Sir, I have listened with some impatience to the attacks which have repeatedly been made upon the State which I have the honor to represent in part here, but I know that she needs no defense from me or any one.

For two hundred and fifty years her career has been luminous in the pathway of history, and would grace and illustrate a distinct nationality of a thousand years. Within her limits are the historic spots which the stranger visits to renew his love of liberty, and to awaken inspiring recollections of an heroic epoch. The simple shaft which rises from Bunker's Height tells its mute but glorious story of courage, devotion, and patriotism to every coming generation. The world knows by heart the names of the patriots and statesmen which Massachusetts has given to the service of their country and humanity.

Her orators and men of letters grace the literature of our age, and her system of education, her institutions of learning and charity, and her wise and liberal legislation are the pride of her children and the example of her sister States. And, sir, all that she is or has been is not hers alone, and she does not seek to appropriate it. It is an inseparable part of the common heritage and the common glory of the nation, and as such should be valued and cherished by every American. But, sir, this theme is too lofty to treat here and now, and I would not have ventured to utter a word relating to it were I a native son of Massachusetts, but I owe something to the noble Commonwealth which has sheltered me from infancy and granted me favors and honors far beyond my deserts. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the Chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of revenues and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 9 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa: A bill (H. R. 9789) for the relief of E. J. Sankey—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BANKHEAD: A bill (H. R. 9790) granting to the corporate authorities of the city of Tuscaloosa, in the State of Alabama, all the right, title, and interest of the United States to fractional sections 22 and 15 lying south of the Warrior River, in township 21 and range 10 west—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. BARRY: A bill (H. R. 9791) for the relief of Charles W. Geddes—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LAIDLAW: A bill (H. R. 9792) to increase the pension of Charles S. Baker—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LONG: A bill (H. R. 9793) authorizing a loan of arms and equipments to the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LYMAN: A bill (H. R. 9794) for the relief of Daniel J. Ockerson—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. SHIVELY: A bill (H. R. 9795) granting a pension to Nathaniel Francis—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. VOORHEES: A bill (H. R. 9796) to correct an error in the Government survey of the quarter-section corner on the west boundary of section 30, township 20 north, range 3 east, Willamette meridian, in the county of Pierce, Washington Territory—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9797) authorizing the President to appoint and retire James Weir Graydon, of Indianapolis, Ind., with the rank and grade of lieutenant in the United States Navy—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. WALKER: A bill (H. R. 9798) for the relief of John W. Holleck—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WHEELER: A bill (H. R. 9799) for the relief of Thomas W. Townsend—to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9800) to refer the claim against the United States of L. H. Walker to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9801) to refer the claim against the United States of F. Varin to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9802) to refer the claim against the United States of Mary E. Reed to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BUTTERWORTH (by request): A bill (H. R. 9803) to amend the tenth section of the act approved March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States," etc.—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BARRY: Petition of citizens of Kemper County, Mississippi, for pure food—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of G. W. S. Davidson, of Yalobusha County, Mississippi, for reference of claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. C. R. BRECKINRIDGE: Petition of Lizzie Lanford, heir at law of Jesse Martin, deceased, of Monroe County, Arkansas, for reference of claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. T. H. B. BROWNE: Petition of William H. Vaughan, of Caroline County, Virginia, for relief—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BUTTERWORTH: Petition of C. Parker, of Harveysburgh, Warren County, Ohio, asking for $100 to enable him to go to Florida—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CLARDY: Petition of J. T. Bugg and 40 others, citizens of Washington County, Missouri, asking that the duty on barytes be retained—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CONGER: Memorial and concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of Iowa, for the passage of House bill 6897—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. FULLER: Resolution of the General Assembly of Iowa, for the passage of House bill 6897—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. GEAR: Resolution of the General Assembly of Iowa, for the passage of House bill 6897 in regard to indemnity swamp lands—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, petition of Gravewig & Scharcey, of Council Bluffs, Iowa, for reduction of duty on rice—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HAYDEN: Petition of the Worsted Operatives' Protective Association in favor of protecting worsted-yarn mills—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 3, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in relation to the claim of Rollins & Presbrey for legal services rendered to the Eastern band of Cherokee Indians, on which the Court of Claims find that the claimants are entitled to the sum of $10,176.77 beyond what has been paid to them, and recommending that the claim be paid by the Government and not by the Indians; which, on motion of Mr. DAWES, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of ex-Union soldiers and sailors, citizens of Kansas, praying for the passage of the per diem rated service-pension bill; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Grand Army of the Republic of Kings County, New York, Department of New York, praying for the passage of the House bill appropriating $50,000 for the erection of a monument at Fort Greene, in Brooklyn, N. Y., to the memory of the prison-ship martyrs; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. GORMAN presented the petition of L. J. Bell and other citizens of the Sixth Congressional district of Maryland, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented the petition of J. M. Green and other citizens of Washington, D. C., praying for the passage of Senate bill 283, for the better protection of the Yellowstone National Park; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BOWEN presented a petition of a convention of citizens of Colorado, signed by John L. Routt, president, Henri R. Foster and F. M. Clarke, secretaries, and Alvin Marsh, E. S. Nettleton, Alva Adams, Henry Lee, and H. A. W. Tabor, committee, praying Government aid in the construction of reservoirs in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Denver, Colo., praying for legislation for the settlement of Indian depredation claims; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of ex-Union soldiers and sailors, citizens of Carmichaels, Greene County, Pennsylvania, and a petition of ex-Union soldiers and sailors, citizens of Bradford County, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of the per diem rated service-pension bill; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of W. J. Kiskadden and other citizens of Etna, Pa., praying for the repeal of that portion of the internal-revenue law which classes druggists as liquor dealers, and for the reduction of the tax on spirits; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAWES. I present a memorial of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, signed by Elizabeth S. Tobey, president, Elizabeth P. Gordon, corresponding secretary, and Helen G. Rice, recording secretary, addressed to the Congress of the United States, remonstrating against Sunday mails; also a memorial signed in like manner, remonstrating against running trains on railroads on Sunday, and also a memorial signed by the same parties officially, remonstrating against Sunday parades. I move the reference of the memorials to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I present the memorial of Mr. George Ticknor Curtis, setting forth that he is interested in the Weil and La Abra claim, and praying for certain action by the Senate in regard to the proper proceeding to enforce the rights of persons so interested. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I ask unanimous consent that the memorial be printed. It is a very full legal argument.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the memorial will be received and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that an order to print be also made. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

Mr. HISCOCK presented the petition of Alonzo Garretson and 39 other ex-Union soldiers and sailors, citizens of Queens County, New York, praying for the passage of the per diem rated service-pension bill; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BLAIR. I am directed by the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the petition of John Pope Hodnett, praying for an investigation of his claim for payment for services rendered the workingmen of the District of Columbia, to ask that it be discharged from the further consideration of the petition, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims, where a bill for the relief of John Pope Hodnett is now pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1100) to retire certain disabled officers of the Army, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2972) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Alfred Pleasonton, with the rank and grade of colonel, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were agreed to, and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 1368) for the relief of the widow of Lieut. John F. Stewart;

A bill (S. 2540) for the relief of Edward L. Keyes; and

A bill (S. 1603) for the relief of Thornton Smith.

Mr. BATE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2608) for the relief of Harrison Flora, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. DANIEL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2176) for the ascertainment of the amount due the Pottawatomie Indians of Michigan and Indiana, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2097) to authorize the construction of a bridge across Trail Creek, in the city of Michigan City, Ind., reported it with amendments.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8809) to provide for the promotion of officers of the Army after twenty years' continuous service in one grade, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is a majority report. A minority of the committee are opposed to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 457) for the relief of Electa Brace, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7340) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Hickman, Ky., reported it with an amendment.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2536) granting to the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company the right of way through the Nez Percé Indian reservation, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred amendments submitted by Mr. MITCHELL April 23 and 24, an amendment submitted by Mr. STEWART April 24, and an amendment submitted by Mr. DAWES April 30, all intended to be proposed by them respectively to the Indian appropriation bill, reported them favorably and moved their reference to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7936) to restore to the public domain a part of the Uintah Valley Indian reservation, in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

BENJAMIN M. SIMPSON.

Mr. PUGH. I am instructed by the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 48) for the relief of Benjamin M. Simpson, to report it favorably without amendment, and as it relates to a small, individual matter, and will take less time to dispose of now than on any other day, being a bill asked for by the Commissioner of Public Lands to enable him to reissue a Revolutionary land certificate, I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Whereas a Revolutionary bounty-land scrip, numbered 7269, for 80 acres, founded on Virginia military warrant, the property of Benjamin M. Simpson, is alleged to have been lost or mislaid by an officer of the General Land Office while said scrip was in the custody of the General Land Office: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior, on satisfactory proof of ownership and the loss of said scrip, and that said scrip was lost or mislaid by an officer of the General Land Office, or by an employé of said office, be hereby authorized and directed to reissue and deliver to Benjamin M. Simpson a Revolutionary bounty-land scrip for 80 acres of land.

Mr. PUGH. There is a letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office accompanying the bill showing the fact that the original certificate was filed in his office and was lost or mislaid. I know the fact that it was filed there, as I saw the original myself. He thinks he has no power to reissue the certificate without authority from Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been reported this morning, the Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to consider the same.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read at length, a further reading will be considered as waived, if there be no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

CAPT. THOMAS SAMPSON.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 9430) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to award a gold medal of the first class to Capt. Thomas Sampson, of New York City, for rescuing five boys from drowning, and to ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALLOTMENT OF LANDS IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed in document form 1,000 copies of the act of February 8, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes."

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 1st instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 1431) for establishing a light or lights and other aids to navigation to guide into Charlotte Harbor, Florida;

An act (S. 2085) to provide for protecting the navigation of the Illinois River by extending the system of beacon-lights to said river;

An act (S. 2179) authorizing the Kansas City, Texarkana and Gulf Railway Company to bridge the Red and Little Rivers, in the State of Arkansas;

An act (S. 173) granting a pension to Henry B. Very;

An act (S. 293) granting a pension to Mrs. Arabella Coddington; and

An act (S. 679) granting a pension to Henry Stafford.

The message also announced that the bills of the following number and title, having been presented to the President on the 19th ultimo and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which they originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, have become laws without his approval:

An act (S. 172) granting a pension to Abbie M. Hay; and

An act (S. 450) for the relief of Thomas S. Hopkins, late of Company C, Sixteenth Maine Volunteers.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further resolutions, concurrent or other——

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to call up a House joint resolution on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order of the Senate of yesterday, when the morning business is completed it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the bill which was under consideration during the morning hour yesterday, being Senate bill 1430.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator from Kansas to yield to me. This is a matter of common humanity, and it ought to have been passed before. It is a House resolution and it will take but a moment to read it, and I think there will be no objection to it.

Mr. PLUMB. After the experience of yesterday morning, with the sense of responsibility I have in regard to the land-forfeiture bill, I feel that I can not yield. There will be plenty of time at a later period, when such matters can be considered without embarrassing the regular business.

JAMES A. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. PADDOCK. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to move a reconsideration of a bill, simply to have it recommitted to a committee?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill 1047 was indefinitely postponed, and I ask that it be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reported by its title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 1047) to increase the pension of James A. Underwood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the vote by which this bill was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered. If there be no objection, the vote will be reconsidered and the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 3008) for the relief of P. A. Leatherbury;

A bill (H. R. 5591) for the relief of John McFall;

A bill (H. R. 7509) granting to the York Harbor and Beach Railroad Company a right of way;

A bill (H. R. 8956) for the relief of S. B. West, administrator of Thomas Becton, deceased; and

A bill (H. R. 8965) to authorize the Postmaster-General to cancel mail contract on route No. 30100, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 83) accepting the invitation of the French Republic to take part in an international exposition to be held in Paris in 1889.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1325) providing for the purchase of additional ground in the city of Indianapolis, Ind., adjoining the post-office site, and for the improvement of the building thereon, and appropriating $125,000 therefor.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 2345) authorizing the construction of bridges across the Cape Fear River, Black River, and the Northeast River, in the State of North Carolina, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CRISP, Mr. PHELAN, and Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa, managers at the conference on its part.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution:

A bill (S. 2198) to authorize the building of a railroad bridge at Little Rock, Ark.; and Joint resolution (S. R. 68) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the Military Academy at West Point José Andrés Urtecho, of Nicaragua.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 555) to establish an additional land district in the State of Oregon, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOAR. I offered an amendment the other day which was pending, I think, when the bill was last under consideration. I will withdraw that amendment. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] has an amendment to offer which includes that amendment with some modifications, and I therefore withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts is withdrawn.

Mr. PALMER. I offer an amendment as a substitute for the one withdrawn by the Senator from Massachusetts, to come in at the same place in the bill indicated for his amendment.

Mr. HOAR. At the end of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add the following proviso:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to prejudice any right of the Portage Lake Canal Company or the Ontonagon and Brulé River Railroad Company, or any person claiming under them, to apply hereafter to the courts or to Congress for any legal or equitable relief to which they may be now entitled, nor to prejudice any right of forfeiture or recovery of the United States in respect of any of the lands claimed by said companies, nor to the prejudice of the right of any person claiming adversely to said companies or their assigns under the laws of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is, Will the Senate agree to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan where he intends the amendment to come in.

Mr. PALMER. In the place indicated by the Senator from Massachusetts for his amendment. It is his amendment modified. I think that amendment was to come in at the end of the bill.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan why he proposes to insert the Ontonagon and Brulé Railroad Company. The object of the bill is to forfeit the right of all these railroad companies to the lands opposite the uncompleted part of the roads. Why does he propose to insert a provision that the bill shall not prejudice the right of one of those companies to lands which I understand it is the purpose of the bill to forfeit?

Mr. PALMER. I understand that the purpose of the bill is to forfeit the unearned lands opposite the uncompleted portion, and this is merely put in to reserve any legal rights that the company may have. I should not have offered it if the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts had not been offered; but under the circumstances I thought it was well to reserve the rights of the Ontonagon and Brulé Railroad Company, which has had a very hard time, and has lost a great deal of money, so as to give it all the rights it has under the law. That is to be determined by the courts as a matter of course.

Mr. BERRY. So far as the amendment provides that the bill shall not prejudice the rights of any person whatever claiming under the canal company, or the settlers, or any other claim of that character, I can see no objection to it; but the object of the bill is to forfeit all lands opposite the uncompleted portions of the railroads throughout the United States, and I am certainly opposed to excepting any lands where the road has not been completed at the time of the passage of the bill.

I therefore move to strike out of the amendment the words "or the Ontonagon and Brulé River Railroad Company."

Mr. HOAR. This part of the amendment was not put in on my suggestion. That came from the Senator from Michigan. What I endeavored to do in drawing the amendment was to put into shape exactly what the Senator from Arkansas himself said yesterday, and has said a great many times; and everything that he says, as we all know, is said with considerable knowledge of this subject as well as with absolute sincerity, because he is on the committee and has investigated the matter a great deal more than I have. The Senator from Kansas, the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Michigan, and all have said the same thing, that they propose to forfeit these titles to revest them in the United States, but that if anybody had any special reason why Congress should be asked to except them, or to recognize some equitable or legal rights that they claim, they did not think this was the time to go into all those numerous questions over the country, but let the people come by and by before the committees and see what rights they could establish.

That I understand is the policy of the committee, and being the policy of the committee my desire was that the bill should so pass that if anybody came hereafter and went before the Committee on Public Lands and said, "We have a claim which Congress in its sense of justice and equity ought to recognize and do something for us," the committee should not feel obliged by the phraseology of this bill to turn around to them and say, "That was all considered in 1888; Congress meant to determine and adjudge that question; we do not want to hear you any more."

Therefore I drew the amendment referring only to those interested in my State, so that if they had any legal or equitable right which they had now, this measure should not prejudice their title to come to Congress hereafter and ask relief, or to go to the courts. That is the whole of it as I drew it. Now, the Senator from Michigan desires to put in this provision in regard to other companies, which of course is equally just, and I have no objection to it.

Mr. PLUMB. I have examined the amendment. I think it ought to be proposed as a proviso to section 4.

I wish to say to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] that I do not think the amendment really changes the purport or effect of the bill in the slightest particular. It simply says that it shall not interfere with the right of the company to go into the courts or to come to Congress, and it is a right that Congress can not practically take away anyhow. I believe the effect of the amendment is to leave the bill exactly as it was when it came from the committee. Therefore, while I think it is idle, at the same time, inasmuch as the Senators who are interested upon the various sides of this question are satisfied with it, so far as I am concerned I am willing that it shall be adopted.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PLUMB. I will.

Mr. BERRY. Will not the amendment have the effect, if the Ontonagon and Brulé Railroad Company finish their road hereafter, to give them a right to the lands along that portion of it now uncompleted?

Mr. PLUMB. Not at all. It does not impair or qualify the forfeiture of the first section in any way whatever, as I think.

Mr. BERRY. I can see no necessity and no reason why one railroad company should be specially named when the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts included every person who has now a legal or equitable right. To that I have no objection, because the bill proposed all the time, and the committee has intended all the time, to give them all their rights, such as they are. To that I have no objection, but I do object to selecting one railroad company and saying that the bill shall not affect its rights when the object of the bill is to forfeit the rights of all railroad companies throughout the United States to unearned lands.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me read the amendment, and I think the Senator from Arkansas will see that my construction of it is correct:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to prejudice any right of the Portage Lake Canal Company, or the Ontonagon and Brulé River Railroad Company—

If it stopped there, of course it would be amenable to the objections of the Senator from Arkansas—or any person claiming under them, to apply hereafter to the courts or to Congress—

I think that is absolutely, so far as the legal effect is concerned, so much waste paper—from any legal or equitable relief to which they may be now entitled.

It limits them to just two things. They can apply to Congress or to the courts for that relief, and I do not think we can cut them out from either.

Mr. PALMER. I understand that the amendment does not alter the purpose of the bill at all. I think it is just so much verbiage, but as long as one company was going to be specified, I thought it well enough to specify another. I am perfectly willing to have the bill pass without the amendment or with it. The Senator from Massachusetts desires to have it in, and I can see no harm in inserting it in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas insist on his amendment to the amendment?

Mr. BERRY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, it seems to me that this method of legislation is subject to a very serious criticism and to a very grave objection. For Congress to declare that an equitable right as against an act of forfeiture is reserved and unaffected by the act of forfeiture is in itself contradictory. There can be no equity against the exercise of the sovereign power of forfeiture exercised by Congress. When there is the exercise of legislative power to do a certain thing, if it has that power and it is exercised, there is an end of it; the law effectuates itself.

The equity that exists against that is a matter that is referable to the discretion of Congress alone, and it seems to me if the friends of this canal company desire Congress, in consideration of certain circumstances which to them seem equitable, to interpose for its relief, it should be done by a bill distinctly presenting that question and excepting this company from the act of forfeiture.

To say that the act of forfeiture should apply to the canal company or to the railroad company, but that all legal and equitable rights shall be reserved, is, as said by the Senator from Kansas, the affirmation of something that is impossible, except that it may be considered to mean that Congress considers in this act of legislation that there is an equity, and that it creates an equity and empowers the courts to substitute the judicial discretion for the sovereign discretion of the legislature.

I am opposed to all that method of legislation which gives to judicial tribunals the legislative power belonging to the representatives of the people and to the States. There can be no equity against the exercise of the power of forfeiture when in the judgment of Congress it ought to be and is exercised. To say, then, that we forfeit this land and we protect the settlers under the laws of the United States upon it, but we reserve to these grantees all the legal and equitable rights which they have, is an improper manner of exercising that power, and is an exercise of it subject to limitations which may not unreasonably authorize the courts to say, "Congress has declared there was an equity, and we so declare." In other words, it may destroy the entire operation of the act of forfeiture in regard to this property.

Mr. PLUMB. The point which the Senator from Florida makes, I think, is covered by section 4 of the bill, which is—

That nothing in this act shall be construed to waive or release in any way any right of the United States to have any other lands granted by them, as recited in the first section, forfeited for any failure, etc.

Mr. CALL. That is true; but then this amendment expressly negatives that provision of the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. Not at all. It simply provides that these people may go into the courts as though this bill had not been passed; and that we can not prevent them from doing.

Mr. CALL. It goes further than that.

Mr. PLUMB. It provides that they may come to Congress; and that we can not prevent them from doing.

Mr. CALL. It goes further than that.

Mr. PLUMB. Not at all.

Mr. CALL. "For any legal or equitable relief."

Mr. PLUMB. That is to say, they may be recognized by these tribunals.

Mr. CALL. This tribunal, after having passed an act of forfeiture, can not say that there is a legal and equitable right against what they themselves have done in the exercise of power given to them.

Mr. PLUMB. Suppose these people have a legal right to go into the courts, does the Senator want to take that right away from them?

Mr. CALL. If you can not take it away from them, there is no need of the amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. Therefore I say, in my comprehension, this amendment is absolutely without effect; but at the same time, inasmuch as it has been proposed, I do not see any objection to having it adopted.

Mr. CALL. It would not be objectionable if it did not say "legal and equitable rights." They may hereafter come to Congress and say that this forfeiture is not good which has taken place and which is declared, and that their legal and equitable rights against it are reserved in this act.

Mr. PLUMB. No, there is no reservation at all; they simply shall not be estopped from coming to Congress and asserting those rights. Any person may come to Congress for that purpose.

Mr. CALL. My friend must not mix up the two things. Anybody may come to Congress for any kind of relief he sees fit to ask; but after an act of forfeiture has been passed restoring land to the public domain, and it has been disposed of by the proper officers under the land laws, no one can come to Congress and say, "I ask that this action be reversed and that the land be given to me under a legal and equitable right which I now affirm as against that act."

Mr. PLUMB. There is no limit to the right of petition. A person may ask for anything.

Mr. CALL. That is true, but that is not the question.

Mr. PLUMB. This does not bind Congress to give anything. It simply says that it shall not cut them off from applying.

Mr. CALL. Now, let us examine that point and see whether it does or not? This act of forfeiture we will suppose to take effect according to the idea of the Senator from Kansas. It forfeits the land which this Portage Canal Company claims. That land is disposed of to settlers, or by donation under act of Congress to some one else. If the act of forfeiture is valid that vests a title in it. Then these petitioners come to Congress and file a petition, and say:

By the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan our rights, legal and equitable, were reserved, and we had a right to come to Congress or to go to the courts, and we ask now that the consequences of this act of forfeiture in the disposal of this land by homestead entry or otherwise under the land laws of the United States shall all be reversed, and that the land shall be restored to us.

Is not that competent?

Mr. PLUMB. No, Mr. President, that brings up a question beyond the competence of Congress. If other people have a legal title to these lands Congress can not take it away. It might happen—I do not know that it would happen; I do not think it would happen—that this company might have a claim against Congress, or somebody else might have a claim against Congress, on account of some misleading action taken by the Interior Department, and if that were so they might come and ask compensation and damages in money. There might be a variety of ways in which they might ask compensation. Congress can not take away the title, of course, and persons affected could apply, whether we put this provision in or not, because it is always in the competence of Congress to take into consideration equities of any kind whatever. Legal rights, of course, are supposed to be enforced by the courts, but Congress may take into consideration that class of equities of which the courts can not take cognizance.

Mr. CALL. The Senator, I think, is exactly right, and if you will insert in the amendment that they may come to Congress for a pecuniary compensation for any injury to their equitable rights there would be no objection to it, except that it would be unnecessary, for they can do that any way. But the difficulty in the case is that this bill proposes to forfeit a specific portion of land. As against the exercise of that power of forfeiture which the bill itself contains, here is an amendment which says that these parties may come into Congress or go into the courts—to do what? They can not go into the courts to assert any equitable right, for there is no equity against the exercise of the sovereign power of legislation. Supposing the power to exist, there can be no equity except such as the discretion of the sovereign sees fit to create.

Mr. PLUMB. This does not limit that power at all.

Mr. CALL. If it is not to be construed as saving their equitable right to the land, if it is not to be construed as creating an equity by act of legislation which does not exist, it does not limit it; but if it does, and the language so purports, and that can be the only intention in offering it, it must be, as the Senator from Kansas says, utterly void, unless it limits and qualifies the exercise of the power of forfeiture which the act purports to make.

Mr. PLUMB. It is a reservation in favor of individuals, substantially in terms the reservation in favor of the Government contained in the fourth section of the bill, which I will now read:

That nothing in this act shall be construed to waive or release in any way any right of the United States to have any other lands granted by them, as recited in the first section, forfeited for any failure, past or future, to comply with the conditions of the grant.

Then the amendment simply goes on to say, nor shall this interfere with any right—not conferring any right, legal or equitable, upon the parties named in the amendment to come to Congress or to go to the courts; in other words, whatever the status quo may be, to simply leave it; that is all. It does not confer any right; it does not say there is any right; it simply says, if there is any right this shall not cut out those holding it from applying to the courts or to Congress for the purpose of having it recognized. That is all there is about it. That is exactly what the bill is intended to do.

The matter was discussed in the committee. The intention was in regard to all this class of controverted questions, about which the Senate has heard so much recently, that Congress should not interfere with cases in which it might perhaps do injustice, but at all events of which it was not thoroughly informed.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I understand that this action is rendered necessary because the courts have determined that this land can not be forfeited without the action of the political authority, as under the peculiar legislation the courts can not declare a forfeiture. This bill purposes to do by the political authority what under other circumstances would be done by judicial authority. If railroad companies have rights which the judiciary can not forfeit, and that reservation is made, does it not follow that the roads will not come under the provisions of the act?

Mr. PLUMB. No, not at all.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, this question presents itself in two aspects. The first is, is there any land contained in this grant which ought to be subject to the power of forfeiture by the Congress of the United States? That is one question. Ought this land to be forfeited or not? Is there any ground of law or equity which should retain the sovereign power of the people from dedicating this land to the general use in homestead settlement or entry? If there is, it should be distinctly recognized and so declared by Congress, because the exercise of this power of legislation is final and conclusive and imperative as law. There can be no equity, except that which Congress creates against the exercise of any power of legislation. Now, if you say when exercising a sovereign power of legislation "there is hereby reserved the equitable right of any individual," how is it to be ascertained? Here sits the judge to say: "Congress has passed a law, has exercised its sovereign power of legislation; we declare that there is an equity which should have restrained and which shall restrain the Congress of the United States from the exercise of its power."

Why, Mr. President, that is not correct reasoning. There can be no restraining power as against the sovereign legislature exercising its power; otherwise it is not sovereign and it is not legislation.

There can be no equity. This amendment says it shall not affect any equity against the exercise of this power. That is not a proper form in which we should place ourselves. If these parties should have this land it should be so said in terms; if not, it should be forfeited. If the courts should decide the question of legal right, we should leave it to them in express terms; but to say that we forfeit the land but reserve the equitable rights of the company named or anybody else who may assert a title seems to be absurd. Congress can not do it. It is out of its power. All this is subject to the exercise of the power of Congress. Whether it ought to be so or not, is another and a distinct question; but I think we place ourselves in a very improper light when we say "we forfeit this," and yet we do not forfeit it, but we reserve to all parties claiming any legal or equitable right they may have.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER].

Mr. PLUMB. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Insert in line 4 of the amendment the words "the Ontonagon and Brulé Railroad Company," and after the word "company" insert the words "Ontonagon and Brulé River Railroad Company;" so as to read:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to prejudice any right of the Portage Lake Canal Company or the Ontonagon and Brulé River Railroad Company, or any person claiming, etc.

Mr. BERRY. The Secretary is mistaken. I did not move to insert anything. I moved to strike out "the Ontonagon and Brulé River Railroad Company."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary did not understand the amendment as offered. It will be reported.

The SECRETARY. After the word "company," in line 4, it is proposed to strike out "or the Ontonagon and Brulé River Railroad Company;" so as to read:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to prejudice any right of the Portage Lake Canal Company, or any person claiming under them, etc.

Mr. PALMER. I hope that the motion of the Senator from Arkansas will not prevail. I think that if we are going to make any declaration in favor of one company we should in favor of the other. I do not think the amendment amounts to anything. It is merely explanatory or declaratory of what is the manifest purpose of the bill, but as long as it is going to be adopted I do not wish the canal company to be favored as against the Ontonagon and Brulé River Railroad Company. I have heretofore introduced a bill to forfeit the grant of the Ontonagon and Brulé Railroad Company, but at the same time they are entitled to some consideration, for they have had a very hard time, and if we can, consistently with our duty to the public, relieve the burden that they bear, I think we should do so.

Mr. BERRY. I want to forfeit the grant to the railroad company. The bill is to forfeit the railroad grants, and I would not vote a foot of land to any railroad company in the United States.

Mr. PALMER. I have not got the phobia quite as bad as that. I believe in declaring the unearned grants forfeited, but I believe in giving the railroads fair play. I think that we erred by going to the other extreme hitherto, and now we are liable to err by following the oscillations of the pendulum a little too far the other way. I believe in fair play to the railroads as well as to individuals and to the public.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. FAULKNER. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], and have transferred the pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BLODGETT]. Therefore I vote "nay" on this proposition.

Mr. BECK. I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is necessarily absent from the city. I would vote "nay" if he were present.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Bate,	Coke,	Gorman,	Reagan,
Berry,	Colquitt,	Hampton,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Dolph,	Harris,	Turpie,
Butler,	Eustis,	Jones of Arkansas,	Vest,
Call,	Gibson,	Pasco,	Wilson of Md.

NAYS—26.

Chace,	Hale,	Morrill,
Cockrell,	Hearst,	Platt,

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BERRY. I move to lay the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair). The Senator from Arkansas moves to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I understand that is a proviso to section 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a proviso to come in at the end of section 4.

Mr. SPOONER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to come in as an additional section to the bill.

The amendment was read, as follows:

SEC. 9. That in all cases when any of the lands forfeited by the first section of this act, or when any lands relinquished to, or for any cause resumed by, the United States from grants for railroad purposes, heretofore made to the State of Michigan, have heretofore been disposed of by the proper officers of the United States, by sales or entries, by cash warrants or scrip, under color of the public-land laws, and where the consideration received therefor is still retained by the Government, the right and title of all persons holding or claiming under such disposals shall be, and is hereby, confirmed: Provided, however, That where the original cash purchasers are the present owners this act shall be operative to confirm the title only of such said cash purchasers as the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied have purchased without fraud and in the belief that they were thereby obtaining valid title from the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. PALMER. There are two amendments offered by me to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin which may be embodied in one, and can be appended to line 16. They are printed on the same sheet. Let the Secretary embody both of these amendments in one. I now offer them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment of Mr. SPOONER it is proposed to add:

Nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any sales or entries of lands upon which there were bona fide pre-emption or homestead claims on the 1st day of January, 1888, arising or asserted under color of the laws of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. I accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin modifies his amendment as just read by the Secretary.

Mr. PALMER. There is another amendment of mine. I see that the Senator from Wisconsin may object to the second, and therefore it can not be embodied in the first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is now in order. The Senator from Wisconsin has modified his former amendment. Now the Senator from Michigan can offer his amendment.

Mr. PALMER. I now offer my second amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the amendment of Mr. SPOONER the following words:

And no sale or entries shall be hereby confirmed to the prejudice of any pre-emption or homestead claims now valid under existing decisions of the Secretary of the Interior, and which were existing on the 1st day of January, 1888.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is that amendment subject to amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is an amendment in the second degree.

Mr. COCKRELL. Would it be in order to move to strike out certain words in that amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would be an amendment in the third degree, which would not be in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Was not the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is pending, to which the Senator from Michigan has now offered an amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that he modify his amendment by striking out the words "under existing decisions of the Secretary of the Interior" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "under the existing laws of the United States." I do not think it would be very appropriate legislation to put in "under existing decisions of the Secretary of the Interior" without knowing what those decisions are.

Mr. PLUMB. I would suggest to say "now valid under existing law."

Mr. COCKRELL. That is what I mean—under existing law.

Mr. PALMER. I should prefer to have it just as it is. There are certain rights which have been established or decided upon in the Interior Department which the homesteaders of our State have been prosecuting for seven or eight years. The decision was given in the case of Wakefield vs. Cutter to the effect that cash purchasers on the common land, as it was called, have no rights whatever. That decision has been made by the Secretary of the Interior, and the very gist of the whole amendment is in those words that the Senator from Missouri suggests should be stricken out. They do not wish to be relegated to the old fight; I do not suppose that the Secretary of the Interior is the court of last resort; but they do not want to have this fight to go over again. They are poor men. They have with their little dimes and half dollars kept counsel here to protect their interests. One has been sent down here now, and has been here all winter, watching this bill. What they desire is that they shall lose no ground that they have obtained. Under these circumstances I hope that the amendment will be adopted as I have offered it, without qualification.

Mr. SPOONER. The amendment which the Senator from Michigan last offered, as explained by him, has the effect to render of no avail, if adopted, the amendment to which it is an amendment. The amendment which I have sent to the desk is an amendment which applies to the transactions of six or seven hundred citizens of the United States with the Government of the United States through the officers of the United States; simply those principles of common honesty and fair dealing which obtain among honest men dealing with each other.

By a mistake as to the law, a confessed mistake, but a mistake for which the officers of the Government were as much responsible as those who dealt with them, during the period of eight years portions of these lands were held open to entry and sale in the State of Michigan, and during that time and all of that time the Government officers, acting in good faith, dealing with citizens of the United States also acting in good faith, sold these lands to purchasers, taking the money from them and putting it in the Treasury, where it is to-day, accepting from them land-warrants and canceling them as having performed their function, accepting from them at the land offices scrip with the function of location annexed. My amendment is a proposition simply that as to those persons who purchased in good faith, the purchase-money being still retained by the Government, the title shall be confirmed.

Their entries were void, I concede, for the purposes of the argument, technically, because the act of Congress required that the lands should be reoffered. They were restored to market. They were proclaimed restored by the President of the United States and were advertised for sale, and from 1866 until 1874 they were as open to entry in the land offices, so far as the world knew and so far as the action of the Government was concerned, as any public land in the United States.

At the last session of Congress an act was passed providing for the adjustment of land grants which declared, I think justly declared, that wherever persons had purchased in good faith from a railway company they should be permitted, notwithstanding the failure of the railway company's title, to pay the purchase-money to the United States and protect their title. This very bill, in its second section, fairly and justly provides that wherever any of the lands which are forfeited by the provisions of the bill shall have been purchased in good faith by citizens of the United States and are in their possession they shall have the right to protect that title by paying the purchase-money to the Government. That is a just and right provision. But why protect the titles of those who have bought in good faith from railroad companies throughout the country, and yet refuse to protect the titles of those who have purchased in good faith from the Government itself?

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator a question in regard to those lands about which he is speaking now. As I understand, the defect is that the United States officers failed or neglected to advertise and offer those lands for public sale?

Mr. SPOONER. They advertised, but they were not technically offered, except as to a small quantity.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was advertised that they would be sold at public sale.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. But on that day the formal offering was not made.

Mr. SPOONER. There was an offer of a few tracts in fact, as I understand it, but the whole body was not offered for sale.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator excuse me? I think that these lands were never advertised or offered at public sale.

Mr. SPOONER. I have a copy of the advertisement.

Mr. PALMER. I may be in error.

Mr. COCKRELL. They were then in the market how long?

Mr. SPOONER. Eight years.

Mr. COCKRELL. When were these entries made?

Mr. SPOONER. These entries were made during that time.

Mr. COCKRELL. Were they all made right at once?

Mr. SPOONER. No; they were made during those years.

Mr. SAWYER. I will answer that. They were principally made during a period of four years.

Mr. COCKRELL. Were all the lands taken up?

Mr. SPOONER. No, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. In what proportion?

Mr. SPOONER. There were about 700 purchasers, I understand, altogether.

Mr. COCKRELL. How much did each one purchase?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know.

Mr. COCKRELL. How much was taken up in the aggregate?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know that.

Mr. SAWYER. I think there were altogether 100,000 acres, but there were very few lands sold till after they had been in the market from four to five years. They were all advertised. I know that, because I saw the advertisement in the papers at the time, but they were not put up at public auction.

Mr. COCKRELL. They were then treated by the land offices as subject to disposition to any one who applied?

Mr. SAWYER. That is it.

Mr. COCKRELL. By cash, land warrant, or entry?

Mr. SPOONER. That is the point. There is a technical defect in the title, and probably a fatal defect in the title if Congress chooses to insist upon it; but the land officers, undoubtedly acting in good faith, opened the lands to purchase, and during those years from time to time, and at different times, these entries were made, and the locations were made.

Mr. COCKRELL. Were they made by individuals or by corporations?

Mr. SPOONER. By individuals mostly, as I understand it, residing in different States—some of them in Wisconsin, some of them in Michigan, some of them in Illinois. The Government has issued patents on a large portion of them. On others the land officers' receipts only were issued. These purchasers have paid taxes on the land for years as their property. The lands have been subject to mortgage; they have been subject to sale under warranty deeds by the individual purchasers, and they have been subject to sale upon execution. They have been treated, in other words, by the Government of the United States, by the purchasers of the lands, and by the State in the exercise of her taxing power, as having been acquired in good faith and as belonging to these purchasers.

There was at one time some suggestion of fraud in connection with some of them, but I have provided in the amendment that it shall be operative to confirm these titles where the lands are now owned by the original entrymen only in those cases where the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied that their purchases were without fraud and in the belief that they were thereby obtaining a valid title from the United States.

It is not a new policy for the Government to protect purchasers in good faith. Repeatedly such acts have been passed. Congress provided, as I have stated, at the last session, and this very bill provides, for protecting purchasers from the railway companies whose lands were forfeited under these grants, because they acted in good faith, and it would be impossible——

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me ask the Senator if he can not extend that provision to assignees or vendees where they have not purchased in good faith?

Mr. SPOONER. I did not draw the amendment to extend to assignees of original purchasers for this reason: It seemed to me that where a patent had been issued by the Government of the United States to a purchaser, which we all recognize as the highest possible muniment of title, and individuals had purchased upon the strength of that title, the Government not moving now for fourteen, fifteen, or sixteen years to assert any defect, it would be unjust to extend the condition to the vendees.

Mr. COCKRELL. You are right now; but the question would be as to cases where the patent had not been issued.

Mr. SPOONER. I would have no objection to that limitation.

Now, as to the proposition of the Senator from Michigan. While protecting the rights of bona fide purchasers from the United States, and confessing their need of confirmatory action, admitting that the title is technically invalid, I have no desire that these titles shall be confirmed as against any bona fide homesteader or pre-emption claimant on any of these lands, and therefore I accepted the amendment offered first by the Senator from Michigan, declaring that this act should not confirm the title of any purchaser as against any bona fide settler, pre-emptioner, or homesteader existing on the 1st day of January, 1888.

Now, the Senator asks the Senate by his second amendment—and I think the objection taken to it by the Senator from Missouri is well taken—to legalize, beyond the reach of the courts even, some decision or decisions of the Secretary of the Interior holding cash entries to have been void. We all know they were void as against the United States. They were void upon this technical ground, that the lands had not been formally reoffered. It is because they were so defective that these purchasers invoke this measure of justice and protection from the United States; but they do not ask that it shall be granted as against any bona fide pre-emption claimant or homesteader.

Mr. PALMER. Does the Senator understand that the cash entries are void on all these lands proposed to be forfeited in Michigan?

Mr. SPOONER. Only the odd-numbered sections.

Mr. PALMER. In all the grants?

Mr. SPOONER. In the odd-numbered sections.

Mr. PALMER. I think that is confined to the common land. I do not think they went on to any other than the common lands.

Mr. SPOONER. Wherever in the State of Michigan within the limits of the land grants made by the act of June 3, 1856, odd-numbered sections were sold after 1866 and down to 1875, without having been first offered technically at public sale, the title is defective, as I understand it.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator, was that the ground taken by the Secretary?

Mr. SPOONER. I suppose it was. I do not know anything about that decision, but it would not require a decision of the Secretary nor would it require a decision other than that which the Supreme Court of the United States has already made to make that the law. The Supreme Court held in the case of Eldred vs. Sexton, 19 Wall., 189, many years ago, what no lawyer ever could fairly doubt, that where the law required that the public lands should be reoffered at public sale before being subject to private entry, if they were sold without that condition-precedent the entry would be invalid.

Mr. CALL. I only wished to know if there was any other ground.

Mr. SPOONER. Not that I know of.

Now, sir, I want and I ask that these purchasers in good faith shall be protected except where their title conflicts with any bona fide settler or homesteader down to 1888. Wherever there is any such conflict the cash entryman must yield to the interest and right of the settler. But when the Senator from Michigan goes beyond that and asks Congress to give these men or any men more than they are entitled to under the laws of the United States he asks too much.

The decisions of the Secretary of the Interior may be right; they may be wrong. They are not entitled to the presumption of correctness that a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States would be. They are sometimes changed by different Secretaries, and I do not think it would be good policy or good legislation to legalize and make a rule of law by enactment of any decision of a head of a Department, no matter who he may be. If his decision is the law, it will stand. If his decision is not the law, then Congress should not declare it to be the law. The Senator from Michigan, it seems to me, ought to be entirely satisfied with an amendment which protects the rights of every bona fide settler in Michigan upon these lands under the laws of the United States as they have been declared and may hereafter be declared by the Secretary of the Interior or ultimately by the courts.

I will go as far as he in protecting the right against cash entrymen and every one else of any bona fide settler or homesteader under the laws of the United States. No man, it seems to me, can fairly ask more than that.

Mr. CALL. Who was it entered these lands? Were they generally farmers or speculators?

Mr. SPOONER. I think a large portion of this land was not agricultural land. I suppose the land was entered by men interested in lumbering operations for the pine that was upon it.

Mr. CALL. Were they entered in large bodies or small?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know. I am told there were about seven hundred purchasers. Many of the purchasers reside in Wisconsin. Some of them I know, and I know them to be reputable men, men of integrity.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. Suppose the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin be adopted, in case this land was purchased at private sale and since the purchase settlers in good faith settled there with a view to homestead, would not the adoption of the amendment give the cash entryman an advantage over that settler?

Mr. SPOONER. Not in the slightest degree.

Mr. BERRY. Does it not confirm the cash entry if made prior to the time of the homestead entry?

Mr. SPOONER. My amendment expressly declares, with the amendment which I have accepted, that it shall confirm the title of the cash entryman, but not as against any bona fide settler up to 1888.

Mr. BERRY. May I ask, then, the difference between your proposition and that of the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SPOONER. The difference between the Senator from Michigan and myself is this: I have accepted an amendment to my amendment guarding and protecting the bona fide claims of settlers and homesteaders down to January 1, 1888, under the laws of the United States.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator permit me to state what the difference is?

Mr. SPOONER. I think I can state it.

Mr. PALMER. Possibly from my standpoint it might look a little different.

Mr. SPOONER. I think I can state it, and if I can not I will call the Senator from Michigan to my assistance.

The difference between the Senator from Michigan and myself is this. I having accepted his amendment protecting the bona fide claimants down to January 1, 1888, under the laws of the United States, the Senator from Michigan offers an amendment beyond that, legalizing the existing decisions of the Secretary of the Interior, whatever they may be. It is a proposition to make a law by act of Congress of existing decisions of the Secretary of the Interior. That I object to.

Mr. BERRY. May I ask the Senator, if the intention is to give preference to the cash entryman, why should he object to confirming to him directly?

Mr. SPOONER. One Secretary of the Interior may have decided homestead settlements to be bona fide and valid which another Secretary of the Interior or which a court might hold to be void. I do not want to take away from any homesteader any right which he has under the decision if the decision is good law. All I desire is that he shall be protected in every right which he has in good faith under the laws of the United States.

Mr. BERRY. But you are willing to extend that to cash entrymen without regard to the laws of the United States which you are unwilling to give to bona fide settlers.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not unwilling to give it to bona fide settlers. The amendment which I have offered distinctly and unqualifiedly gives it to bona fide settlers; but if there shall have been an erroneous decision by the Secretary of the Interior—I do not know that there has been—a decision giving to claimants who have not in fact bona fide rights in these lands as against the bona fide purchaser from the United States, I do not want the Congress of the United States to make by act that decision a law. No man has a right to claim more or further protection than that. If he has acted in good faith, his rights thereby acquired under the laws of the United States, without regard to these bona fide cash purchasers, should be protected.

The trouble is that this amendment looks as if it were drawn by some lawyer familiar with some specific decision of the Secretary of the Interior, of the correctness of which he is not certain, and which he wants the Congress of the United States to crystallize into an act. I think any Senator here would hesitate very much to declare any particular decision of a court by act of Congress to be the law, so that courts hereafter could not change it, or would feel constrained in the exercise of judicial judgment as to the power to change it.

It is not good legislative policy on the part of the United States. And no honest homesteader, no honest settler, can ask for more than that the Congress of the United States shall declare in this bill that nothing herein contained shall operate to his prejudice. That the amendment to the amendment, offered by the Senator from Michigan and accepted by me, clearly covers. Beyond that I think he asks the Senate to do what would not be right. He states fully and frankly that the Secretary of the Interior has decided that these cash entries were void, and he wants the Congress of the United States to declare, even where they do not conflict with bona fide settlers, that that decision shall stand as the law. It is because of that decision and because I believe that such decision is correct that this legislation confirming the titles of these cash entrymen, except as to bona fide settlers and homesteaders, is required.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I hardly think that the Senator from Wisconsin has stated my position fairly; he undoubtedly thought he was doing so; but my position is just this: The homesteader and the pre-emptor and the settler ask for no legislation. The infirmity of the cash entrymen arises from the fact that after the release of the lands in 1866 the law required them to be restored to market by some executive action before they could again be subject to private entry. They were never so restored; and as was held by Secretary Schurz in Eldred vs. Sexton, and by Secretary Lamar in Wakefield vs. Cutter et al., all cash entries made thereon were absolutely void. This is in the nature, if the Senate will permit me to use a legal term, of res adjudicata. The thing has been passed upon; the cash entrymen have been beaten, and now they come into Congress and ask for relief.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to interrupt the Senator to say that I think he is mistaken as to the ruling of Secretary Lamar that those entries were void. I do not remember the case, but I do remember that it was decided that they were not void, but voidable at the option of the Government.

Mr. PALMER. I would say that that makes my case all the stronger. It makes the hardships much less for the cash entrymen. Their entries are merely voidable. I accept that explanation.

Mr. BERRY. Allow me a moment. I wish the record to be correct. The decision of the Secretary of the Interior was that, so far as the private entries of the even sections were concerned, they were voidable and not confirmed by the board of equitable adjudication. So far as the odd sections were concerned, the entries were absolutely void, for the reason stated in the last decision made by Mr. Lamar.

Mr. SPOONER. I am willing to admit that so far as I am concerned.

Mr. PALMER. I think the case has been stated more generously possibly to the cash entrymen by the former Secretary of the Interior. He says they are merely voidable.

Mr. SPOONER. I am willing to admit that they were void, so far as my purposes are concerned.

Mr. PALMER. That makes the case altogether better for your side.

Mr. SPOONER. Not necessarily.

Mr. PALMER. I now take the explanation of the former Secretary of the Interior that they are merely voidable. The homesteaders have fought a long and expensive fight. They have got certain rulings; they have got certain rights established. They do not ask for any legislation. This is entirely in favor of the cash entrymen. Many of them are my friends; they are men whom I esteem very highly; but after that decision of the Supreme Court which opened these lands to the homesteader and the settler, I think we should not put them to the expense of fighting this battle over again. They went on there; they have land cleared up and homes established, and although I have no doubt that ultimately they would triumph, they want to be protected against expensive litigation. They ask no legislation. I am perfectly willing, in their behalf, to have all these amendments laid on the table.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, this discussion has taken rather a curious course. There was an amendment offered by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE] which embodied all the first portion of this amendment, and also provided for the confirmation of certain State selections, and if my recollection serves me it was laid upon the table. Now we have the same old controversy, and here is a proposition to confirm the disposition of a certain portion of the lands which were granted to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of a railroad from Ontonagon to the Wisconsin State line, and to omit to confirm a certain portion of the lands that were disposed of to the State by the General Government.

The lands disposed of were probably disposed of to pre-emption settlers, entrymen, homesteaders, settlers, who entered by warrants, it appears, and on scrip, and were sold at private entry, that is to say, cash sales. This amendment is broader, that is, it affects lands not forfeited by the bill under consideration. If the bill under consideration becomes a law, the portion of the land grant to the State of Michigan adjacent to the uncompleted road between Ontonagon and the Wisconsin State line will be forfeited. Within that line lands have been disposed of along the uncompleted road, the odd sections. Cash entries have been made. Those cash entries are illegal, first, because the lands were not public lands at the time they were made. The fee was in the State of Michigan, or in the railroad company, if there had been a transfer by the State to the company. They were also irregular or voidable, because it was held that where lands were subject to private entry before the grant was made, and then were by the Government granted to a railroad company or to the State for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad, and then forfeited and restored to the public domain, they could not be again entered at private entry until they had been reoffered at public sale. That rule applied as well to the lands between Marquette and the State line which were forfeited or properly relinquished by the State of Michigan to the General Government; and those cash entries within the limits of that grant in place were voidable also because the lands, after they had been relinquished to the General Government, were not again offered at public sale, and were not therefore subject to entry at private sale. Hence whoever introduced this amendment has drawn it so as to confirm the cash entries which were irregularly made within the limits of the grant which was properly relinquished to the Government by the State of Michigan.

Notwithstanding those entries may be voidable, I understand that in the main, if not altogether, they have been patented by the General Government to the parties who made the entries, and if so, according to a series of rulings by the Department of the Interior, they are beyond the jurisdiction of the Department, and since the time they were patented they never have been subject to settlement under the homestead or pre-emption laws, and there can not be to-day a legal pre-emption or settler's claim upon them.

Now as far as I am concerned I am quite willing to confirm all these claims, although I repeat what I said the other day, that as between the 15,000 acres that were selected by the canal company and the cash entrymen, I think that the selections for the benefit of the canal company are the most meritorious, and I am not disposed, if this old question comes up again, to vote for this amendment unless it includes all those persons who have bona fide interests there. I should have much preferred the amendment offered by me, which simply provided that these lands should be treated as public lands from the time the governor of Michigan undertook to release them to the General Government, leaving the merits of all claims as between the parties and the General Government to be determined hereafter by the Interior Department and the courts; but if Congress is to confirm these claims now, I say I do not propose to be a party by my vote to confirming them in part and leaving them unconfirmed in part.

In my opinion common honesty requires that the General Government and the State of Michigan, which treated these lands as public lands, the State of Michigan which undertook by its governor to convey these lands back to the General Government and then made these selections through its agent for the canal company, and the Secretary of the Interior, who acted for the General Government, and certified these lists to the State of Michigan—I say that common honesty requires both the State and the General Government to do what was recommended by Secretary Schurz, and has been recommended by other Secretaries of the Interior, what has been recommended by the Public Land Committee of this body frequently, to treat these lands as if they had been public lands at that date; and when the time comes I shall raise the question again by moving to strike out, in line 6, "by sales or entries, by cash, warrants, or scrip," leaving the amendment to read:

When any lands relinquished to, or from any cause resumed by, the United States from grants for railroad purposes, heretofore made to the Sate of Michigan, have heretofore been disposed of by the proper officers of the United States, under color of the public-land laws, and where the consideration received therefor is still retained by the Government—

And embrace everybody within the provision.

Mr. PALMER. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon——

Mr. DOLPH. I yield for a question.

Mr. PALMER. I want to ask whether you are now discussing the canal amendment or this amendment of mine?

Mr. DOLPH. I am discussing the entire amendment now.

If any one supposes that where the patents have been issued to the cash entrymen there can be a valid homestead or pre-emption claim, that the lands were subject to entry, that any action of the Interior Department could breathe vitality into such a claim, and that it will be protected by the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, I think he is very much mistaken.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. Suppose the Interior Department issued a patent to a part of the public domain in Oregon without any authority of law, would it confer any right?

Mr. DOLPH. No; if there was no law. If the lands did not belong to the United States, and the officer should issue a patent for the lands, it would convey no title. If there was a law that authorized these parties under any circumstances to execute a patent for these lands, and the Secretary of the Interior passed upon the fact and issued the patents, then I say that while the patents might be avoided for fraud, until they were set aside by the courts they would be a valid conveyance as between third parties.

I go further yet. Although the title may be of such a nature that the courts would say it was void and nothing passed under it, it was decided by Secretary Schurz, and has been decided by other Secretaries of the Interior, that when once a patent is issued, as for instance to swamp lands which were not swamp in fact, though the title can be set aside, the patent overcome by proof in a suit in equity that the lands are dry lands, yet wherever the patent has been issued the jurisdiction of the Interior Department is gone, and it can not offer the lands to anybody else, but the remedy must be in the courts.

I have suggested three cases in which a patent may be void or voidable, and still the jurisdiction and power of the Secretary of the Interior to dispose of the land is gone, and there can not be initiated under the rulings and law a valid adverse claim to the title which was attempted to be passed by the patent.

Mr. CALL. Then I understand the Senator to maintain that this patent, issued without authority of law by an executive officer of the United States, suspends and repeals the force and effect of the land laws authorizing the people of the United States to enter upon public lands, make their applications, and have a homestead granted; the mere fact of the issuing of a patent by an executive officer without law suspends the action of the land laws of the United States, which give to a citizen the right to enter upon the public lands, apply for a homestead, comply with the terms of the law, and obtain a patent.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator will understand that there must be some regularity in regard to the distribution of the public lands; that after the Secretary of the Interior has once acted and issued the highest evidence of title, a patent, for him to proceed afterwards to execute a second patent, or a third patent, if he should conclude that the second one was also illegal, would only be productive of the utmost confusion, and therefore it is held that after a patent has issued it has passed beyond the power of the administrative officers of the Government to inquire into its validity. It must be set aside, if at all, by a court of justice; and although it might be held void by a court, still it has been held—and I think it correct law—by several Secretaries of the Interior to divest of jurisdiction and power the Interior Department to make a further disposition of the land until that is disposed of.

Mr. CALL. I wish only to say that the proposition of the Senator from Oregon is entirely untenable and unreasonable. I shall not prejudice the case of my friend from Wisconsin. I am not speaking in regard to his amendment, but the proposition of the Senator from Oregon is in violation of law; that without law an executive officer——

Mr. DOLPH. Who is to determine whether it is in violation of law?

Mr. CALL. There is only one power to determine in cases made before them the interpretation of the law as a finalty, and that is the judicial department. In other cases the executive officer charged with the duty must determine the constitutionality of the law and the manner of its execution.

Mr. DOLPH. Does the Senator hold that one Secretary of the Interior can proceed to set aside a patent issued by a previous one and make a new grant of land?

Mr. CALL. Beyond all question. If a patent is issued in violation of an act of Congress or without authority of law, it is simply void. A patent is a paper issued evidencing the conveyance of an interest in land in accordance with and by virtue of an act of Congress, not otherwise; and if the Secretary of the Interior were to give me to-day a patent for all the lands in Oregon it would not be worth the paper on which it was written, and it would be the duty of the first Secretary of the Interior or other executive officer before whom it came to treat it as a mere waste piece of paper. It has no validity and no vitality, except by the action of the law and of the authority of Congress. A Secretary of the Interior is only an executive officer, having no power of concluding any person's rights, and that his acts have and can have no validity, except in so far as they are authorized by law; outside of this their opinions are only their personal opinions, and have no force or effect.

Mr. BERRY. As the reason why this consummation ought not to be made, if the Senate will indulge me, I will read the report of the committee of the House of Representatives made to the last Congress. It is very short, and it covers the entire case. It is as follows:

Notwithstanding the fact that none of these lands were, under this well-known principle of law, subject to private entry, yet a large number of such entries were allowed by the register at Marquette, covering over 88,000 acres of land within the limits of this grant alone, to say nothing of a much larger quantity outside of those limits, all of which entries were illegal and void ab initio under the authority cited.

It further, in respect to these entries, satisfactorily appears to your committee that they were made in violation of direct and positive instructions from the General Land Office, forbidding such disposition of the land; that these instructions were issued at intervals from 1865 to 1880; that not the slightest attention was paid to them by the local officers, who still continued to dispose of the lands at private entry, and that in this way, within the limits of the Ontonagon and State Line grant alone, there were disposed of, between 1856 and 1880, as already stated, 88,471 acres of lands, more than three-fourths of which were entered by less than thirty corporations, firms, and individuals.

These figures are compiled from the pamphlet entitled "History of the Ontonagon and State Line Railroad Grant," a document prepared by the private entry claimants themselves, and furnished the committee for use in this case.

Some of the orders, emanating from the Land Department, prohibiting these entries, read by counsel to the committee, found in their brief, with references to the official records, and uncontradicted, were as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 1430 may be taken up at the conclusion of morning business to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the bill indicated by him may be proceeded with immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent to finish reading half a page of what I was reading before the regular order was announced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Arkansas will proceed.

Mr. BERRY. The report continues:

"[Commissioner to register and receiver, July 5, 1865.]

"You will not forget that all odd-numbered sections in your district, north of township 40 and west of range 21 (including the lands in contest), were withdrawn from market by order of May 26, 1865, and hence not subject to entry, location, or claim until regularly restored to market."

"[Commissioner to register and receiver, May 29, 1873.]

"It appears from your returns that you have already allowed a number of entries of these lands without authority from this office; these will be submitted to the board for equitable adjudication, but you will not permit any further entries until the date of restoration."

"[Commissioner to register and receiver, March 1, 1879.]

"Under no circumstances will you permit any entries of any of these lands, or take any action further than herein directed, in relation thereto, until specially instructed by me."

"[Commissioner to register and receiver, August 1, 1879.]

"In disregard of the above instructions, you continued to permit entries and locations to be made upon these lands, and now report them as being in conflict with tracts listed and held for restoration by my decision of 7th March last. As I am unable to account for your action in the premises, you will please report at once, giving in full the reasons for such seeming misconduct."

"[Commissioner to register and receiver, October 12, 1880.]

"By said letter of 29th May, '73, you were directed to 'permit no further entries until the date of restoration.' Your attention is invited to said letter, and you will promptly report by what authority you have allowed entries upon lands within the limits of the withdrawal made for said railroad."

No attention whatever was paid by the local officers to these repeated orders, who, as before stated, continued to dispose of these lands, and up to October 12, 1880, had permitted entries covering over 88,000 acres of land within the limits of the railroad grant alone."

During the argument of the matter before your committee it was asserted by counsel for homestead and pre-emption settlers that most of the applications to enter were filled out in the handwriting of the then register of the Marquette office, the officer to whom the various prohibitory orders were sent; that they were frequently made on top of subsisting pre-emption and homestead claims, and that the register who allowed the most of them is now a member of a "committee of land-owners," urging the passage of the confirmatory bill and signing circulars levying assessments to aid its passage, one of which was read to your committee. Some of these allegations seemed to be sustained by the proofs.

Your committee is unable to resist the conclusion, under all the facts of the case, that not only were these private entries invalid and illegal, but that certainly, in some cases, they must have been made fraudulently and by collusion with the officers of the local land office. They are, accordingly, of opinion that an act confirming them should not be passed.

That is all I wish to present now.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him what report that is?

Mr. BERRY. That is a report made March 5, 1884, by Mr. Henley, of California, from the Committee on Public Lands. He made a subsequent report in the last Congress embodying the same ideas which I have read.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to state to the Senator that I am informed by a member of this body that the Mr. Redington, who appears to be running this amendment pretty much, informed him that he wrote that report himself.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator mean to say that Mr. Redington is running the amendment to confirm cash entries that I have offered?

Mr. DOLPH. No. He is the man who desires to prevent the confirmation of selections for the canal company, in order that the entries in which he is interested may be confirmed.

Mr. SPOONER. He is not in favor of the amendment I offered, as I understand.

Mr. DOLPH. The report read by the Senator from Arkansas was made by one majority only.

Mr. BERRY. I know Mr. Henley, of California, who made that report, to be an honorable gentleman, and a majority of the Committee on Public Lands acted with him in making it. I do not know who wrote it, but I think I may say that the men who made it made it honestly and because acting under their oaths they thought it was true.

Mr. DOLPH. I did not make such a suggestion, but I thought that was a fact which ought to be known.

Mr. PALMER. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the unfinished business is taken up, the Chair will present for reference bills from the House of Representatives.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, received from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. 3008) for the relief of P. A. Leatherbury; and

A bill (H. R. 8956) for the relief of S. B. West, administrator of Thomas Becton, deceased.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 5591) for the relief of John McFall; and

A bill (H. R. 7509) granting to the York Harbor and Beach Railroad Company a right of way.

The bill (H. R. 8965) to authorize the Postmaster-General to cancel mail contract on route No. 30100, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

OREGON LAND DISTRICT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 555) to establish an additional land district in the State of Oregon, to which it calls the attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH]. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 10 of section 1, after the word "range," the amendment is to strike out "twenty-three" and insert "twenty-four;" so as to make the section read:

That so much of the districts of lands subject to sale under existing laws at Lakeview, La Grande, and The Dalles land districts, in the State of Oregon, as are contained in the following boundaries, shall constitute a new land district, to be called the Harney land district, bounded as follows: Commencing at Snake River, in the State of Oregon, on township line between townships 12 and 13 south of second standard parallel; thence west to northeast corner of township 13 south, of range 24 east of Willamette meridian; thence due south to the southwest corner of township 29 south, of range 24 east of Willamette meridian; thence due east to the boundary line of the State of Oregon; thence north on said boundary line to the place of beginning.

Mr. DOLPH. I move that the House amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

CORRECTION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GIBSON. I submitted some remarks in the debate of Tuesday last, which were published in the RECORD without my revision. They were in some respects incorrectly reported. I ask consent of the Senate that I may correct them and republish them in the RECORD. They are not long.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair supposes the Senator from Louisiana would have the right to revise his remarks under the custom and usage of the Senate, without asking formal permission.

Mr. GIBSON. Then I shall do so.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator can have them corrected to appear in the bound RECORD as he wishes.

Mr. GIBSON. I wish them to appear also in corrected form in the daily RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that the Senator from Louisiana, under the rules, would have the right to insert a speech not delivered.

Mr. GIBSON. No, sir; I do not wish to do that. It was simply to correct a speech that was delivered, and to embody in the speech as published certain tables and figures that I stated to the Senate at the time that I would embody in the speech; but they were not printed because I did not have an opportunity to correct the report of the speech.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is under the impression that the Senator would have that right without appealing to the Senate.

Mr. GIBSON. Very well, sir. I ask that the remarks may appear again in the RECORD.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Chair understand that after a speech has been reported in the daily RECORD any Senator can have it reprinted in the daily publication in the RECORD?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not understand that to be the request of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. GIBSON. That was the request I desired to make, that the speech be reprinted as corrected, it not having been correctly reported in some respects.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, then, will submit the question to the Senate for its determination, whether the Senator from Louisiana shall have the right to correct and revise the speech delivered on Tuesday and have the same printed in the RECORD as revised and corrected.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the request of the honorable Senator—of course the Senate will grant any request he makes on the subject—to be to republish the speech as delivered.

Mr. GIBSON. As delivered.

Mr. HOAR. With the tables which were omitted from publication, and which he announced his purpose to add to the speech, but which, in fact, are not there.

Mr. GIBSON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands. If there be no objection, that consent is given as requested.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7509) granting to the York Harbor and Beach Railroad Company a right of way, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2477) granting the right of way to the Mobile and Birmingham Railway Company, the successor to the Mobile and Alabama Grand Trunk Railroad Company, across the Mount Vernon Arsenal reservation, in Mobile County, Alabama, reported it with amendments.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. PALMER as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. PALMER. When I concluded my remarks the other day I was analyzing the letter of the Commissioner of Agriculture, and I will now continue that analysis, after which I will make a few remarks which will conclude what I have to say. The Commissioner says:

I am satisfied that no bill can be devised which would more speedily or more effectively stamp out pleuro-pneumonia by any other plan than the one now in operation.

And then he contradicts himself, for he says (pages 60 and 63, report of hearings on this bill):

I think, of course, the law could be made much stronger than it is. * * * Of course, new machinery could be built up and equipped, and probably do just as good work as is being done at present.

That is all we ask. The men who framed the present law are the men who urge this bill. They know whether their first bill does the work or not, and they tell you what they know by urging this bill for their protection. The Commissioner says that "the State officers of the several States are in hearty accord with the bureau and perfectly satisfied with the work done."

If this be true, why do the governors of Nebraska and New Mexico (recently) set up their State quarantine against States in which he claims to have the disease in control? In New York and New Jersey the daily press is full of denunciations and grave charges. I sent up some clippings the other day to be read. I have enough here to take the time of the Senate all the afternoon, but the animus is shown by those read at that time.

In Kentucky, Pennsylvania, New York, and Illinois resistance has been offered to the officers. In New York, repeatedly of late, complaints have been and continue to be made, while local and county officers are vehement in complaint.

The Commissioner says that "a change in the bureau would bring in a body of new men who would be necessarily inexperienced." This bill distinctly provides for keeping all the present employés till their places are filled by others.

The Commissioner asserts that "the work of the bureau, so far, has been done in a conservative and economical way." The facts and figures furnished by himself and Dr. Salmon and others do not permit this conclusion, and I should like the Senate to give a little attention to the figures of the expenditure for the prevention and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia.

The expenses of handling the disease in New York were:

From January 1 to December 31, 1887, total expense	$30,632.49
Compensation for slaughtered animals	21,894.66
Miscellaneous expenses	156.95
Traveling expenses	2,544.03
Salaries	6,036.35
	30,631.99

Salaries one-fifth of the whole.

Traveling expenses one-fifteenth of the whole.

Salaries and traveling expenses four-fifteenths of the whole.

A showing of the figures for the time from January 1, 1887, to date, will present a very much more unsatisfactory condition of things. The expense of handling the disease in New Jersey from January 1 to December 3, 1887, was as follows:

Total expense	$12,146.03
Compensation for slaughtered animals	5,491.00
Miscellaneous expenses	199.33
Traveling expenses	1,813.43
Salaries	4,642.27

Salaries one-fourth of the whole.

Traveling expenses about one-sixth of the whole.

Salaries and traveling expenses more than one-half of the whole.

A later showing will be much worse.

The expense of handling the disease in Maryland was, from January 1 to December 31, 1887—

Total expense	$105,883.81
Compensation for slaughtered animals	75,156.72
Miscellaneous expenses	1,170.16
Traveling expenses	9,430.49
Salaries	20,126.44

Salaries about one-fifth of the whole.

Traveling expenses about one-twelfth of the whole.

Salaries and traveling expenses nearly one-third of the whole.

The expenses of handling the disease in Illinois were, from September 1 (only) to December 31, 1887:

Total expense	$73,991.96
Compensation for slaughtered cattle	17,332.74
Miscellaneous expenses	3,952.52
Travel expenses	3,598.99
Salaries, etc	49,107.71

Out of $73,991, $49,107 was spent for salaries, two-thirds of the whole. The salaries and traveling expenses were over two-thirds of all. This may be conservative and economical, but it does not have that appearance.

If, as the Commissioner asserts, "the cost has been far less than was anticipated," those anticipations must have been wild. The contrast between the cost of the same work at the hands of the bureau and of the Illinois live-stock board is startling. (See Report of Hearings, page 34.)

From December 4, 1886, to February 1, 1887, 56 days, with 20 men, the bureau quarantined 1,217 cattle in 367 stables, at a cost of $3,300, or $2.75 for each animal quarantined. From February 1, with 14 men, in 35 days the Illinois live-stock board quarantined 10,192 head of cattle, in over 7,000 stables, at a cost of less than 10 cents per head. Ten cents against $2.75 per head.

The Commissioner lays much stress upon the importance of scientific skill in the work of the bureau. No one questions its value for scientific work for determining disease and for determining all scientific points. But the detail work of suppressing disease, and matters of transportation, quarantine, export trade, etc., are executive, practical, and business matters, for which the scientific man is, in fact, not only untaught but unfit. They constitute by far the greater and more financial features of the duty of such a bureau. The bill provides for the happy combination of these respective abilities.

The Commissioner claims that it "has been almost universally admitted that executive work requires one head and one responsibility," etc. The facts do not corroborate this statement, especially as to this class of work. In every State but one having officers to take charge of live-stock diseases there is a commission of three or more. Maine, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Hampshire, Illinois, Maryland, and others all have them, while in others the State boards of health are so commissioned.

Under the General Government the same principle has been recognized in the Interstate, Civil Service, Treasury, Cattle, District of Columbia, Congressional Library, and other commissions, the Light-House, Coast Survey, Soldiers' Home, Fisheries, and other boards, and by appointment of Deputy Commissioners in the Patent, Pension, and other bureaus.

Invariably the best results have been obtained from such commissions, while in New York, Pennsylvania, and other States where a single executive had had charge of cattle diseases the results have been wholly unsatisfactory.

The Commissioner, with strange interpretation of the word "stock-growers," concludes that their recognition on the board is class legislation. Every farmer, breeder, feeder, or raiser of range, dairy, or draft cattle (horned or not) is a stock-grower. Every hog, mule, sheep, horse or goat raiser is a stock-grower.

Neither does "stock-grower" by any possible construction mean only one class of cattle-grower, as the Commissioner so queerly concludes. All classes of cattle-growers, dairyman, beef-producer, breeder, or feeder, are stock-growers.

But the bill says "cattle-growers." Why? Because the great threatening diseases that demand this law and which are paralyzing the traffic are cattle diseases; pleuro-pneumonia, tuberculosis, and foot-and-mouth diseases are our present chief concern.

No one objects to a dairyman in the commission. He is a practical cattle-grower. The cattlemen have immense values at stake.

The objections raised by the Commissioner to the creation of crimes, etc., by regulations of the proposed board, and to vesting the appointing power of subordinates in the board (except in emergency) no longer exist, having been removed by amendment.

Mr. President, a great many petitions and remonstrances have been sent in against the proposed legislation on this pleuro-pneumonia bill, and they generally come in the same shape. They are probably inspired by one hand. I have seen some thousands of them, and I am going to present a lot now from my own State; and each one reads thus:

We, the undersigned, your petitioners, citizens and voters in the town of Chandler, county of Huron, State of Michigan, respectfully demand:

1. That the work for the eradication of pleuro-pneumonia shall be continued under the Bureau of Animal Industry as at present organized.

I do not suppose there is a man in the State of Michigan who knows how the Bureau of Animal Industry is organized, unless it is myself. I have studied it somewhat, and on that account know a little about it.

2. That the law establishing this bureau be strengthened without changing the plan of work now in operation.

I do not believe the signers of the petition know what the plan of operation is.

3. That the Bureau of Animal Industry shall be allowed to remain in the Department of Agriculture, with a chief, who shall be a competent veterinary surgeon, and who shall report to the Commissioner of Agriculture, and that no board or commission shall be given any authority or control over this bureau, or the work which it is now performing.

I imagine that all of these memorials are inspired by one hand. I understand they are voted on and adopted in the different granges in the various States. That may be right, but I believe it does not represent the views of the signers.

The Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] introduced some resolutions when this bill was last up for discussion, from some society in New York, the State Agricultural Society, I think, which were hostile to the bill. I now send to the desk a letter which indicates how that hostile action was procured.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

BATAVIA, N. Y., April 16, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 13th instant is at hand. The action of the executive committee of the State Agricultural Society to which you refer was taken, as you suppose, upon representations made before it by Col. F. D. Curtis. In the absence of any opposing arguments the resolutions proposed passed unanimously. In justice to myself, and I have no doubt to other members of the committee similarly situated, I will say that I had not previously seen the full text of the Palmer bill, and it was of course impossible, with the light given us on the subject at the meeting, to fully study the subject. Our action was taken with the belief that we were warranted in the confidence given the representations made by Colonel Curtis.

Since the receipt of your letter I have quite carefully studied the subject and the copy of the bill before me, as well as other matter relating to it, and am entirely free to say that I now believe the action taken hasty and illy considered. I believe the subject should be again brought before the executive committee, of which you are now a member in place of C. C. B. Walker, deceased, and properly considered. Another meeting of the committee will be called soon to consider the question of the Syracuse location, on the report of a subcommittee, and I very much hope to see you at that time. This whole question as treated in the Palmer bill is too important to be passed over lightly, as I fear it has been, and representations which you could make, coming directly from the seat of war, would have great weight with the commission.

Hoping to hear from you again, I remain, yours truly,

FRANK D. REDFIELD.

Mr. F. C. STEVENS,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Secretary now read between the brackets in the paper I send up to the desk?

The Secretary read as follows:

It is reported that Commissioner Colman has taken an active hand against your bill through one of his employés, Col. Frank D. Curtis, who has been very active in the farmer institutes in the State in creating a prejudice against your bill. I do not know who inspires him, but I do know he has been very active and very decided in his opposition. I am informed that it was through his influence that the executive committee of the State Agricultural Society took action against you.

Mr. PALMER. I will state that Mr. F. D. Curtis stands on the Blue Book as an employé, a statistician, I believe, in the Agricultural Department, with a salary of $1,200 a year. Here is the official reply of the Consolidated Cattle-Growers' Association of the United States to the resolutions of the executive committee of the State Agricultural Society of New York. I send it to the desk to be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEAR SIR: We beg your indulgence to enter an emphatic denial against certain insinuations brought forward in the course of the recent Senate debate upon the new pleuro-pneumonia bill.

A determined effort, it seems, is being made by parties whose interest in this whole subject is of a very recent and altogether doubtful character to discredit this bill, more especially among Senators representing States having extensive dairy interests, on the ground that the Consolidated Cattle-Growers' Association, which is asking this legislation in the name of the organized cattle-growers of the country, is being made the tool of the so-called stock-yard and oleomargarine interest.

The utter falsity of any such insinuation is so apparent to any one knowing even a little concerning the affairs of this association, that we have not deemed it necessary to enter any formal protest against such baseless allegations; but inasmuch as the late action of a committee of the New York State Board of Agriculture, cited by Senator HISCOCK, may be regarded as giving color of truth to such a charge, we desire to say that the allegation has not even the shadow of a foundation in truth to rest upon, and is as wholly false and misleading as it is malicious in conception; as our Albany friends could have easily ascertained had they sought information concerning the matter from those who have some slight acquaintance with the history of the National Association, the make-up of its managing board, and with the sentiments of the great dairy-cattle-breeders' organizations, which we have the honor to represent. Our only regret in connection with their action is that the members of said committee, having no personal knowledge of the truth or falsity of such evidence as may have been placed before them, should upon a hearing, entirely ex parte in its nature, have allowed designing parties to so play upon their natural prejudices in the oleomargarine matter, at the expense of an organization which has the interests of cattle-growers in the dairy regions of the country quite as much at heart as those of the ranch-owners of the far West.

In the first place, the "make-up" of this association is such as to absolutely preclude it from participating in any way, shape, form, or manner in factional disputes between the beef and dairy interests, or from taking any action or following up any policy inimical to the interests of a large and influential body of its membership. Its official board is as evenly balanced between the beef and dairy interests as it is possible to attain, and the stenographic records of all its association and executive committee meetings show that no position at any time has ever been taken or even recommended with reference to oleomargarine except one of strict neutrality; and this position it has throughout this whole matter faithfully maintained. Recruited, therefore, as our ranks necessarily are in about equal number from members of both parties to the "oleo" controversy, it happens that some of those identified closely with our work hold very pronounced individual opinions upon that much-discussed question, some for and others against, and we do not doubt they have at times freely expressed themselves according as their individual opinions have dictated, but we submit that we are no more to be held responsible for the private views of the members of our committees upon "oleo" or the tariff than for their personal opinions upon the equally controverted point as to "who struck Billy Patterson." Suffice it to say that no man as a representative of this association has ever been authorized to ask for but one thing at the National Capitol, and that is the enactment of an efficient law dealing with contagious diseases of farm animals.

Furthermore, any statements or insinuations that the so-called "oleo" syndicate is furnishing the funds to defray the only outlay we have in this matter, the traveling expenses and hotel bills of some of our members to make proper representations upon this subject to your honorable body, are baseless and malicious fabrications. A tithe of an unexpended balance in our treasurer's hands November 1, 1887, was contributed by the people interested in the cattle business at the Chicago yards; but since the present bill was draughted by your honorable committee they have neither contributed a dollar to our cause nor turned their hands over, so far as we are aware, in support of the pending bill. In fact, as a matter of common knowledge, at our late national convention the Chicago Live-Stock Exchange came out "flat-footed" in behalf of the Bureau of Animal Industry as it is; so that if any odium is to attach to affiliation with them at this juncture, it lies at the door of the opponents of the new and advanced legislation we now seek.

It may be remembered, by the way, that both this exchange and the Texas rangemen have opposed every fresh grant of power asked by this national association of Congress in relation to this whole subject, a statement which may assist somewhat in sounding the real depth of their present position.

Permit us to quote also, for the information of those who are endeavoring to poison the minds of the friends of the dairy interest against the bill, the following resolution, passed since the measure was finally amended and reported to the Senate, by the Holstein-Frisian Cattle Breeders' Association of America, at its meeting just held at Buffalo, N. Y.:

"Resolved, That we, the members of the Holstein-Frisian Association of America, are heartily in sympathy with the bill known as the Palmer bill (S. 2083) and firmly believe that its passage will greatly aid in the speedy extirpation of all contagious animal diseases in this country."

Now, it happens that this great organization of dairy cattle breeders has three of its most intelligent men upon the executive board of the consolidated association, namely, Messrs. F. C. Stevens, of New York; Thomas B. Wales, of Iowa, and Col. William M. Liggitt, of Minnesota, and as they are therefore familiar with the management of our organization, the unqualified indorsement above given by their own association may be claimed to represent the sentiment of dairy-cattle men about as accurately as any resolutions of a committee of a State agricultural board. If additional citation of sentiment upon this point is required, however, it is found in the following public declaration recently made by Maj. Henry E. Alvord, of the American Jersey Cattle Club, than whom no man stands higher as a steadfast champion of dairy interests:

"From first to last the members of the legislative committee of the Consolidated Cattle Growers' Association which have visited Washington for several successive years have individually and collectively labored honestly and earnestly, without compensation or the hope of reward other than the satisfactory results of the legislation sought, to serve the common interests of all owners of American neat cattle. And these committeemen have in no way, jointly or severally, acted to the prejudice of the interests of any cattle-owners or class of cattle-owners. Consequently, knowing well whereof I speak, I declare to be absolutely false and without foundation the assertions and insinuations that the Cattle Growers' Association and its Washington committeemen are influenced by or working in the interest of "the Chicago beef clique" and "the stock-yards people" any more than all other cattle interests of the country. The allegations that such committees have been unfriendly to the Department of Agriculture and to legislation favorable to the dairy interests are untrue, and when persisted in are maliciously mischievous, because they directly mislead and tend to cause dairymen and others to distrust those who are really their true and useful friends."

In conclusion we would merely say we hope that the Congress of the United States in considering this question will not be unmindful of the fact that but one association of cattle-growers in the United States declines to indorse this bill, and, as above intimated, that one has always opposed every law that has been proposed with reference to this subject, although now claiming to have experienced a change of heart with reference to the existing one which they fought in Congress to the bitter end.

Another class that interested parties are seeking to marshal against the bill is the Grange organization in different States. We suppose bodies having a membership composed of all classes of country people (ladies included) has as good a right to petition Congress as any other, but the men who have their all at stake in the cattle business, the organized cattle-growers of the nation, in short, have probably given this subject as much serious consideration and have about as much at stake as any other class of your constituents, and they hope and have faith that Congress will therefore recognize the justice and propriety of their being allowed to participate in the administration of a law which is of such vital concern to them as provided for in the bill now up for consideration.

W. A. TOWERS, President.
ALVIN H. SANDERS,
Secretary Consolidated Cattle-Growers' Association of the United States.

Hon. T. W. PALMER,
Chairman Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. PALMER. I am merely having these documents read to show the animus of the opposition. Here is a letter from Mr. R. G. Head, of Denver, to show how it has been inspired and operated. It has been machine work, I think, all the way through. I ask for the reading of that part which I have marked.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

I trust that your committee will use better discretion than to give credence to the "flaming" reports, or so-called resolutions purporting to be the expressions of large gatherings of Texas cattle-men. It is all most ridiculous bosh and is merely the agitation created by well-known agents of the present Bureau of Animal Industry and probably effected through careless use of funds from Washington, the paying for Associated Press dispatches, lengthy (Government rate) telegrams, traveling expenses, etc., all of which no doubt is done.

It is a moral fact that the cattle-men of Texas possess ordinarily as much good common sense as those of other sections, and such reports as I have referred to should not be accepted inadvisably as emanating from them. No feeling of unkindness, I believe, whatever exists between the cattle-men of Texas and those of other sections, and the schemes of the Bureau of Animal Industry through its efforts to create such unpardonable wrong impressions is the most outrageous conduct to which a man in high place could reasonably be guilty of.

Mr. PALMER. I now send up some extracts from Western papers, which will be the last extracts I shall call for.

Mr. PLUMB. Is it necessary to have those read?

Mr. PALMER. Not unless the Senate would like to hear them.

Mr. PLUMB. I think not.

Mr. PALMER. Well, let them appear in the RECORD, with the consent of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHACE in the chair). If there be no objection, the extracts will be printed in the RECORD.

The extracts are as follows:

Opposition to the measure on Western ranges is confined to agents of the bureau and their personal influence. These gentlemen are making a mistake. They are paid for promoting stock interests, and they must be aware that it is preposterous for them to assume that the Consolidated Cattle Growers' Association is not the safest counselor on this question. Neither are they right in supposing that the proposed measure will interfere in other respects with the bureau or necessarily cost them their places. They ought to be foremost in advocating a law which will be worth so much to all cattle interests.

The Fort Worth Gazette of February 28 reports a meeting of stockmen which illustrates the kind of drumming referred to. A lot of resolutions were adopted assailing the Consolidated Cattle Growers' Association and opposing the passage of the bill protecting the country against contagious disease. The speakers were two agents of the Bureau of Animal Industry. This is explanation enough. No cattle-grower should be deceived by such meditated clap-trap. The association which is asking Congress to pass this important measure is composed of the most intelligent stock owners in the country, including full representation from the ranges. They can have no motive but a desire to save the nation from a great peril.—Denver (Col.) News, March 28, 1888.

The Live Stock Indicator, of Kansas City, a paper of wide influence among stockmen, says:

"There seems to be considerable of an effort being made in certain quarters looking to the defeat of the bill now before Congress amending the Bureau of Animal Industry measure, and it is to be hoped that the International Range Association as a body will effectually sit down upon all such efforts. Range cattle owners are most deeply interested in the suppression of contagious diseases, because should they ever get a foothold upon the range, it will be found almost absolutely impossible to stamp them out. For several years we have been trying to secure a law that will effectually stamp out contagious diseases wherever they appear, and the Bureau of Animal Industry has had the matter in hand long enough to have succeeded had the law under which they worked been efficient. That body has, however, a host of paid agents, many of whom will be at the range convention, and naturally they are desirous of holding onto their places, regardless of the interests of stockmen generally."

The opposition to this important legislation, which is referred to in the Indicator, may be traced exclusively to the active efforts of the Animal Bureau. Under the present arrangement there is fat picking in return for no beneficial service, and it suits the men employed. They have good pay and traveling expenses, with nothing to do but lobby about stock meetings and conventions for one little job or another. They have improved their opportunity to the utmost. They have managed and molded half a dozen stock meetings in Texas, and, by the most inexcusable perversion of truth, they have deceived cattle-men and influenced the passage of resolutions suicidal to the best interests of the industry.

The only opposition known to exist in the West has been worked up by paid agents of the Bureau of Animal Industry. The News reported a meeting at Fort Worth recently which is a type of others. It was gotten up by two of these agents, and the two agents were the speakers. Presumably they are receiving $10 a day and traveling expenses for doing Government work. Their interest in these clap-trap meetings is to save their places. Yet they are themselves deceived as they are deceiving others in regard to the proposed measure. Instead of affecting the Bureau of Animal Industry injuriously, the bill proposes to reorganize that body on an effective and useful basis. The bureau will continue and there will doubtless still be men in its employ to attend meetings and conventions at a stiff salary, but ostensibly to protect cattle from disease.

These agents are not doing fair work in the premises. They are deceiving cattle-men in their statement of the case. For instance, Texans are falsely told that the Consolidated Cattle Growers' Association and its legislative committee, now at Washington in the interest of all stockmen, are unfriendly to Texas, and are "the same men who, under the pretext of disease, have sought to shut out healthy Texas cattle from the markets of the country for mischievous purposes and who are mainly responsible for the blockade at Camp Supply three years ago."

The circulation of such stuff as this about an association representing the entire country, including every State and Territory in the range, with a membership owning $800,000,000 in live-stock, is hardly the work that these ten-dollar men are paid by the Government for doing. The valuable service rendered by the Bureau of Animal Industry will be cheerfully recognized by stock-owners, but all will agree that such inexcusable misrepresentations, calculated to excite sectional hostility among cattle-men, is not a legitimate part of the bureau's work.

Some features of the present bureau have disgusted Western cattle-owners beyond measure, and its reorganization upon a business basis will be approved. The paid agents of this branch of Government service have been mainly identified with stock meetings and conventions in the interest of jobberies of one kind or another. They were at both of the Denver cattle conventions, with lobby work. Last year they were enlisted for a scheme designed to impose on the convention and to entrap individual members. Its real character became known, and honest men prevented it from even coming to the surface. Some of these persons, figuring at the Government's expense, are now trying to manufacture a sectional feeling in Texas against the proposed cattle legislation through fear of losing their places under the new law. They have procured the passage of resolutions in some stock meetings upon a statement of the case that is shamelessly untrue. The worst feature of their mischievous meddling is that it tends to create a hostile feeling among men whose interests are identical, and who should be harmoniously united.—Denver News, March 12.

Mr. PALMER. I have now got through with my presentation of the bill for the reorganization of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

If legislation was to be had in the face of as great a danger as we experienced last winter Senators would tumble over each other in their haste to vote for it. Then we had the most radical and grasping bill and the most extraordinary, if not the most unconstitutional, bill presented to the Senate that I have ever seen; and notwithstanding that I think it passed by a vote of 31 to 19. That was in the face of the great emergency existing in Chicago. Now it does not rain and we think our house does not need mending, but the time is coming when some bill giving full powers to the Bureau of Animal Industry will be required, when a reorganization will be demanded, and when a commission will be called for; how soon I do not know. But at present all the practical work that they are doing is under legislation in a clause in an appropriation bill—all the powers that they have to co-operate with the States and spend money for the purchase of cattle.

Here is an interest representing $2,400,000,000, which furnishes $103,000,000 annually of our exportations, and the exportations of that kind would be much larger but for the fact that they are tabooed and proscribed on the other side of the water on account of the diseases among our swine and our cattle. Here is a new disease threatening the existence of our horses; and still the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry has devoted but one page to swine and the balance to pleuro-pneumonia.

I imagine that by the organization of a commission and defining their powers great economy can be conserved, and that this work can be taken in hand and in a very short time these diseases, not only pleuro-pneumonia, but tuberculosis can be extirpated; but if we let it run till another exigency arises we shall be without the means of accomplishing anything, and then this bill or some more radical one will be called for.

I hope, Mr. President, that the bill may pass. If it does not, I shall feel that I have acquitted myself, at the expense of the Senate, of my duty. It has been a long, tedious, and rather an oppressive explanation, but you have got all I know on the subject, and it will make very tolerable reading if you do not concur in all my views.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to enter into any discussion or controversies of a personal character with regard to the Commissioner of Agriculture. He is a very honorable citizen of my State. He is my constituent, who occupied a high position there before he was appointed Commissioner of Agriculture, and as a man of integrity and sound judgment he has no superior, in my belief, in that Commonwealth. All I can say about him is that from my knowledge, and rather an intimate knowledge——

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. I did not hear the first of the Senator's remarks. Did he claim that I made any charges against the Commissioner? I have been very careful to refrain from any personalities.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course, I did not understand the Senator to make any personal charges, but the matter which was read from the Secretary's desk did reflect upon the Commissioner.

Mr. PALMER. Inferences might be drawn, but I do not wish to father any charges against him, for personally I like him very much, and regard him as my friend.

Mr. VEST. I am simply speaking with regard to what was read at the desk which did reflect upon the Commissioner of Agriculture, and which, if one-tenth of it be true, ought to hurl him from public life a disgraced and dishonored man. If he has used his official position for a personal purpose, to defeat legislation or advance it here, he is unworthy to be a messenger, much less to be the head of this great Department or in charge of a bureau like a Department. I do not believe he is capable of it.

My State is largely interested in this matter, and no personal consideration would induce me to hazard this great interest or any portion of it, and my course would not be changed if the person who is involved in this discussion, against whom these charges are made, were my own brother. I speak here now as a Senator from the State of Missouri, and I announce that my only object in any vote that I shall give or in any statement that I shall make here is to protect the cattle interest throughout the United States, and especially in the great Northwest, where the largest portion of it is found.

Mr. President, I have been diligent in searching for the truth all through this labyrinth of literature and of speech, and the first question is, do we need any additional legislation? Is there any such emergency, any such overwhelming danger to the cattle interest of this country as demands the bill now before the Senate? In order to arrive at the truth I did not know any source from which it could be obtained more readily than from the Commissioner of Agriculture himself. In view of the statements made here at the beginning of this debate—I will not undertake to say how many days ago—to the effect that there was a great increase of pleuro-pneumonia and of cattle disease through the country, I addressed him a communication, which I ask the Secretary to read, together with his reply. He is either unworthy of credence as a man or trust as an officer if there is any necessity for this bill at all.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 5, 1888.

SIR: During the debate on the pleuro-pneumonia bill in the Senate to-day it was positively stated that "there is more pleuro-pneumonia in the country to-day than there ever has been," and also that "pleuro-pneumonia has now got beyond the Alleghanies and that it bids fair to get across the Mississippi." Will you kindly give me such information as may be in your possession showing the accuracy or inaccuracy of these statements?

Very respectfully,

G. G. VEST.

Hon. NORMAN J. COLMAN,
Commissioner of Agriculture.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
COMMISSIONER'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 6, 1888.

SIR: Your letter of inquiry has been received asking as to what information I have in regard to the correctness of the following statements made in the Senate, first, that "there is more pleuro-pneumonia in the country to-day than there ever has been," and, second, "that now pleuro-pneumonia has got beyond the Alleghanies and that it bids fair to get across the Mississippi." In reply I would refer you to my report to Congress (Senate Ex. Doc. No. 69, page 29), in which I have shown that this Department has succeeded in eradicating all pleuro-pneumonia known to exist in any part of the United States outside of the States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, with the exception of one herd in Connecticut and one in Virginia which have since been slaughtered, and that the spread of the disease has been controlled in these States, and that the infected centers are now held in rigid quarantine so that there is no danger of its spreading to other parts of the country. I have no knowledge that there exists to-day any pleuro-pneumonia outside of the States above named. Pleuro-pneumonia did exist in the county of Cook, Illinois, and the outbreak there was quite extensive, but it has been completely eradicated, and the quarantine restrictions placed on that county were removed on the 1st day of April of the present year. In the State of Pennsylvania but three herds are known to be infected, and as the agreement for co-operation goes into effect on Monday, April 9, these will be at once slaughtered.

This Department receives almost constantly reports of the breaking out of supposed pleuro-pneumonia in various sections of the country. It is an invariable rule to at once dispatch an experienced veterinarian to investigate the alleged existence of the disease. We almost invariably find that it is a false rumor and that the disease is of a different kind from the one reported to us. The farmers of the country are in such terror of pleuro-pneumonia that whenever their cattle die from causes unknown to them they immediately suspect it to be contagious pleuro-pneumonia and call on us for help. Not long since there appeared in the public prints positive statements that pleuro-pneumonia had appeared at New Castle, Ind. Veterinarians from that place forwarded lungs of animals killed, which they diagnosed as showing pleuro-pneumonia. It was decided on an inspection of the lungs by the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry that it was not that disease, and he so informed these veterinarians. Rumors, however, continued to pour in, positively asserting that pleuro-pneumonia was at New Castle, and a telegram was received from the State veterinarian of Ohio stating that the disease there was in fact pleuro-pneumonia. The chief of the bureau, personally, went to New Castle, and in the presence of a number of veterinarians and officials of that State examined the suspected herd, and slaughtered and held post-mortem examinations on animals selected by the parties present as showing signs of disease, and satisfied them that the disease did not exist.

A statement was made in the Senate not long since that pleuro-pneumonia had broken out at Cincinnati, Ohio. A telegram was immediately forwarded to the State veterinarian asking if this statement was correct. The reply was in the negative, and I inclose it for your consideration.

Permit me to say that if there are any parties who are in possession of facts or knowledge from which they suppose pleuro-pneumonia to exist in any section of the country, they are certainly derelict in their duty to the cattle interest of the country not to bring such facts to the notice of this Department in order that we may investigate as to their truthfulness, and, if the disease is found, eradicate it. At present writing we have no reports or information of any kind that there is any pleuro-pneumonia in any place other than those I have named.

Very respectfully,

NORMAN J. COLMAN,
Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from Missouri yield a moment till I present some petitions?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. I present petitions which are indorsed upon the back, "Against the so called Palmer bill." I intended to present them when I made my remarks on their character.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The petitions will be received and laid on the table.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I can not support this bill, and I do not propose making any elaborate argument against it, but in my judgment it is unconstitutional. No legislation that we have ever adopted here, or attempted to adopt, goes further than or as far as this pending bill. I recollect there was a bill introduced by a Democratic friend a few years ago—I can not say exactly how long, but in 1884, I am told it was—when the Senator from Kansas introduced a resolution making an appropriation of some thousands of dollars on account of foot-and-mouth disease of cattle in the State of Kansas. That resolution, about which I was so much criticised for having supported it, simply went to the extent of appropriating money to meet disease in the State of Kansas, with the consent and co-operation of the State authorities; and so with the general statute which I have before me now on the subject of pleuro-pneumonia and cattle disease, and of which this bill is pretended to be amendatory and a substitute for. That statute provides that the rules and regulations for the extirpation of cattle disease shall be submitted by the Commissioner of Agriculture to the authorities of the respective States for their co-operation.

But here is a bill that authorizes this so-called board of commissioners to go into any State and determine the question for themselves whether cattle shall be withheld from transportation or not, no matter what may be the intent on the part of the owner. They act without appeal, arbitrarily order his cattle to be killed, appraise them without his being heard in regard to their value. Such a measure in the way of arbitrary and dictatorial action has never been presented to the Congress of the United States.

If this bill be enacted, there is not a man in a single State in this Union who would be safe from the operations of this board if they came to the conclusion that his cattle had been exposed to disease, or had what is called a disease. He is not heard from. They simply go into the State, in defiance of the governor and of the Legislature, hearing from some irresponsible traveling vagrant, perhaps, that a man is buying cattle that he intends to send to the Chicago market. They meet when they please, give him no notice, and then kill his cattle and pay him what they suppose to be their value, without regard to any evidence.

I submit that there is much involved in the bill outside of what appears on the face. I undertake to say that of all the abuses that ever have existed in the shape of monopolies, in the shape of unjust exactions off the producer, the worst is that which exists in regard to cattle. I live in a city which is the second largest cattle market in the world, next to Chicago, and those of us who understand the operations of the cattle syndicate to-day know that we are helpless and writhing under the most terrible monopoly commercially that ever has existed on this continent. There are five men in the city of Chicago, or five firms, who regulate the price of cattle every day. They meet each night and fix the price for the next day. The farmer of Missouri who has cattle to ship starts to market when the quotations represent that beef is worth 3 cents to 3¼ cents per pound. He reaches Chicago and finds that the syndicate has put beef down the next day, when his cattle get there, to 2½ cents. He can not store his cattle as he could wheat or barley or rye or oats or cotton; he can not wait, and the result is that he must sell; he is coerced to sell. He goes to Armour and he is told, "Cattle are worth 2½ cents per pound;" he goes to another—"2½ cents a pound;" he is met all over the city with the unvarying response, "2½ cents a pound," and he must take it. They hold his property and confiscate his property as absolutely as if they possessed the right to take it from off his farm without paying him one cent.

Mr. President, you may talk about trusts, you may talk about pools; the cattle pool of Chicago is the most infamous tyranny that ever existed in the United States, and they have got that power to-day over the cattle producers, and I know no remedy for it. The statesmen who will invent one will deserve a monument more enduring than this Capitol. He would perform the greatest benefaction that has ever been done for the people of the Northwest.

I propose, without elaborating my views, to offer an amendment, to come in at the end of section 2. I do not care to say anything more about the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That the owner of such cattle, or person having charge of the same, shall have reasonable notice of the time and place when and where the appraisement will be made, and shall be permitted to make proof as to the value of said cattle: And provided further, That said board, its agents and servants, shall have no authority to exercise any of the powers hereby granted within the limits of any State without first obtaining the consent of the executive authority of said State therefor.

[Mr. PLUMB withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I do not think it necessary that I should undertake to add anything to what has been said by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and by other Senators in regard to the importance of the interest which is involved in the legislation now proposed. There is probably hardly any material interest in this country of greater consequence than that which will be affected by this legislation.

I wish to call attention specifically to the existing legislation, to the means which now exist for the extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and the other contagious diseases which are embraced in the scope of this proposed act, in order that the Senate may see distinctly how inadequate those means are to meet emergencies which exist and which must inevitably arise hereafter.

I wish to call attention to the fact that whatever has been accomplished hitherto in the removal of these diseases, in their suppression and extirpation, has not been accomplished by virtue of the power of any existing enactments, but in consequence of other arrangements which have been made, the result of which has conferred upon the joint executive power of the nation and of the States the very power which it is indispensable, as I think, that the nation should be able to exercise when the emergency arises.

The act of May 29, 1884, in section 3, defines the power which may be exercised by national authority, and it is as follows:

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the speedy and effectual suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and to certify such rules and regulations to the executive authority of each State and Territory, and invite said authorities to co-operate in the execution and enforcement of this act. Whenever the plans and methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be accepted by any State or Territory in which pleuro-pneumonia or other contagious, infectious, or communicable disease is declared to exist, or such State or Territory shall have adopted plans and methods for the suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and such plans and methods shall be accepted by the Commissioner of Agriculture, and whenever the governor of a State or other properly constituted authorities signify their readiness to co-operate for the extinction of any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease in conformity with the provisions of this act, the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations, and in such disinfection and quarantine measures as may be necessary to prevent the spread of the disease from one State or Territory into another.

There are other provisions which are to be made operative within the States and as between the States whenever there is that co-operation and consent mutually given between the State and the national authority as will enable them jointly to assume jurisdiction of and to extirpate this disease.

The act confers upon the Commissioner of Agriculture increased power to these ends in the District of Columbia and in the Territories, but the great evil exists, of course, in the States; and with reference to the control of disease in the States and its spread as between the States under existing legislation there is no national regulation upon the subject conferring power except as it may be exercised in connection with the assent of the States themselves.

By an appropriation act of the year 1887 a certain amount of money was appropriated to be expended by the Commissioner of Agriculture in the removal of the disease, in the prevention of its spread, and for the protection of our foreign and domestic commercial interests whenever this conjoint feature of operation and exercise of power can be produced and may be necessary by reason of the existence of the disease.

That, I think, is a fair statement, or at least it is a statement as I understand it to be, of the existing national legislation and of the existing legal forces, both State and national, which may be exercised for the control of this great danger to this important interest of our country.

I am not one of those who care to see any legislation enacted which shall disregard the rights of private property or in any way disregard the forces and power of the States in the defense of the individual rights of the citizens resident therein; but I desire to see upon the statute-book of the country legislation which will enable the national forces, the national power, to protect interstate commerce and commerce with foreign countries so far as this interest is concerned, and I think that it is due to the property of the citizens of the States and of the United States and of the community of this great interest that such legislation should be provided.

Under existing law we have given to the Commissioner of Agriculture the power to expend the money of the nation in compensation of the loss which results from the disease, and it is only by virtue, I may say, of that power of appropriation of money to prevent the loss to individuals whose animals may be diseased, it is only by reason of the fact that we have provided the means of paying the bills, that the legislation of the country has been of any consequence hitherto. Upon this point there is no difference of testimony, as I understand. As a member of the Committee on Agriculture I listened to the statements of nearly all the witnesses, including the Commissioner of Agriculture himself, to whom I propounded questions upon this very point.

The existing legislation, as Senators will remember, grew out of the fact that this disease prevailed with great virulence in Chicago and with somewhat of virulence in some other portions of the country; but it was most destructive in Chicago. The Commissioner of Agriculture informed us that, called upon as he was to exercise such powers as he had, he found it utterly impossible to do so, and for the nonce there was a wrangle between the authority of the Government beseeching for the opportunity to go there and pay out the money of this nation, in order to remove this disease, and the authorities of the State, on the other hand, who refused such co-operation. The result was that the disease continued; that it spread everywhere; that this great interest became actually in danger, if not of extirpation, at least of such serious and protracted destruction or prostration as to throw into great difficulty the pecuniary interests and the industrial interests of the entire country, for we all understand when a great interest, approaching nearly $2,000,000,000, is deranged, practically destroyed, how all the other interests of the country must suffer with it.

So it has been demonstrated that the existing legislation is entirely incompetent to manage and to eradicate this difficulty when there fails to be such a consensus of will between the different legislative authorities of the country as is necessary to the full and the free exercise of the complete power.

The bill addresses itself to this primary difficulty, and it confers upon the Commissioner of Agriculture, as the representative of national power, and the commission which is organized in his Department and under his control, the power, so far as the great, broad national interest of interstate and foreign commerce is concerned and affected by these diseases, to seize upon and to eradicate the diseases so far as they can be subjected by the forces of the nation or of the nation and State combined. That is to my mind the main excellence of this bill.

The commission itself I do not think to be in its organization open to objection. The Senator from Kansas spoke of the suspicion that in its organization it might be affected by the great "combine" to which he alludes. I have not myself come in contact with that power. I doubt not that it exists, and that it affects and controls very largely the great interest with which we have to deal in this legislation; but in a commission of five persons, of whom the Commissioner of Agriculture himself is one and is the chief, and the remaining four are to be appointed in the discretion and by the selection of the President and with the approval of the Senate, we are likely in this way to secure the organization of a force for the control of these diseases which will be as little amenable to the influences to which he refers as will likely be a commission organized within a single bureau of this Government. In the first instance the commission which is proposed by the bill has at its head the Commissioner of Agriculture himself. There are then to be four other individuals selected by the President and to be confirmed by the Senate.

So in the organization of the commission contemplated by the bill we have the security, first, of whatsoever of discretion and of integrity there is in the Commissioner of Agriculture himself, who alone as an individual constitutes the commission which now exists and is responsible for the whole of it. In addition to whatsoever there is of official capacity and official integrity in the selection of the individuals who are to discharge this great duty by the provisions of this bill, we have the knowledge, the intelligence, the official honor, the official integrity of the President of the United States, himself the creator, with the sanction of the Senate, of the Commissioner of Agriculture; and we have whatsoever there may be of intelligence, of integrity, of knowledge of men, and of proper official action to be secured by the consideration and the approval of the Senate itself. I look upon a commission thus created as a body far better fitted to exercise the tremendous powers which are undoubtedly involved and which must be involved in the control and extirpation of these diseases; I look upon it as one far more likely to exercise its powers properly and resist the malign and secret influences which have been alluded to by the Senator from Kansas.

The commission is to have upon it a representation not exceeding two members, who shall be practical cattle-growers. It may be said that practical cattle-growers are likely to be interested or liable to be subject to be influenced by this secret organization, whatever it is; but however that may be, every one must see that this secret organization and the cattle-growers as a whole are interested, and above all others interested in the suppression of these diseases. All their profits, the profits of the combine, the profits of the honest cattle-grower upon the plains of Kansas or Texas, or among the mountains of Montana, the profits of everybody depend upon the extirpation of the diseases; and I am utterly unable to see how primarily the combine or anybody can be interested to secure the appointment of a citizen who would be inefficient in the discharge of his duties for the preservation of the great cattle interest, which is at the bottom of it all.

Even if it were so, as I said before, such a commission as this is far more likely to be above and beyond and outside of these malign influences under the operation of two practical cattle-growers to be selected not from any combination. It is to be assumed that the President and the Senate and the Commissioner of Agriculture, who is to preside over all, will among them be likely to select men who are not thus interested against the general public interests.

To the Commissioner of Agriculture I gladly pay the tribute which belongs to any competent, high-minded, and, as I think, exceedingly energetic and efficient public officer. The existing commission is organized under his direction, but practically it is very largely beyond his personal supervision, by reason of the great mass of other duties which he has to perform. It is a commission of mere clerks with one high scientific man, the surgeon. Is not such a commission as is proposed, when you come to confer upon it the increased power which it is indispensible to have in this national legislation if we are to control it, far more effective? We have the power to control it when necessary, at all events. Is not a commission of mere clerks and a veterinary surgeon at least exceedingly liable to be controlled by the great and dangerous influences to which allusion has been made? It seems to me that it would be the height of madness to pass any law which gives competent power if we did not elevate the character and the responsibility and the efficiency of the commission which is to exercise that power.

The bill as it originally came from the committee contained, as I think, no attempted exercise of power which was not embodied in the bill passed in the last Congress by a large majority through the Senate; but objection being made to the extent to which the rights of the States and of individual citizens of the States might be interfered with under its provisions, and the committee being exceedingly anxious in view of the pressing importance of some legislation upon the subject, the bill was referred again to the committee, and the present substitute or modification has been returned with its sanction, the passage of which is asked on its part by the Senate.

An attempt has been made to confine the powers conferred and to be exercised strictly to the protection of animals which are the subject-matter destined for interstate commerce. The committee believe, at least some members of the committee, perhaps a majority, that the powers of the commission under this bill will fall somewhat short of those which it will be necessary to have exercised, and that still the co-operation of the States very largely will be requisite in order that the diseases may be reached in those hidden recesses far within State lines, or it may be upon the borders of States which must be reached, and which must be exercised, I say, in order that the diseases may be controlled.

However that may be, and our experience hereafter may demonstrate the shortcomings of this bill, nevertheless, for the sake of obtaining some legislation that will be on the national statute-book and ready for coming emergencies, it has been deemed proper to submit the bill in its modified form. I do not think that it is possible for any one who will peruse it carefully to find any objection even from the standpoint of the most ultra believer in what we call State rights.

I do not know that there is anything more I wish so say, at present at least, in regard to the bill. It is not of supreme consequence to the part of the country where I reside, save only that whatever affects any of the parts of our common country affects us all. The disease seldom appears there; its ravages are easily controlled.

Mr. DAWES. You want good, cheap beef?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes; it is indispensable to us that we have cheap beef and good beef. Good beef, though, we are able to buy by paying what is necessary for our board in New Hampshire. Nevertheless, as parts of this great whole, our farmers and our people are exceedingly anxious that there shall be efficient legislation upon the national statute-book. We are at the present time entirely at the mercy of any discordant voice in any State in this country. We may pay the bills, we may attempt co-operation, but it is only upon condition that the State will consent to co-operate that we have been able hitherto to accomplish anything under the provisions of the law. It does seem to me that if we are to exercise the power of appropriation for the promotion of subjects which are within the admitted scope of national power and the national Constitution, it is our duty when we exercise the power to appropriate that we give the statutory authority for the exercise of that power. This bill simply does that.

Mr. REAGAN obtained the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from Texas will yield to me, I will move an executive session.

Mr. REAGAN. I will consent to that, with the understanding that I retain the floor until morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLPH in the chair). The Senator from Texas will be entitled to the floor when the unfinished business comes up again.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 333) granting a pension to Reuben Brownmiller;

A bill (S. 334) granting an increase of pension to Charles F. Allgower;

A bill (S. 738) granting a pension to guardian of Enos J. Searles, of Clermont County, Ohio;

A bill (S. 1148) to grant a right of way to the Kansas City and Pacific Railroad Company through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 2267) for the relief of the Omaha tribe of Indians in Nebraska, to extend time of payment to purchasers of land of said Indians, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 2605) relating to the anchorage of vessels in the port of New York;

A bill (S. 2671) to create and organize the county of Latah;

A bill (H. R. 1325) providing for the purchase of additional ground in the city of Indianapolis, Ind., adjoining the post-office site, and for the improvement of the building thereon, and appropriating $150,000 therefor; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 56) authorizing the use and improvement of Castle Island, in Boston Harbor.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and twenty-eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. SPOONER, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

QUARANTINE SERVICE.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of Order of Business 815, Senate bill 2493.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2493) to perfect the quarantine service of the United States.

Mr. HARRIS. The Surgeon-General of the Marine Hospital Service called my attention some time ago to the fact of trespasses by unauthorized individuals upon quarantine grounds, and I therefore suggest as a remedy for that evil that in line 3, on page 1, section 1, we insert the words:

Whenever any person shall trespass upon the grounds belonging to any quarantine station, or.

The amendments which I propose are in line 3 and line 9. They were prepared by the Surgeon-General of the Marine Hospital Service, and I send them to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLPH in the chair). The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, line 3, after the word "that," it is proposed to insert:

Whenever any person shall trespass upon the grounds belonging to any quarantine station, or.

So as to read:

That whenever any person shall trespass upon the grounds belonging to any quarantine station, or whenever any person, master, pilot, or owner of a vessel entering any port of the United States, shall so enter in violation of section 1 of the act entitled "An act to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States," approved April 29, 1878, or in violation of the quarantine regulations framed under said act, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. In line 9 of the same section, after the word "person," I move to insert "trespassing or such;" so as to read:

Such person trespassing, or such master, pilot, or other person in command of a vessel shall, upon conviction thereof, pay a fine of not more than $300, or be sentenced to imprisonment for a period of not more than thirty days, or shall be punished by both fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANSOM. I appreciate, Mr. President, the very great importance of the immediate passage of this bill. If the reports of the consuls abroad were presented they would show that we are in danger of contagion reaching our country; and I will not say a word or do anything in the world to delay the passage of the bill; but I would be glad if the Senator from Tennessee would give me information on one point. I see that there is a quarantine station established near Cape Charles and one at Sapelo Sound, on the coast of Georgia. If an infected vessel were to come into the port of Beaufort or Wilmington, N. C., it would be sent, as I understand, to the nearest station for disinfection.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator is quite right. Such vessels would be sent to the nearest quarantine station to be disinfected and the cargo and passengers taken care of.

Mr. RANSOM. If the vessels were obnoxious to the charge that they were infected?

Mr. HARRIS. If they had infection on board they would be disinfected, and if they had persons affected with contagious disease they would be deposited in the hospital and treated in the best possible manner.

Mr. RANSOM. That is all right. My attention was called to the bill this morning by a letter, and I should have seen the committee or have seen the Surgeon-General and prepared what I think is a proper amendment to make another station if I had supposed the bill would come up to-day; but I will not delay the passage of this bill. I can very easily, if my view about an additional station is right, on seeing the Surgeon-General prepare a bill for that purpose—and I know in that matter I shall have the co-operation of the Senator from Tennessee—introduce it and secure its passage, establishing a new station; or I can get some gentleman of the other House to introduce an amendment there to this bill before its final passage. With that statement I will not delay this bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to say to the Senator from North Carolina that there were a large number of memorials, petitions, and resolutions from sanitary organizations presented here and referred to the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman. In considering these various appeals for quarantine stations and to guard against the importation of contagion into this country we deemed it proper to submit all the applications to the Treasury Department and to the Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service. They were so submitted, and the Surgeon-General came before us, we interrogated him, and finally instructed him to systematize the whole matter of coast defense against contagion and report to us the quarantine stations absolutely necessary. He did so.

This bill was prepared by the Treasury Department upon the suggestions of the Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service, just as it appears here. It was unanimously reported by the committee. Any application to establish an additional quarantine station will be referred to that Department for its investigation, and when found necessary by the officers in charge of the quarantine service, I take it for granted the committee will favorably report it and respond to the necessities, whatever they may be.

Mr. RANSOM. In that view I have no doubt that the bill has been well prepared and deliberately considered; but having received a letter from a most intelligent gentleman, who has given a great deal of thought to this subject, only this morning, I thought proper to make my statement to the Senate.

I will not offer an amendment now, as I said in my previous remarks, because I do not desire to delay the passage of the bill, nor could I offer it with propriety until I had seen the Surgeon-General and learned his reasons for the bill in its present shape, which I suppose are satisfactory.

I offer no amendment now to the bill. Let it pass; I think it ought to be passed; but hereafter I shall see the Surgeon-General, and if necessary I will try to have the amendment offered elsewhere, or it may not be necessary at all.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TELLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 7, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate May 3, 1888.

INDIAN AGENT.

Henry George, of Wingo, Ky., to be agent for the Indians of the Colorado River Agency in Arizona, to take effect July 1, 1888, vice George W. Busey, resigned.

POSTMASTERS.

Howard H. Edwards, to be postmaster at Fayetteville, Onondaga County, New York, vice William Austin, term expired.

James B. Keeler, to be postmaster at Ellenville, Ulster County, New York, vice Oscar B. Seaman, term expired.

N. H. Sixby, to be postmaster at Horseheads, Chemung County, New York, vice Lawrence L. Curtis, term expired.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 3, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

POSTAL REGULATIONS AND TREATIES, UNITED STATES AND CANADA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, in response to a resolution of the House calling for information relative to postal regulations and treaties between the United States and Canada; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ROLLINS PRESSLEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, with accompanying papers, a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs relative to the claim of Rollins Pressley for legal services rendered to the Eastern band of Cherokee Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

J. E. KELSEY VS. THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the findings of fact in the case of James E. Kelsey against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

PUBLIC BUILDING SITE, INDIANAPOLIS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 1325) providing for the purchase of additional ground in the city of Indianapolis, Ind., adjoining the post-office site, and for the improvement of the building thereon, and appropriating $125,000 therefor, with amendments by the Senate.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in. I ask permission to make a short statement in regard to the amendment. The only change made in the bill by the Senate is that the amount appropriated is increased from $125,000 to $150,000. Upon consultation with the owners of the property and with leading citizens there, my colleague, Major STEELE, and myself concluded that $125,000 might not be sufficient to purchase the ground, and, in compliance with our request, the bill was amended in the Senate by adding $25,000 to the appropriation. I would state further that it is important that this bill should pass immediately, because the value of the land is continually increasing and the sooner the Government buys it—and we are bound to buy it—the cheaper it can be had.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Page 1, lines 13 and 14, strike out "25" and insert "50."

Also amend the title so as to read: "An act providing for the purchase of additional ground in the city of Indianapolis, Ind., adjoining the post-office site, and for the improvement of the building thereon, and appropriating $150,000 therefor."

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. BYNUM moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGES ACROSS CAPE FEAR AND OTHER RIVERS, NORTH CAROLINA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2345) authorizing the construction of bridges across the Cape Fear River, Black River, and the Northeast River, in the State of North Carolina, returned from the Senate with a request for a conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the House amendment to the bill.

On motion of Mr. CRISP, by unanimous consent, the House insisted upon its amendment, and agreed to the conference requested by the Senate.

The SPEAKER appointed as managers of the conference on the part of the House Mr. CRISP, Mr. PHELAN, and Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa.

WHARF AT FORTRESS MONROE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2624) to provide for the enlargement of the dimensions of the wharf at Fortress Monroe; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WILMINGTON, DEL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1062) to increase the appropriation for the erection of a public building at Wilmington, Del.; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ATCHISON, KANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1726) for the erection of a public building for the use of the post-office and Government offices at the city of Atchison, Kans.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

RAILROAD BRIDGE AT LITTLE ROCK, ARK.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2198) to authorize the building of a railroad bridge at Little Rock, Ark.; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, a House bill similar to this has been reported by the House committee. The road referred to in the bill is now completed to Little Rock, and is about to be opened. There is great anxiety that this bridge should be authorized as speedily as possible. I trust, therefore, unanimous consent may be given for the immediate consideration of this Senate bill, and also to dispense with its reading, as it is an exact copy of the House bill, with the single exception that, as the gentlemen who asked for the passage of the House bill have since been incorporated, a corresponding change has been made in the Senate bill. The parties, however, are precisely the same, and the Senate bill is satisfactory to the House committee.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If this bill can be considered and passed without debate and without the reading of the bill, I do not object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered, and that the reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection to either request? The Chair hears none.

The House accordingly proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROGERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, House bill No. 7790, of similar purport to the Senate bill just passed, will be laid on the table.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT EMPORIA, KANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1913) for the erection of a public building at Emporia, Kans.

Mr. RYAN. The House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has reported a bill for the erection of a public building at Emporia, Kans., the cost being limited to $60,000. This Senate bill is similar in its provisions, except that the limit of the cost is $100,000. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill be now taken up for consideration, and that it be amended by substituting the provisions of the House bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I suggest to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] that he had better let this matter go over for the present. The time for debate on the tariff is limited, and I dislike to consent to having that time otherwise occupied.

Mr. RYAN. I will say to my friend from Tennessee that if this proposition provokes any discussion——

Mr. MCMILLIN. I prefer that the gentleman should let it go over. There may be opportunity later in the day for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will retain the bill on the Speaker's table.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. LAFFOON, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. KELLEY, until Monday, the 7th instant, on account of important business.

NICARAGUAN PUPIL AT MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a joint resolution which has been passed by the Senate at the request of the Secretary of State, simply extending to the Government of Nicaragua the privilege of having one of its citizens educated at the West Point Military Academy at his own expense. The bill passed the Senate immediately upon the request of the Secretary of State, and the Committee on Military Affairs of this House recommend that the House concur in the passage of the measure. A similar courtesy has heretofore been extended to the Government of Guatemala as well as the Government of Nicaragua.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is it understood that this measure involves no expense to the Government of the United States?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The resolution provides that no expense is to be incurred by the United States.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then I do not object.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 68) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the Military Academy at West Point José Andrés Urtecho, of Nicaragua; which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to permit José Andrés Urtecho, of Nicaragua, to receive instruction at the Military Academy at West Point: Provided, That no expense shall be caused to the United States thereby: And provided further, That in the case of the said Urtecho the provisions of sections 1320 and 1321 of the Revised Statutes shall be suspended.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CORRECTION OF REFERENCE.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to have corrected the reference made yesterday of an executive document. A communication was transmitted to the House by the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending legislation for enforcing the laws for the collection of internal revenue in the public-land strip known as "No Man's Land;" and the communication was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Committee on the Territories has taken jurisdiction of this subject and desires the information embraced in the correspondence which accompanies this communication. I ask unanimous consent that the reference be changed to the Committee on the Territories, and that the communication, with the accompanying documents, be printed.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the communication mentioned by the gentleman will be referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 6759) granting a pension to Mary Robinson;

An act (H. R. 5233) granting a pension to William F. Randolph;

An act (H. R. 5118) granting a pension to Theodore Gardner;

An act (H. R. 4106) granting a pension to Olive Wallace;

An act (H. R. 4110) granting a pension to Mehitable Wheelock;

An act (H. R. 6812) granting an increase of pension to Stephen Thurston;

An act (H. R. 4672) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Emily M. Wyman;

An act (H. R. 3253) appropriating the sum of $52,090 for the enlargement and improvement of the United States Government building at Charleston, W. Va.;

An act (H. R. 7546) to amend sections 2595 and 2596 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and to provide a collector at the port of St. Paul, Minn., and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. 4557) for the relief of George F. Chilton.

Mr. McMILLIN. I call for the regular order.

PARIS INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. BELMONT. I rise for the purpose of submitting a privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 83) accepting the invitation of the French Republic to take part in an international exposition to be held in Paris in 1889, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, and 13, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 2, line 9, after "appoint," insert "as assistants to the commissioner-general;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 9: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 3, line 17, in lieu of the sum named, insert "$250,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 3, line 21, after "exposition," insert "and accompany the same with a report respecting such production, to be printed in the English, French, and German languages;" and the Senate agree to the same.

PERRY BELMONT,
ROBERT R. HITT,
ISIDOR RAYNER,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOHN SHERMAN,
WM. M. EVARTS,
JOSEPH E. BROWN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the statement which accompanies the conference report under the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

The managers on the part of the House submit the following statement:

The amount appropriated by the joint resolution, as it passed the House, was $225,000; the Senate increased it to $300,000; the conferees agreed upon an appropriation of $250,000. The Senate increased the allowance for salaries and expenses of the commissioner-general and assistants on the ground that the length of time over which their services would extend would be much greater than on the corresponding occasion in 1878, and the House managers accepted these amendments. The proposed honorary commissioners from States and Territories are stricken out, as is also the provision requiring in express terms an exhibit to be made of American pork products, the House managers having assurance from the Commissioner of Agriculture that, under the general terms of the joint resolution, he will be able to carry out the purpose had in view by the House when this amendment was added to the resolution.

PERRY BELMONT,
ROBERT R. HITT,
ISIDOR RAYNER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BELMONT. I ask that the letter of the Commissioner of Agriculture be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The letter is as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
COMMISSIONER'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 28, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 25th instant, requesting to be informed whether if lines 17-35 be stricken out of House resolution 83 it will still be possible for me to carry out substantially the purpose had in view by the House when the resolution was passed.

The exhibits of "suitable specimens of the agricultural productions of the several States and Territories of the Union," for which provision is made in the joint resolution, would necessarily include a complete line of our pork products, which have always been our most prominent branch of meat exports, and as a surplus for foreign food supply still next in importance to exportation of breadstuffs, having averaged for a quarter of a century about 15 per cent. of our entire pork production, and in some years reaching 30 per cent., constituting a large proportion of Western pork packing, and requiring in 1880 more than 7,000,000 swine to produce it.

It would be eminently proper and in accordance with usage in all international exhibitions to prepare precise statements of our methods in swine raising and process of curing for gratuitous distribution at the Paris exposition. It should of course be accurate and dignified, without offensive reference to foreign decrees of exclusion. Similar information concerning other products which compete with European agriculture would naturally and properly be made in like manner. Thus the fullest opportunity would be enjoyed for showing the abundance and soundness of our material for swine-feeding, the ample and airy feeding grounds and healthful conditions for meat-making, and the ingenious and skillful methods in killing, dressing, and curing, for the production of the most healthful pork products that are sent into the markets of the world. I answer your inquiry therefore in the affirmative, having in mind always the important proviso in your letter, namely, "if a sufficient appropriation be made." In this connection I beg leave to suggest that the sum allowed by Congress for this purpose be distinctly named in the appropriation act and not left to the exigencies of the occasion and the pressure of other interests in the exhibition. The original resolution would seem to contemplate an expenditure on the part of this Department of $25,000 for the single exhibition of our pork products. I consider this sum reasonable, and only express the hope that if other agricultural industries are to be represented through the Department a proportionate sum be allowed for the purpose. Indeed, I should consider it most desirable that the collection of agricultural products should be made exclusively by this Department, and that a single national exhibition, rather than numerous local exhibits, should be made. In other words, the governors of the several States and Territories should co-operate with this Department, so far as the respective exhibits relate to agriculture, in order that a well arranged and thoroughly systematic exhibition may be made. I respectfully and urgently urge the importance of this point upon your committee.

It does not need any argument from me to prove the value to this country, from every point of view, of such an exhibition by this Department of the products of American agriculture—an exhibition that shall fairly represent the remarkable variety and superior quality of such products, as well as the dignity of a country with the largest agricultural product and greatest surplus of any nation in the world.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

NORMAN J. COLMAN,
Commissioner of Agriculture.

Hon. PERRY BELMONT,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives.

The conference report was adopted.

Mr. BELMONT moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LABOR TROUBLES IN PENNSYLVANIA.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], chairman of the Select Committee to Investigate Existing Labor Troubles in Pennsylvania, asks, by unanimous consent, that the testimony taken before that committee, as well as the report which has been prepared, but not yet adopted, may be printed. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

TEMPORARY AID FOR COMMON SCHOOLS.

Mr. BIGGS, by unanimous consent, presented a petition to the Congress of the United States of America, praying for the enactment of a bill providing temporary aid for common schools, to be disbursed on the basis of illiteracy, thereby securing the means of education in otherwise neglected portions of our country, and asked that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Education.

Mr. SPRINGER. Of course, without the names.

Mr. BIGGS. Yes; without the names.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The petition is as follows:

Petition for national aid to common schools.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

We, the undersigned, citizens of Amador City, county of Amador, and State of California, believing that the prosperity and perpetuity of all free institutions depend upon the intelligence and virtue of the people; that ignorance exists to an alarming degree, and endangers the general welfare of the Republic, we therefore earnestly pray for the enactment of a law which shall authorize the appropriation of money from the Treasury of the United States for temporary aid in the establishment and maintenance of free public schools, and for such other remedial legislation as is necessary, to the end that the number of illiterates in the country, now exceeding 6,000,000 persons, ten years of age and over, shall be reduced to a minimum.

VETO MESSAGE OF BILL FOR RELIEF OF EMILY J. MILLS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message of the President:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 4534, entitled "An act for the relief of Emily G. Mills."

The object of this bill is to provide a pension for the beneficiary named therein, as the widow of Oscar B. Mills, late a second assistant engineer, retired, in the United States Navy. The deceased was appointed an acting third assistant engineer in October, 1862, and in 1864 he was promoted to the place of second assistant engineer.

It is supposed that while in active service he did his full duty, though I am not informed of any distinguished acts of bravery or heroism. In February, 1871, he was before a naval retiring board, which found that he was incapacitated for active service on account of malarious fever, contracted in 1868, and recommended that he be allowed six months' leave of absence to recover his health.

In December, 1871, he was again examined for retirement and the board found that he was not in any way incapacitated from performing the duties of his office. The next year, in 1872, another retiring board, upon an examination of his case, found that he was "laboring under general debility, the effect of intermittent fever acting upon an originally delicate constitution," and he was thereupon placed upon the retired-list of the Navy.

On the 10th day of August, 1873, he was accidentally shot and killed by a neighbor who was attempting to shoot an owl.

As long as there is the least pretense of limiting the bestowal of pension to disability or death in some way related to the incidents of military and naval service, claims of this description can not consistently be allowed.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION.

The bill and amendment, on motion of Mr. SPRINGER, were referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move to dispense with the morning hour for reports from committees, and that gentlemen have leave to hand them in at the Clerk's desk for reference.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The following report was filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

JOSEPH ROSIER.

Mr. BARRY, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 9668) granting a pension to Joseph Rosier; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TARIFF.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9651) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

[Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, addressed the committee. His remarks are withheld for revision See APPENDIX.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished member of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia], who has just addressed the House in Committee of the Whole, has rested his entire speech in favor of the pending bill on the assumption that duties imposed on articles which can be produced or made here to the extent of our wants, without serious natural disadvantages, are taxes which increase the burdens of the consumer to the extent, or nearly to the extent, of the duties.

The President himself, in his tariff message, and every gentleman who has spoken thus far in this debate in opposition to protection, has coolly begged the vital point in issue between the friends and opponents of protection, and on the assumption that such duties thus increase the prices of not only imported articles, but of all similar articles produced or made here, has proceeded to indulge in violent denunciation of the "robber" protective tariff.

It is conceded on all sides that duties imposed on articles that can not be produced in this country are a tax which increase the prices of the articles and the burden of the consumer to the extent of the duty. It is for that reason that the present tariff places all such articles on the free-list except where they may be used as a substitute for articles produced here, and a few luxuries.

It is conceded on all sides, also, that duties imposed on articles that are produced here to only a limited extent in consequence of natural disadvantages—as, for example, sugar and rice—are added to the price in large part, depending upon the extent of the home production, and are in effect a tax which increases the burdens of the consumer.

But the friends of protection hold that duties imposed on all imported articles which can be produced here without serious natural disadvantages to the extent of our wants are not taxes that increase the burdens of the consumer, but that on the contrary they give effect to a system which encourages home industries and promotes the welfare of each citizen and of the country as a whole.

But instead of meeting this vital issue and discussing it candidly, we have thus far had nothing but an assumption that the anti-protective view of the effect of such duties is an axiomatic truth which needs no demonstration of its correctness.

I think it was my friend Judge KELLEY who once characterized free trade as the science of assumptions. Judging from the course thus far pursued by the opponents of protection in this debate the characterization is amply justified.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] based his whole argument on the same assumption, which he put in this concrete form:

Suppose a laborer, who is earning a dollar a day by his work, finds a suit of woolen clothes that he can buy for $10 without the tariff tax, then the suit of clothes can be purchased for ten days' work; but the manufacturer comes to Congress and says, "I must be protected against this man buying this cheap suit of clothes," and Congress protects him by putting on a duty of 100 per cent., or $10 more. Now, it will require the laborer to work twenty days to get his suit of clothes. Has he not been required to work twice as long under the tariff as he would have done without to obtain his suit of clothes? But how has this duty affected the manufacturer? If it required him to work ten days to produce the suit of clothes worth $10, he now produces them by five days' work, for he receives $20 for ten days' work, and, of course, $10 for five days' work. The manufacturer has had his work reduced one-half, the laborer has had his doubled.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, my friend from Texas ingenuously asks the House and the country if, on the supposition that a laborer could obtain a coat in this country under free trade for ten days' work, but would have to give twenty days' work under protection, it would not be clear that protection deprived such laborer of the fruits of one-half his work? And having begged the whole question at issue by his suppositions, he triumphantly points to the demonstration as proof that a laborer could obtain a coat or any other article for as much less labor as the percentage of duty now is if we should adopt free trade.

MILLS BILL INDEFENSIBLE ON THE TAX THEORY.

Now, I want to say to the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee that if his assumption is correct, then the bill which he has reported to the House can not be defended.

Let me call his attention to the flagrant injustice he proposes to heap on the laborer and the laborer's family, if the foundation of his whole argument is sound.

On page 28 of his reported bill, I find that duties of 45 per cent. are imposed on ready-made men's and women's clothing, cloaks, jackets, and garments for women and children.

Now, if he and his associates are correct in the assumption on which they rest their whole argument against protection—that duties on imported articles which can be made in this country to the extent of our wants increase the cost of all such articles to the consumer in labor, service, or products to the amount of the duty—then I call the attention of my friend from Texas to the fact that he proposes by his bill to require a laborer to work fourteen and a half days for clothing for which he would have to give but ten days' work if the duty should be removed. [Laughter.] And according to the same logic, he proposes to allow the manufacturer to convert to his own use the four and a half days exacted from the laborer by his bill.

THE POOR MAN'S BLANKET.

The gentleman from Texas dwelt with some feeling on the taxes imposed by the present tariff on the poor man's blanket, and conveyed the impression that in the bill which he has presented the one thing especially cared for was the interest of the poor man in the matter of blankets.

What was my surprise, therefore, on looking at the blanket "tax" proposed by the new bill, to find that the rich man's blanket had been subjected to a reduction of $1.75 in the tax—assuming, of course, that the gentleman's theory that a duty on blankets is a "tax" which increases the cost of blankets to the extent of the duty is correct—while the poor man's blanket had been reduced only 42 cents.

Let me call my friend's attention to this discrimination against the poor man's blanket.

Under the present tariff a 5-pound blanket invoiced in England at 30 cents per pound, or $1.50 (for a blanket selling in English markets at $1.75 to $2 would be undervalued to this extent in the invoice), would pay a duty of 10 cents per pound, 50 cents, to compensate the manufacturer for the duty on the wool, and an ad valorem duty of 35 per cent., 52 cents; total duty, $1.02. The rich man's blanket, invoiced at $5, pays a duty of 35 cents per pound and 40 per cent. ad valorem; total duty, $3.75. Now, the Mills bill, which strikes off the pound duty because the wool duty is abolished, imposes a uniform duty of 40 per cent. on imported blankets. This would make the "tax" on the poor man's blanket 60 cents, a reduction of only 42 cents, while the tax on the rich man's blanket would be reduced to $2, a reduction of $1.75.

And I call attention to the fact that on this article of blankets, "poor men's blankets," too, the Mills bill makes the reduction on that part of the duty which goes to the farmer for wool; and notwithstanding all the denunciation of the "robber" manufacturer indulged in by the gentleman from Texas, yet it actually increases the ad valorem duty which goes to the manufacturer 5 per cent.

When the gentleman's colleague [Mr. CRAIN] asked him during his speech how much the duty was reduced by his bill on a pair of $2.50 blankets, and the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee proudly replied, "From $1.90 to $1," I wanted to ask the distinguished chairman on what principle of justice he proposed to compel the workingman to give an extra day's work for a blanket to shield him from the cold winter? for this is what the gentleman must believe he has done if he accepts the theory on which his whole argument is based.

And when my friend from Texas proceeded to demonstrate by the same kind of logic that this duty of $1.90, or even $1, on the poor man's blanket enables the manufacturer in this country to charge $1.90 or $1 more than such a blanket would cost in England, and to put the whole of this amount into his own pocket—a profit of 75 or 40 per cent. on the product—I wondered how the gentleman had worked himself up to accept the view that manufacturing paid such enormous profits when hundreds and thousands of men are eager to go into any kind of business that pays 6 per cent., and when there is not more than 50 cents to 75 cents difference between the retail price of a 5-pound blanket of that quality in the United States and England, the difference being almost entirely in the cost of the wool, for the reason that there is very little labor in a common blanket.

Evidently the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], who treated the committee subsequently to a dismal account of the unremunerative character of the woolen industry in this country—bankruptcy and ruin staring the manufacturers in the face because of the fierce competition in the manufacture of woolen goods, which has depressed prices below cost, and which can only be remedied by free wool—has not read the demonstration of the gentleman from Texas that the tariff puts the amount of the duty into the pockets of the manufacturer.

I wish, however, to congratulate my friend from Indiana on his acceptance of the correct doctrine that the tariff does not enable the domestic manufacturer to add the duty to his product, but that the prices which he realizes for his goods must be those fixed by the competition of our sixty millions of people; and that inevitably they must be as low as such goods can be made here and yield the same returns as other business.

I may add in passing that the special difficulty which our woolen manufacturing industry now experiences arises from a practical lowering of the duties on imported woolens, first, by a construction of the tariff which cuts down the duties on worsteds, and, secondly, by systematic wholesale invoiced undervaluations, a situation which ought not to suggest as a remedy the lowering of the duties on woolens and the substitution of exclusively ad valorem duties, which invite undervaluations, as proposed by the Mills bill.

OTHER EXAMPLES.

When the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL] was insisting so earnestly that he supported the Mills bill because it removed so many of the burdens of taxation from the poor man, I was surprised to hear him intimate in reply to a question that he could not have voted for the measure if it had put coal and iron ore on the free-list; for on his theory that duties on imported articles which we can produce here to the extent of our wants increase the cost of all such articles to the extent of the duty, I could not understand why he should regard a "tax" of 45 per cent. on the poor man's coal and 40 per cent. on the raw material out of which the poor man earns wages in making iron as a blessing, while justice and patriotism urged him to strike down the duties on other articles advanced by labor to a higher stage. Is it possible that the gentleman holds to the "tax" theory of protective duties as to the products of other districts, but sees nothing but delightful results of such duties as to the products of his own district?

I might pursue further this line of illustrations from the bill reported by the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, calling his attention to the fact that he proposes (according to his theory) to tax the poor man's cotton shirt 40 per cent. and compel him to work fourteen days, when ten days' work would buy the same cloth if the tariff tax were removed; but these examples suffice to show that the gentleman from Texas, whom I know to be a humane man, would not propose such an injustice if he really believed that a duty on imported articles which can be produced or made in this country to the extent of our wants increased the burdens of the consumer to the amount of the duty.

PROTECTIVE DUTIES NOT A TAX.

Mr. Chairman, not only does an appeal from the rhetoric to the acts of my friend from Texas disprove this theory of the effect of protective duties, but also a reference to familiar facts of every day's experience exposes the groundlessness of the President's assumption.

I have before me two samples of cotton prints, identical in quality and character—the one made in a British, the other in an American mill. If the British manufacturer sends a square yard of his print into our markets he is required to pay a duty of 5 cents thereon—a hundred per cent. The price of the British print at retail in Manchester is 5 cents per square yard. If the fundamental theory of the President and of the gentleman from Texas, and all others who have spoken against protection, is correct, then the cost of all prints of this quality of prints in American markets is 10 cents per yard at retail, for that is the English price plus the duty. But it so happens that any one can go into any retail store in our commercial centers and buy this print at 5 cents per yard—the same as the duty. [Applause.]

In view of this fact of every day observation, what becomes of the President's theory on which he built his tariff essay superstructure, that a duty is a tax which always increases to nearly or quite that extent the price of all articles of the class on which it is imposed, whether made abroad or at home?

Evidently whatever duties have been collected on imported prints have been taxes paid, not by the consumer, but by the foreign manufacturer who has sent some of his surplus to our markets and sold it at the same price for which American goods are sold, making up the loss of the duty paid our Treasury by his sales in unprotected markets. And the duty has not added a single penny to the money cost of home-made prints to our consumers. On the other hand the employment of labor at home in making these goods has benefited every consumer.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I invite the committee to examine a little more closely the fundamental error of the free-trade assumption, that a protective duty on imported articles which can be produced here to the extent of our wants is a tax which (as the President puts it) compels the consumer to pay for such articles, whether imported or made here, "nearly or quite the enhanced price which the duty adds to the imported articles"—an assumption which is the key-stone of the free-trade arch, and on the basis of which my amiable friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], who never does anything by halves, has demonstrated in the North American Review, to his satisfaction at least, that protection costs this country annually more than $600,000,000. The only surprise to me is that my quick-witted friend from Illinois, when he surveyed the enormous waste "proved" by his figures, and looked around on the most prosperous country on the face of the earth, had not indulged in the tinge of a suspicion that there might be some error in his computation.

If my friend from Illinois, after he had added several millions of dollars to his imposing column of figures as the result of 5 cents per yard tax on every yard of print consumed in this country (on the theory that the duty of 5 cents per yard is added to the cost of every yard to the consumer), had stepped into the nearest dry-goods establishment and ascertained that he could buy all the prints he wanted at 5 cents per yard, and had learned, as he might on inquiry, that similar prints are sold at the same price in London, he would certainly have moderated his figures, although it would have been at the expense of his rhetoric.

Or if, after my friend had figured up that the 2½ cents per square yard duty on standard sheetings increased the cost of every poor man's shirt 25 cents, and had swelled the sheeting tax of the country up to fifty millions, he had ascertained (what is the fact) that common sheeting is as cheap here as in England, it is possible that some of the many numerals which represented the tariff tax might have disappeared from his computation.

COMPETITION FIXES PRICES.

It is to be borne in mind that what protectionists affirm as to the effect of duties applies only to protective duties; in other words, to duties laid on such imported articles as can be produced here to the extent of our wants, and laid at such a rate as to encourage the production or manufacture of such articles to supply our own markets, rather than at such low rates as to invite a supply of our markets from abroad. In the case of such articles it is to be remembered that the price is determined, not by what they cost abroad plus the duty, as the free-traders assume, but by what it costs to make such articles here, under the influence of home competition and stimulated inventive genius, with our better-paid labor.

The suggestion that a duty on imports high enough to give our home markets to our own industries affords an opportunity for monopolies to increase prices beyond living profits, is groundless for the reason that it is impossible to build up monopolies in a country of 60,000,000 of enterprising people busily seeking every avenue for the profitable employment of labor and capital by simply giving all our own citizens the first chance.

No instance can be found where the tariff created a monopoly in this country, or prevented the free working of home competition in the production of an article which can be produced here to the extent of our wants. The monopolies which have from time to time arisen in this country have been based either on patents, special chartered privileges, or combinations in the form of trusts or pools without any reference to the tariff, or in products on the free-list like petroleum and anthracite coal where nature has restricted their field, or in articles like sugar, not produced here to the extent of our wants. A trust in cotton, woolen, leather, and ordinary iron-manufacturing industries in this country is an impossibility.

The fact stands out that prices of all articles produced or made here under the policy of protection must, in the face of our fierce competition, necessarily be on the average as low as they can be successfully made here with our present wages of labor. In the case of common articles, where the proportion of labor cost is small, it has been found that after experience we have been able to make and sell them not only as cheap, quality for quality, as they are sold abroad, but even cheaper than they were sold abroad before our competition forced down prices. But this result has in every case been brought about by maintaining duties which would give our own markets substantially to our own industries. By this means our own inventive genius and skill have been stimulated to the utmost, without fear that foreigners might combine to injure or break down our own industries by unloading surplus goods at any time at less than cost.

REDUCTION OF PRICES BY PROTECTION.

The influence of the development of our manufacturing interests, not only here, but abroad, is entirely ignored by the opponents of protection. For example, up to 1867 not a single steel rail had been made in this country, and we were relying upon English steel rails, for which we were paying $75 per ton in gold in Liverpool, and freight and duty, bringing the cost up to $100 in gold. In 1870, against the protests of free-traders that we were taxing every farmer who had freight to send from the West, Congress placed a specific duty of $28 per ton on rails; in 1883 reduced to $17. This duty immediately developed the steel-rail manufacture in this country and began to bring down the price here and in England. In two years American steel rails could be purchased in our markets for $85 in gold, in four years for $75, in six years for $60, and to-day for $32 per ton. Unquestionably if we had refused to lay a protective duty on steel rails and thus made it impracticable to begin their manufacture here, we should to-day be paying English mills much more than we now are.

In other words, the duty on steel rails has not increased, but has decreased, the burdens of the consumer.

It will be seen, therefore, that even in the case of articles in which the proportion of labor is so large that foreign manufacturers have been able to continue to make and sell them cheaper than our own manufacturers can, with our better-paid labor, our competition has reduced prices all over the world.

Crockery ware is 37 per cent. cheaper than in 1860, cotton and woolen goods 25 per cent. cheaper, iron and steel products 25 per cent. cheaper, boots and shoes 25 per cent. cheaper; in short, not a single article can be named whose manufacture has been developed in the United States by protection which has not been cheapened to the consumer by this policy far beyond what it would have been if we had not entered into these industries.

REAL TEST OF PRICES.

Mr. Chairman, thus far in discussing the effect of protective duties on the cost of the articles on which they are imposed, I have considered only prices in money. Money, however, is only the medium used in making exchanges. The articles purchased are really paid for in labor, service, or some other products of labor. The price of an article in money is not what the laborer is interested in. His real interest is how much labor it requires to pay for it. In other words, every useful citizen is a producer as well as a consumer. Products may be ever so cheap in money and yet extortionately dear in labor or service or other product. What does it matter to a workingman that he can buy a coat in free-trade Liverpool for $8 which costs $10 in protective America when ten days' work are required to buy the coat in Liverpool and only eight days' in this country? Under such conditions—and these are the actual facts which confront us in the two countries—the Liverpool price is dear and the American price is cheap. [Applause.]

Mr. MACDONALD. Does the gentleman apply the same rule to the farmers of this country and of Europe with reference to the number of days' labor paying for a suit of clothes?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MACDONALD. How can you do that when the American farmer must go to the European market for the sale of his surplus and rely upon it for the price of his wheat?

Mr. DINGLEY. I will come to the point suggested by my friend from Minnesota presently.

WAGES IN THE UNITED STATES.

For many years free-traders denied the fact that wages are much, if any, lower in Great Britain than here. But since the investigations of Col. Carroll D. Wright, a few years ago, then commissioner of labor for Massachusetts, but now Commissioner of Labor of the United States, which showed that on an average wages in Massachusetts are 77 per cent. higher than in Great Britain, running from 38 per cent. in cotton manufacturing (where less skill is required in most grades of cottons made in this country than in other manufacturing industries) to over 100 per cent. in industries requiring a high degree of skill, the claim has been set up that whatever advantage a workingman may have in this country over a similar workingman in Great Britain is offset by the increased cost of living.

Colonel Wright's carefully-collated statistics of the relative cost of living on similar scales in the two countries placed the excess in this country at only 6 per cent. in food and clothing and 11 per cent. in rents.

COLONEL WRIGHT'S WAGES REPORT.

In order to set at rest the contention as to the difference between wages in the United States and Great Britain I copy the following summary from Labor Commissioner Wright's official report:

1. The number of employés whose average weekly wages are represented in the comparisons from 1860 to 1883 is at least one and a quarter millions.

2. In the comparisons, 88 industries in Massachusetts and 39 in Great Britain were represented. The Massachusetts wages were higher in all the industries compared, the percentage in favor of Massachusetts, on an industry basis, being 75.40.

3. The purely manufacturing industries entering into this comparison numbered 84 in Massachusetts and 37 in Great Britain. In these industries the percentage in favor of Massachusetts was 73.62.

4. Complete comparisons were possible in the case of 37 industries having wage statistics for both countries. In these industries the percentage in favor of Massachusetts was 82.50.

5. On the yearly basis, Massachusetts from 1860 to 1883, and Great Britain from 1872 to 1883, the percentage in favor of Massachusetts is 79.57.

6. Wages in Massachusetts are 28.36 per cent. higher than they were in 1860.

7. Wages in Great Britain are 9.74 per cent. higher than they were in 1872.

The mean of the percentages shown on the industry basis in section 2 (75.40) and on the yearly basis in section 5 (79.57) is 77.49, which figure is the result of the comparisons from 1860 to 1883. This result not only verifies beyond question the result obtained in Part II, namely, 62+ per cent., but it also shows that the extreme figure, for 1883 alone, found in Part II, namely, 75.94 per cent. (see page 119), is less than the average per cent. in favor of Massachusetts from 1860 to 1883.

The grand result of the comparative wages investigation in Massachusetts and Great Britain for the years 1860 to 1883 is, that the general average weekly wage of the employés in the industries considered in Massachusetts was 77.49 per cent. higher than the general average weekly wage of the employés in the industries considered in Great Britain.

He then makes a careful comparison of the cost of living, and arrives at the following results:

Comparisons for 1883 between Massachusetts and Great Britain enable us to secure the following results: Groceries were 16.18 per cent. higher in Massachusetts; provisions were 23.08 per cent. higher in Great Britain, while fuel was 104.96 per cent. higher in Massachusetts.

Dry goods.—From the high, medium high, medium, medium low, and low prices for dry goods, we secure two percentages, both in favor of Great Britain. If all goods in all grades are compared we find that dry goods were 13.26 per cent. higher in Massachusetts in 1883 than in Great Britain. If the comparison is made on the basis of all goods in the medium, medium low, and low grades, from which workingmen obtain their supplies, the figure in favor of Great Britain is .9, or less than 1 per cent.

Boots, shoes, and slippers.—In 1883, if all goods in all grades are included, boots, shoes, and slippers were 62.59 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain. If the comparison is confined to the medium, medium low, and low grades, then these articles were 45.75 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain.

Clothing.—If all goods in all grades are considered, the specified articles of clothing were 45.06 per cent. higher in Massachusetts in 1883 than in Great Britain. If the comparison covers only the medium, medium low, and low grades, then the articles considered were 27.36 per cent. higher in Massachusetts. The low grade alone shows that prices in Massachusetts were 18 per cent. higher, while the high and medium high grades indicate that prices in Massachusetts were 56.57 per cent. higher.

Rents.—A very full showing of rents for Massachusetts and Great Britain in 1883 supplies the following result: Rents were, on the average, 89.02 per cent. higher in Massachusetts than in Great Britain. The average rent of one room in Massachusetts was 66 cents per week, $2.86 per month, and $34.38 per year. The average rent of various sized tenements can be easily computed on this basis. In Great Britain the average rent for one room was 35 cents per week, $1.51 per month, and $18.02 per year. Computations for tenements can be made as in the case of Massachusetts.

I give his conclusions:

That on any basis of yearly expenditure the prices of articles entering into the cost of living were on the average 17.29 per cent. higher in Massachusetts in 1883 than in Great Britain; that of this figure 11.49 per cent. was due to higher rents in Massachusetts, leaving 5.80 per cent. as indicative of the higher cost of living in Massachusetts, as compared with Great Britain, as regards the remaining elements of expense.

We have seen, on page 151, ante, that the Massachusetts workingman expends 48.41 per cent. more for the support of his family than the workingman in Great Britain. (The average families referred to (page 151) are virtually of the same size, for the slightly increased size of the average Great Britain family is compensated for by a greater proportion at work in Great Britain, and this proportion is the same as the ratio between Massachusetts and Great Britain as regards size of family and persons at work.)

Of this 48.41 per cent. 5.80 per cent. is paid extra for articles which could be purchased 5.80 per cent. cheaper in Great Britain; 11.49 per cent. is paid extra to secure more and larger rooms and more air space than the workingman in Great Britain enjoys, while the remainder, 31.12 per cent., indicates also an extra amount expended by the Massachusetts workingman to secure better home surroundings and to maintain the same higher standard of living, as shown for rent, as regards other expenses, which standard is higher than that secured by the workingman in Great Britain.

Distinguishing the figures indicating the greater expenditure for living in Massachusetts (48.41 per cent.) from those indicating the higher cost of living (17.29 per cent.), we find, as a grand result, that the higher prices in Massachusetts are represented by 5.80 per cent.; that increased accommodations in housing and the general higher standard of living maintained by Massachusetts workingmen as compared with the standard of living of workingmen in Great Britain is represented by 42.61 (11.49+31.12) per cent. out of the total greater cost of 48.41 per cent.; or, stated at a direct ratio, the standard of living of Massachusetts workingmen is to that of the workingmen of Great Britain as 1.42 is to 1.

These statistics show that on the average the wages of workingmen in this country have a purchasing power of nearly 60 per cent. more than the purchasing power of the wages of similar workingmen in Great Britain.

THE NEW THEORY.

Mr. Chairman, there has been recently an attempt to break the force of this demonstration, that a protective policy which secured an average of 77 per cent. higher wages in the manufacturing industries of Massachusetts than of Great Britain, and a cost of living on similar scales only 6 per cent. higher for food and clothing, was not a tax, but a great boon to the workingman, by alleging that the only reason the laborer in this country receives more than in Europe is because he accomplishes more; that really our high-paid laborer, judged by the results of his work, is cheaper than that of the British workman.

This explanation is ingenious, but unfortunately for its sponsors there are no facts to sustain this theory that laborers and employés in manufacturing industries do 50 per cent. more effective work in a given number of hours here than they do in Great Britain, and therefore obtain no more pay for a definite result. Indeed, many of Colonel Wright's comparative statistics of wages in the two countries are for piece-work in mills, and it is noticeable that the compensation per yard or cut for weaving, or per pound for spinning, maintains very nearly the same relative proportion as for work by the hour, or day, or week. The weaver who can run two, three, four, or six looms, for example, obtains 38 per cent. more in this country than in England. Moreover, it is well known to textile manufacturers that their most efficient help in many departments are English men or women, who have been trained in British mills, and who have come to this country to make themselves homes; and these employés bear witness to the fact that their pay for the same work is from 30 to 100 per cent. more here than in Great Britain. The simple fact that so many hundreds of thousands of foreigners come to our shores to improve their condition, and that none go to Europe from this country for this purpose, is a complete demonstration that they secure better wages for the same amount of work.

WHAT MAKES OUR WAGES HIGHER?

Driven to the wall, the last refuge of the free-trader is in the assumption that our protective policy has nothing to do with maintaining our higher wages, but that these are the result of our cheap land and abundant natural resources.

Undoubtedly cheap land and abundant natural resources did secure better rewards for labor in the United States than in Europe before a single manufacturing industry was established here. But is there any one who believes that our wages of labor would have gone on increasing from decade to decade, as they have, if we had not increased the opportunities of and demand for labor by introducing manufacturing industries and diversifying our employments? And how could we have successfully established and maintained these industries with our wages of labor from the start higher than in Europe, and this superiority of wages constantly increasing as new industries were opened, if we had not adopted the policy of encouraging home industries by placing protective duties on such imported articles, made by the cheaper labor of Europe, as would come into ruinous competition with similar articles which we were seeking to make at home?

"Demand and supply make wages," says the gentleman from Texas. True, with certain limitations. But the protective policy comes in to encourage and establish new industries and new opportunities for labor, and thus increases the demand and necessarily tends to raise the rate of wages, not simply in manufacturing industries, but also in every other employment within the reach of the demand for labor which they create.

IMPORTED LABOR.

The suggestion has been made that protection by means of duties against the competition of the products of foreign labor is nugatory so long as we allow the foreign laborer himself to come in freely.

I am aware that the policy of this country has always been to welcome the sober, industrious immigrant who voluntarily comes here to make for himself a permanent home and to improve his condition. I am sure that no party has advocated in the past, and no party at present advocates this policy more earnestly than the Democratic party.

Neither does this policy tend to diminish wages in this country so long as the immigration is confined to such a class of voluntary immigrants, for on landing here they will demand and receive American wages. But the class of immigrants whom we ought to repel are the contract laborers who are imported under agreements to work for wages determined abroad, and who are practically serfs. I am sure that no members of the House will go further than the friends of protection in repelling undesirable immigrants, who come here not to make for themselves homes, not to become true American citizens, and not to live and work according to American standards.

PROFITS OF MANUFACTURERS.

The gentleman from Texas devoted much time to an attempt to show that manufacturers, and not their employés, reap the whole benefit of protective duties.

The simple answer to this allegation is that the active competition going on in all kinds of business in this country prevents manufacturers from reaping larger rewards for their investments than is obtained in other kinds of business. Statistics of dividends, furnished by Mr. Edward Atkinson, an authority which the gentleman from Texas accepts as reliable, shows that the average annual profits of the manufacturing establishments of New England in the last fifteen years average only 6 per cent.

Indeed, Mr. Atkinson states that the proportion of product received by capital has been steadily declining, and that received by labor steadily increasing.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LANDES] and several other gentlemen have taken the census figures of cost of materials, wages received by labor, and value of product, and have argued that the difference between the latter and the first two combined showed the profits of the manufacturer.

When it is borne in mind that there are expenses of manufacturing amounting to from 12 to 30 per cent., of which no account is taken by the census—including taxes, fuel, lights, insurance, repairs, depreciation, freight, commissions, interest, etc.—it will be seen how misleading are conclusions as to the profits of manufacturing drawn in this careless way.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL], who claimed to speak from official statistics, capped the climax by asserting that "in 1880 the woolen manufacturers of the United States put 35 per cent. of their investment in their pockets." He figured it out in this way: Capital, ninety-six millions; cost of materials, one hundred and three-quarter millions; cost of labor, twenty-five and three-quarter millions; value of product, one hundred and sixty and one-half millions; deducting materials and labor from product leaves a balance of thirty-four millions, or 35 per cent. on capital, which the gentleman calls clean profit.

That is, according to the gentleman, it costs the woolen manufacturers nothing for taxes, insurance, superintendence, depreciation of machinery, fuel, lights, freight, repairs, commissions or interest, etc., expenses which are put by woolen manufacturers at not less than 25 per cent., and many claim 30 per cent. Some of the manufacturers who have found it hard work to make 6 per cent. on the average on their investments would like to employ the gentleman from Virginia to run their mills without any expense for all these items. The gentleman evidently forgot that the census did not undertake to give the cost of manufacturing outside of materials and labor.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON] read approvingly a newspaper article asserting that capital invested in manufacturing paid more than capital invested in farming, proving the assertion by the assumption that there are no expenses in manufacturing except for materials and labor in the processes of manufacture.

Indeed, nearly every speaker who has opposed protection has woven into his argument in some form a demonstration based on this uncandid, I hope not intentional concealment of essential facts. Yet persons unfamiliar with all the facts will accept the conclusions as a demonstration, in utter ignorance of the fact that they have been furnished only a part of the statistics necessary to form a correct judgment.

THE BLANKET AGAIN.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], who selected several articles in which the materials compose the principal part of the cost, and in which the labor in the process of manufacture is very small, was similarly uncandid in his treatment of the profits of manufacturers. I quote from his speech, as follows:

I find in the report one pair of 5-pound blankets; the whole cost as stated by the manufacturer is $2.51. The labor cost he paid for making them is 35 cents. The present tariff is $1.90. Here is $1.55 in this tariff over and above the entire labor cost of these blankets. The poor laborer who made the blankets gets 35 cents, and the manufacturer keeps the $1.90. The bill takes off 90 cents of the tariff duty.

A manufacturer informs me that a pair of blankets of this grade costs $2 for wool and 50 cents for labor and incidental expenses, and sells here at wholesale for $2.75 and in England for about $2.

In the first place the duty on a pair of 5-pound imported blankets of the quality referred to (for such goods, which are always undervalued in exporting, would not be valued on the invoice at over $1.50, or 30 cents per pound) is only 10 cents per pound (50 cents) compensatory duty as an equivalent for the duty on the wool, and 35 per cent. ad valorem (52½ cents) manufacturer's protective duty; total $1.02½, instead of $1.90. Secondly, the manufacturer's duty would be only 52½ cents, the 50 cents going to the wool-grower, so that if the manufacturer pocketed the whole of the duty which protects the labor in building and running the mill he would get only 52½ cents instead of $1.90. Thirdly, the bill as proposed by the Ways and Means Committee reduces the duty only 50 cents—the amount of the wool duty—leaving the manufacturer 40 per cent. on this quality of blankets, instead of 35 per cent.; and this is to make up the difference in cost of labor, not simply in the process of manufacturing, but in preparing the materials, building the mill, and machinery, repairs, superintendence, etc.

PROTECTION BENEFITS ALL.

What I have said, Mr. Chairman, suggests the answer to another assumption of the President in his tariff-essay message, and of the gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to our protective tariff—that however useful our protective tariff may be in maintaining the wages and improving the condition of the 3,837,112 operatives and employés in manufacturing and mining, yet it does not benefit the 1,810,256 persons employed in trade or transportation, the 4,074,238 persons engaged in professional and personal service, and the 7,670,493 persons employed in agriculture.

BENEFITS THE FARMER.

It is contended that whatever benefits other citizens may receive from the protective system yet farmers can get none of them, as they must sell their products at prices fixed in foreign markets, whether sold at home or abroad. This is the point of the question put to me by the gentleman from Minnesota. There can, of course, be no pretense that the foreign markets have anything to do with the prices of protected farm products entirely consumed at home, and these comprise about everything raised here except wheat, corn, meats, cotton, and tobacco. The prices of such farm products are determined by the activity and extent of the home demand and home supply. When the demand is improved by the establishment of manufacturing industries in any community the farmer reaps the benefit in better prices. But even in the case of such farm products as wheat, corn, and beef and pork, of which we send a surplus to foreign countries, the prices obtained in foreign markets are determined more by the quantity of the surplus which we must sell than by any other condition. When our surplus is very large in comparison with the requirements abroad, prices are sure to fall in foreign markets. When our surplus is small, prices abroad are sure to rise. Therefore such a development of manufacturing industries at home as increases our domestic consumption and provides employments outside of the farm will not only secure better prices for wheat, corn, and beef and pork consumed at home, but also better prices abroad.

One gentleman even went so far as to assert that wages in non-protected industries are higher than in protected industries, intimating that he referred to carpenters, masons, etc.

Now the protective system is incomplete if it has not imposed a duty on every article which can be produced or made here to the extent of our wants when that article can be imported so as to come into competition with the home product. I know of no omission in our tariff schedules.

Neither the work of the carpenter, nor of the mason, nor of the man engaged in any other pursuit in this country, nor of the farmer is left in an exposed condition. Each is protected. Indeed, much of the opportunity to work and to sell products at home depends upon the building of mills, shops, boarding-houses, etc., for manufacturing, and the establishment of new industries. There is no unprotected industry, and wages in each industry in any community stand on a common basis, varying according to the skill required and the continuity of employment.

I have no doubt that if I could sit down with the President, or with most of the gentlemen on this floor who have declared that only the owners and employés of manufacturing establishments are benefited by the protective policy which has built them up, I should ascertain on inquiry that all know, as I do, of scores of rural communities where the farmers found it difficult to barter at low prices the surplus produce of their farms at the country store, where there were few opportunities for the young men and young women to earn a pittance now and then at odd jobs, where a few mechanics obtained a difficult support, suddenly transformed by the erection of manufacturing establishments into busy communities where the farmers found a ready market, at good prices, for everything they could raise, where the young men and young women found ready employment at good wages at home, where hundreds of mechanics had enough to do at liberal wages, and where thrift and progress took the place of listlessness and decay.

Yet such illustrations as these of the general benefits arising from the diversification of industries are at hand from one end of the country to the other. Wherever manufacturing industries go they benefit the farmer by giving a home market at better prices, by reducing the surplus to be sent abroad and thereby improving the prices of his products in foreign markets, and by furnishing employment for thousands of men who would otherwise crowd to the farm and glut the market for farm products. This is in addition to the direct benefit derived by the duties on wool and farm products, which prevent Canadian and South American competition. Such industries benefit the mechanic by enlarging the opportunities for his labor in building and repairing mills, houses for operatives, and machinery, and thus improve his wages by increasing the demand for his services. They benefit the men engaged in transportation, in professional services, in trade, and in every occupation by increasing business and enlarging the opportunities for service.

In short, there is not a single citizen who does not feel in his own occupation the beneficial influence of that policy which builds up manufacturing industries and diversifies occupations.

It should be borne in mind that the only proper way in which the effect of protective duties can be tested is by comparing the results of a protective with an anti-protective system. The ordinary free-trade method of arguing that because a single article might be taken from the protected list and put on the free-list, with a temporary reduction of price, and without a material disturbance of the general prosperity, therefore it would be an advantage to put all other articles on the free-list and come down to a free-trade basis, is unsound. To allow one citizen to import goods free of duty, or to allow a few articles to be imported, would benefit the person or persons thus favored, and at the same time preserve to them all the advantages of a system which maintained that high degree of general prosperity which protection secures. But when the protection system is abandoned and the country comes down to a free-trade or revenue basis, then the conditions are entirely changed, and whatever is gained by a reduction of price of articles for consumption is more than offset by the lower wages and diminished value of the services with which every man supplies his wants.

THE OBJECT OF PROTECTION.

The simple object sought in imposing protective duties on imported articles which can be produced or made here to the extent of our wants is not to tax our own citizens, the purpose being to practically compel the foreigner to pay the duty in order to get his goods into our markets, but to encourage the production and manufacture of such articles at home, in the belief that a policy which secures this result in preference to sending abroad for such articles increases the opportunities for the use of our labor and adds to the prosperity of our people.

To sum up, the protectionist policy is based on the view that we have here a great country, covering a wide variety of climate, soil, and natural resources, peopled by an intelligent and ambitious population, who have founded a popular government resting on the idea of equality and the elevation of labor; that in order to maintain these conditions and make the most of our heritage our great resources should be developed by producing and manufacturing at home everything that can be made or produced here without natural disadvantages; and that this can be done and at the same time the higher wages in this country as compared with Europe maintained only through holding so far as possible our own markets, the best in the world, for our own industries, by imposing duties, protective duties, on the products made in foreign countries by cheaper labor when they seek to enter our markets.

THE PERCENTAGE ARGUMENT.

In this connection it is interesting to note the peculiar methods adopted by our free-trade friends to prove that this country prospered more highly in the revenue-tariff period before the war than since the war under protection.

My distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] has done this by the percentage device. Every mathematician understands that a given sum is a much larger percentage of a small amount than of a large amount. For example, a man may boast that at one decennial period of his life (between ten and twenty years) his age increased 100 per cent., but that in another decennial period of his life (between fifty and sixty) his age increased only 20 per cent. But if he should gravely argue that his age increased five times as fast in the latter period as the former, he would be laughed at.

Yet the gentleman from Kentucky gravely argues that an increase of eleven and one-half millions in population between 1870 and 1880 was less than an increase of seven and one-half millions between 1850 and 1860; and an increase of 21,600 miles in railroad mileage between 1850 and 1860 was greater than an increase of 41,600 miles between 1870 and 1880.

Surely anything can be proved by figures when used in such a way as this.

THE "LOW" PROTECTION DODGE.

Right here, Mr. Chairman, I wish to notice one defense of the pending bill, which seeks to put protectionists off their guard.

It is said that this bill does not deprive our industries of just protection; it simply substitutes low protection for high protection.

This sounds well, especially as coming from those who declare that protection is "robbery," but will deceive no one unless he desires to be deceived.

In the first place, no one will deny that the pending bill proposes by one blow to sweep away all protection from our citizens engaged in manufacturing lumber, lime, wood and chemical pulp, brick, and many other articles, and also from our farmers engaged in producing wool, flax, potatoes, vegetables, meats, and many other articles.

Certainly the bill proposes free trade as to all these important industries.

DIFFERENT TREATMENT OF NORTHERN AND SOUTHERN FARMERS.

It would be interesting to inquire how it happens that the farmers and the industries carried on mainly in the Republican States are so selected for slaughter, while such crude articles as iron ore and coal are left with the old protective duties. It would undoubtedly afford materials for an interesting chapter if we could know the negotiations which led to the retention in the pending bill of a duty of 68 per cent. on such articles of food as sugar and rice, agricultural products of Democratic Southern States, while Northern agricultural products, with which the Canadians can compete, are put on the free-list.

Would the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] be quite as jubilant over this bill as he appeared the other day if rice should be cut down from 65 per cent. to the same basis as the Northern farmer's wool and other products? Or would the gentlemen from Louisiana see in this bill quite as much "revenue reform" as they do now if sugar should be reduced from 82 per cent. to the 30 per cent. duty fixed by the much-admired tariff of 1846, or to the 24 per cent. of the more admired tariff of 1857, or be placed on the free-list, as they perhaps propose to vote to put manufactured lumber and lime and wood-pulp?

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] congratulated the country that "we have reached a point for the consideration of a bill looking to the reduction of the taxes on the necessaries of life." Surely there is not much reason for congratulation on this score in view of a bill which proposes to impose a "tax" of 65 per cent. on rice and 68 per cent. on sugar—two articles which by common consent are as necessary as flour in every poor man's family, and articles, too, produced to so small an extent in this country that the duty is nearly all added to the price. [Applause.]

THE DANGER AHEAD.

But what I desire to call the attention of the committee and the country to is the fact that the reduction of duties proposed by this bill on imported manufactured goods is at those points where already the duties are perilously near the dividing-line between the encouragement and discouragement of importations, and where further reduction will swell importations, increase the revenue, and deprive our own industries and labor of the opportunity to supply our own markets.

So far as the common cotton, and woolens used by the masses of the people are concerned, with the exception of worsteds, we are successfully holding our own markets; but the duties on fine cottons and woolens are so perilously near the dividing-line between protection and free trade that millions of dollars of these goods are being imported annually, when the duties ought to be strengthened so as to have them all made here. Yet, with these facts staring us in the face, the pending bill proposes to reduce the duties on fine cottons and fine woolens to an extent that will certainly swell importations and increase the revenue and leave us neither high nor low protection, for no duty can be called a protective duty unless it is sufficiently high to discourage importations.

We have, for example, a duty of 1 cent per pound on tin-plate—"low protection," my friend from Texas will perhaps say. I reply, that is not a protective duty, but an ideal revenue duty, because it is so low that not a pound of tin-plate can be made in this country, and every sheet of our tin is imported. Practically it is free trade.

And it may not be out of place here to ask my friend from Texas how it happens—in view of his assertion that a given result can be produced here by labor as cheaply as in England—that we can not manufacture tin-plate at all in this country, notwithstanding we have iron ore in abundance and tin on the free-list, and there is a duty of 1 cent per pound on imported tin-plate?

COARSE COTTONS ALWAYS PROTECTED.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL], in calling attention to the fact that the cotton mills of New England which manufacture coarse cottons were established and prospered under the "low tariff" of 1846, has not, as he supposes, shown that low revenue duties are as favorable for manufacturing interests as protective duties. The rates of duty on coarse cottons provided by the tariff of 1846 were amply protective in view of the fact that the labor cost of this class of goods is very small in proportion to cost of material. And it is worthy of notice that when the rates of duty have been continued through all tariffs so high on an article which can be made to the extent of our wants as to shut out foreign competition prices have been reduced the most by exclusively home competition. This has been the case with not only coarse cottons, but with boots and shoes, where the duty has been practically prohibitory.

DUTIES UNDER DIFFERENT TARIFFS.

In this connection I desire to call attention to the unfair methods which have been adopted to create the impression that the duties on imports under the present tariff are much higher than have been known under previous tariffs.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has called attention to the misleading character of comparisons simply of dutiable lists under different tariffs without also comparing free-lists. As he well said, on such a deceptive basis goods to the value of fifty millions might be put on the free-list, yet without any increase of the rates of the dutiable list it would appear as if the duties had been increased if we should look only at that list.

Obviously the only fair comparison of tariffs is to include both the free and dutiable lists. On this basis the average duty on all imports during the past year was only 31 per cent., against 26 per cent. under the tariff of 1846, and 45 per cent. under the tariff of 1824. Indeed, if the duty on sugar, which was the equivalent of 82 per cent. ad valorem on the imports of last year, had been only 30 per cent., as under the tariff of 1846, the average rate on all imports free and dutiable would have been only 28 per cent., substantially the same as under the tariff of 1846.

It is the enormous duty of 82 per cent. on sugar, it should be observed, which made the average ad valorem duty on imports 47 per cent. the last year, against 41 per cent. under the same tariff in 1883. If sugar is excluded from the account, the average duty on dutiable goods is 38 per cent., and on all imports only 27 per cent. [Applause.]

It is sufficient to say that in consequence of systematic undervaluations, an apparent ad valorem duty of 40 per cent. affords in textile goods hardly more protection than a specific duty equivalent to 30 per cent.

When the gentleman from Texas says that the woolen manufacturer is protected by a duty of 66 per cent. he conveys a wrong impression to men who do not understand that the manufacturer and his employés are protected by only an ad valorem duty of 35 per cent. on common woolens and 40 per cent. on fine woolens—the balance of the duty being simply compensatory for the duty on wool.

HOW TO REDUCE THE REVENUE.

It is obvious from what I have already said that so far as the Mills bill reduces the duty on imported manufactures it will not reduce, but increase the revenue by swelling importations to take the place of our domestic products. For this reason in these particulars it is not a bill to reduce, but to increase what are improperly styled war taxes.

So far as the bill abolishes the internal-revenue tax on tobacco—in which I concur, except that I would sweep away all the tobacco taxes—the bill will reduce the revenue. I would also abolish the tax on alcohol used in the arts and manufactures. These two items would make a reduction of $35,000,000.

I would then reduce the enormous duty of 82 per cent. on sugar, a necessary article of food, to the average duty borne by products similarly advanced, and this would reduce the revenue $30,000,000 more.

If it is probable that we can develop the manufacture of sugar in this country (which we have not been able to do after forty years' trial, for the reason that nature is against us), I would resort to the bounty system by which France and Germany developed their beet-sugar industry. But under no circumstances can there be an excuse for maintaining a duty of 82 per cent. on sugar, or 68 per cent. as proposed by the pending bill, when the product is so small here that the duty is inevitably nearly all added to the price.

Then I would correct the inequalities of the tariff at other points; as, for example, in the Treasury ruling that worsteds are not woolens, and in general seek to substitute specific for ad valorem duties, in order that the duties might be determined by our lawmakers rather than by the European exporter, and thereby secure our own markets more completely for our own industries and our own labor.

FREE RAW MATERIALS.

Mr. Chairman, it is significant that within a few years our free-trade or revenue-tariff friends—for in the popular use of these two terms both mean the same thing—have abandoned to a certain extent their direct assault on protection and are now attempting to circumvent it by what might be called in military phrase a flank movement. They have suddenly discovered that manufacturers are not so great "robbers" as they were a few years ago, but are rather objects of pity because of the burdens they have to bear in "taxed raw materials." The free-trade slogan to-day is not so much free manufactured products as "free raw materials."

I remember when the distinguished Congressman from, and now mayor of, New York appeared in this House as the John the Baptist of this movement, and almost literally cried alone in the wilderness of this Chamber for "free raw materials," which then meant "free iron ore" and "free coal," both of which he told us are indispensable to the success of our manufacturing industries.

In the Forty-ninth Congress the distinguished gentleman who then was at the head of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. Morrison, became a "free raw-material" disciple, which then came to mean free coal, free iron ore, and free sawed lumber.

In the present Congress my excellent friend, the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], whose fiery rhetorical lances have been thrown at the "robber" manufacturers so many times in this Chamber, started out, not like Saul of Tarsus on his way to Damascus, but like Paul on his great missionary tour to the unbelieving Gentiles, to convert the heathen manufacturers of Rhode Island by the tender of "free raw materials," which had come to mean free wool, free lime, free manufactured lumber, free wood-pulp, and free Canadian farm products, but by some mysterious interposition no longer free coal and free iron ore.

The distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], re-enforcing the alluring word-picture of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, pointed out that with the cheaper wool, cheaper farm products, cheaper lumber, and cheaper lime, secured by allowing South American wool and Canadian farm products, lumber, and lime to be imported free of duty, while retaining liberal duties on manufactured goods, Rhode Island textile establishments and their operatives would prosper.

An inventory of the net results of this "free-raw-material" missionary tour appeared a few weeks ago in the election returns from Rhode Island. I violate no confidence when I suggest that the investment proved ruinous.

The truth is that the "free-raw-material" scheme is unjust and indefensible, except in the view that free trade is the goal aimed at and "free raw materials" only a stepping-stone.

In the first place the use of the term "raw" is misleading. Strictly speaking, raw materials are only those to which no labor has been added—ore in the mine, timber in the forest, lime-rock in the quarry, or land untouched by the hand of man and untilled and ungrazed. These are as cheap and abundant in this country as anywhere on the face of the earth.

But why is it that the moment these really raw materials are touched by our labor and prepared for man's use they begin to cost more than the same materials abroad? Simply because the labor that is employed in transforming these raw materials into useful forms is paid higher wages in this country. If similar quantities of labor cost no more here than in other countries, then the ore at the furnace, the lime at the kiln, the manufactured lumber at the mill, the wool in the fleece, and the hay, potatoes, vegetables, peas, beans, and grain on the farm, and other materials used in more advanced manufactures could be produced as cheaply here as in Canada or South America.

In other words, we are prevented from producing these materials as cheaply as they can be produced in other countries for the same reason that cotton can not be manufactured into fine goods, that wool can not be made into fine cloths, that ore can not be made into pig or bar iron, that leather can not be made into boots and shoes; in short, that any manufactured article in which labor is a large element can not be made in the United States as cheaply as in Europe, namely, because our labor costs more.

Now, my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. MILLS] comes in with a bill to make wool, lime, manufactured lumber, wood and chemical pulp, and farm products cheaper by allowing them to be imported free of duty from other countries where the labor required to produce these materials is cheaper than here. This, he tells the House and the country, will be a good thing to do.

Now, what I desire to ask the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee is, if it is a good thing to avail ourselves of the manufactured lumber, the wood pulp, the lime, the wool, and the farm products supplied by the cheaper labor of other countries, and give up producing these articles here, or else bring our labor down to the foreign standard, why then is it not a good, aye, a better, thing to also allow all the more advanced manufactures which can be made abroad more cheaply by labor paid less wages than here to come in free of duty. [Applause.]

WHY ABANDON LUMBER, LIME AND FARM WORKERS?

In other words, will any gentleman tell me why the labor employed in manufacturing lumber, wood pulp, and lime, and producing wool and farm products is not entitled to the same protection, proportioned to its quantity and character, as the labor employed in other industries?

The lumber industry is carried on in nearly every State. The value of the product in 1880 was $233,268,729; number of men employed, 147,956; wages paid laborers, $31,845,974. The value of the product of manufactured lumber is as much as that of the iron industry, more than that of either cotton, wool, or leather, and more than that of the carriage, furniture, glass and hardware industries combined.

Will any gentleman tell me why so important an industry is to be subjected to unrestricted Canadian competition? Or will any one tell me why the laborers who make lime at $2 per day in this country, are to be driven to the wall by Canadian lime manufacturers who pay only $1.25 per day? Or why our large and growing wood and chemical pulp industries should be destroyed by putting their products on the free-list?

THE FOREIGN-MARKET DELUSION.

The chief reason given by the gentleman from Texas for placing on the free-list these so-called "raw materials" was to thereby cheapen our manufactured products, so as to be able to better compete with European manufacturing nations in foreign markets.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] seemed to think that if we only had free wool our woolen-mills would at once be able to find valuable foreign markets for their goods. And yet in the same speech he showed that with the free raw material of cotton we exported last year cotton goods to the value of less than $15,000,000, and these all of the coarsest variety, while we imported fine cotton goods to the value of nearly $29,000,000.

Now, if with the raw material of cotton cheaper than our British competitors we are able to export only a few goods, in which there is but a fraction of labor, how does the gentleman suppose we should be able to compete in foreign markets with woolen goods in which the labor is a much larger element?

No, Mr. Chairman, free wool would not add to our foreign markets for woolen goods so long as our labor costs so much more than does the labor of our foreign competitors. That is the sole reason why we can not compete in foreign markets with manufactured articles into which much labor enters, except in cases of specialties which circumstances have made peculiar to this country.

Indeed, if any manufacturer thinks that he can successfully compete with foreign manufacturers in foreign countries provided he can have the privilege of importing materials free of duty, he can take advantage of section 3019 of the Revised Statutes, which permits the importation of materials for articles for export on payment of a duty of only 10 per cent., and there would be no objection among protectionists to removing even the 10 per cent. duty. I introduced a bill to this effect and had it referred to the Committee on Ways and Means at the beginning of this session, but notwithstanding the apparent zeal of the majority of that committee for free raw materials in order to increase our exports, the bill sleeps the sleep of death in the committee-room.

VALUE OF OUR HOME MARKETS.

Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to be misunderstood in reference to the desirability of extending our foreign markets as much as possible. Let that be done, but in such a way that it will not surrender much more valuable home markets. A lowering of duties on imported articles which we can produce here to the extent of our wants, for the ostensible purpose of cheapening production so as to enable us to compete more successfully in foreign markets, would inevitably surrender a hundred dollars to foreign producers in our home markets in exchange for the bare possibility of obtaining a trade of $10 in foreign markets.

Have gentlemen who talk so admiringly of new foreign markets and so depreciatingly of our home markets considered that the markets of the United States consume more products than are consumed by Great Britain and exported from Great Britain, France, Germany, Russia, Holland, and Austria combined?

Great stress is laid upon the large products of Great Britain. Yet the consumption of products per capita in the United States is greater than the consumption and exports of the United Kingdom per capita.

According to Mulhall, in 1880 the total production of the United Kingdom was six thousand two hundred millions, or $172 per inhabitant, of which $136 was consumed at home and $36 exported.

According to the estimates of Mr. Nimmo, of the Bureau of Statistics, the total production of the United States in the same year was ten thousand millions, or $200 per inhabitant, of which $183 was consumed at home and $17 exported.

The value of our products of agriculture in 1880 was three thousand six hundred millions, of which 85 per cent.—92 per cent., excluding cotton and tobacco—was consumed at home, while the value of the products of British agriculture was only thirteen hundred millions.

We are already the largest manufacturing nation in the world. The value of our product of manufactures, mining, and forestry in 1880 was nearly five thousand five hundred millions—six hundred and fifty millions more than the similar products of Great Britain, of which five thousand three hundred and sixty-two millions was consumed at home and one hundred and thirty-eight millions exported. Indeed, our home market consumed more manufactured products than the combined home consumption and exports of Great Britain.

The value of the products of our leather industries, including the manufacture of boots and shoes, in 1880 was four hundred and fifty-four millions—two and a half times that of Great Britain—of which four hundred and forty-seven millions was consumed at home.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] conveyed the impression the other day that by putting hides on the free-list in 1871 we paved the way for an export of boots and shoes. But we have done nothing of the kind, our total exports in this line last year reaching only $700,000. We have only held our own markets since 1871, precisely the same as we did before, simply because the 30 per cent. duty on goods in which the materials compose so large a part of the cost was ample to keep out foreign competition. If this duty should be removed it would not be long before the boot and shoe industry would begin to feel the effect of French and English boots and shoes.

The value of our woolen manufactures in 1880—that industry which the gentleman from Indiana pictured as well nigh extinct for want of free wool—was two hundred and seventy-three millions, or forty-eight millions more than the value of the woolen manufactures of Great Britain, of which nearly all was consumed at home.

I am ready to co-operate in any feasible measure which will tend to increase our export trade, but excuse me from sharing in the responsibility of any movement looking to the surrender of such a magnificent home market as ours in the vain hope that in some already gorged foreign market—gorged, too, with the products of cheaper labor—we can make up the loss.

THE BARTER FALLACY.

But I hear the gentleman from Texas asserting that foreigners will not buy of us unless we open to them our markets for manufactured goods, which we can and ought to make for ourselves.

To this proposition I reply that foreigners will buy what they need where they can buy the cheapest, as we do, without regard to whether they can or can not sell their manufactured products to us. Let my friend consult the last report of the Bureau of Statistics on commerce, and he will find that our exports to each foreign country do not have the slightest reference to our imports from that country.

We exported last year to Great Britain (omitting fractions) products to the value of three hundred and sixty-three millions, but imported from that country only one hundred and sixty-five millions.

We imported from the West Indies seventy millions, but exported only twenty-four and three-quarter millions. Has the gentleman heard from any one in this country who proposed to stop buying sugar in Cuba because she buys so little of us?

We imported almost fifty-three millions from Brazil, but Brazil bought of us only eight millions.

What becomes of the doctrine that we can sell only as we buy, in the light of such facts as these?

PROTECTION FAVORABLE TO FOREIGN TRADE.

Mr. Chairman, it must not be assumed, as has been charged, that on the whole the protective policy is less favorable to a development of our foreign trade than such a tariff policy as prevailed before the war.

On the contrary, it is the claim of protectionists that the policy which builds up home manufactures and diversifies our home industries results in such increased prosperity to the people that they on the one hand produce more, and on the other hand demand more of such imports as they do not produce than they would have consumed under a policy which discouraged home industries.

The proof of this claim is to be found in a comparison of the exports and imports under the revenue-tariff period between 1846 and 1861 with those under the protective period between 1865 and 1881.

In the revenue-tariff decade between 1851 and 1861 our annual imports, per capita, averaged $10.73, and our exports $9.94; annual foreign trade, $20.67 per inhabitant.

In the protective-tariff decade between 1871 and 1881, our annual imports averaged, per capita, $13.50 and our exports $14.93. Annual foreign trade $28.43 per inhabitant.

It will be observed that our exports and imports per inhabitant were nearly 50 per cent. greater in the protective decade than in the revenue-tariff decade.

This result, as disclosed by the official report, ought to silence the charge that the protective system destroys our foreign trade. The truth is that our foreign commerce with every country in the world never grew so rapidly as it has since the war under the protective policy. If the carrying of this commerce had been retained by American shipping we should to-day have a tonnage in the foreign trade of five times as large as it is.

In 1865, when our civil war closed, the value of our foreign commerce was $404,774,883. In 1881 the value of this commerce had increased to $1,545,041,974, a growth in sixteen years of almost 300 per cent. The increase of our foreign commerce from 1846 to 1861 was only 70 per cent.; and yet there are many persons who are constantly asserting that the palmy days of our foreign commerce were under the tariffs of 1846 and 1861, and that the high tariffs since the war have destroyed our foreign trade.

There are those who are adverting in and out of season to the "unexampled" growth of the foreign commerce of Great Britain in the last twenty years. I desire to call attention to the fact that in 1865 the foreign commerce of the United Kingdom was valued at $2,384,117,140, and in 1881, it was $3,377,863,266, an increase of only 50 per cent., or only one-sixth of the increase of the foreign commerce of the United States. Even including the war period, when the foreign commerce of this country was so seriously impaired and that of Great Britain so prosperous, the statistics show that the value of the foreign commerce of the United Kindom increased between 1860 and 1885 only 83 per cent., that of France 80 per cent., and that of the United States 95 per cent.

In other words, the foreign commerce of the United States has increased since 1860 more rapidly than that of Great Britain or that of any other nation. Gentlemen who find it convenient to lament what they call the "decline" of our foreign commerce, and point to the growth of English commerce as something which "our blind protective policy" prevents us from attaining unto, should consult the official statistics.

OUR EXPORT TRADE.

Again, there is no basis for the oft-repeated assertion that the protective tariffs of the United States since 1861 have restricted the export trade of the United States, which, it is assumed, the revenue tariffs in force from 1846 to 1861 had specially fostered.

According to the official statement of Mr. Evans, of the Treasury Department, our exports increased only 16½ per cent. in the revenue-tariff decade between 1851 and 1861, or 60 per cent. if the years 1850 and 1860 are compared; while in the protective decades between 1861 and 1871 our exports increased 146 per cent., and between 1871 and 1881 increased 59¾ per cent. Our total exports in the decade ending with 1860 were eight hundred and fourteen and one-half millions; in the decade ending with 1880 they were fifty-one hundred and twelve millions.

Comparing population and exports, and the official statistics show that in the decade between 1851 and 1871 our annual exports were $10.66 per inhabitant; and in the decade between 1871 and 1881 they rose to $14.93 per inhabitant, and in 1883 to $15.25 per inhabitant.

With an official showing of annual exports of only $9.94 per inhabitant in the revenue-tariff decade between 1851 and 1861, and of $14.93 per inhabitant in the protective decade between 1871 and 1881, it is time that the oft-repeated assumption that protection has destroyed our foreign export trade should no longer be used by men who profess to seek the truth.

Side by side with the official evidence that our foreign exports per inhabitant are 50 per cent. larger under protection than they were under a revenue tariff, having risen from $228,699,486 in 1861 to $898,452,891 in 1881, I wish to place the additional fact that this growth of exports has not been solely in crude products, as many of our free-trade friends aver, but that the growth of our exports of partially and wholly manufactured articles has been even more rapid than the growth of our exports of crude articles.

In the decade between 1851 and 1861 official statistics show that only 16¾ per cent. of our exports were manufactured goods and only 16 per cent. partially manufactured; but in the decade between 1871 and 1881 20 per cent. of our exports were manufactured, rising in 1883 to 23 per cent. manufactured, and 22½ per cent. partially manufactured.

The growth of our exports of manufactured goods will be clearly seen by any one who will take the trouble to examine the official statistics. In the decade between 1851 and 1861 no agricultural implements were exported; but in the decade between 1873 and 1883 the value of these implements exported was twenty-seven millions. In the first decade not a single watch or clock was exported; in the last decade watches to the value of $600,000 and clocks to the value of ten millions. In the first decade forty millions in value of iron and steel were exported; in the last decade one hundred and fifty millions. In the first decade leather and leather goods to the value of ten millions were exported; in the last decade seventy-eight millions. In the first decade manufactures of wood to the value of eighty-seven millions were exported, and in the last decade one hundred and ninety millions.

And yet there are gentlemen who continue to gravely assert on this floor that protection has destroyed our export trade, particularly in manufactured goods, and taken away cargoes from vessels.

I desire to call the attention of gentlemen who so frequently in this Hall lament the alleged loss, through protection, of the export trade to various countries, which was supposed to have been so flourishing in the revenue period before the war, to the fact disclosed by the official statistics that there is scarcely a country to which we do not export twice as much, and in many cases three, four, and even five times as much, under our protective policy as we did under a revenue tariff.

In 1860 our exports to Russia were $2,750,000; in 1883 they were $19,000,000. In 1860 our exports to Germany were $14,750,000; in 1883, $64,250,000. In 1860 our exports to Belgium were $2,750,000; in 1883, $26,750,000. In 1860 our exports to Great Britain were $196,250,000; in 1883, $420,500,000; or, turning to the East, in 1860 our exports to Japan were $90,000; in 1883, 3,250,000. In 1860 our exports to Australia were $4,000,000; in 1883; $9,500,000. To South and Central America, which trade it has been asserted we largely held under revenue tariffs, our exports in 1860 were only $17,500,000, but in 1883, $42,500,000. Even our exports to the West India Islands have increased from $23,000,000 in 1860 to $32,250,000 in 1883.

Mr. Chairman, look in whatever direction we may to the practical results of the protective policy in the United States in the last quarter of a century, and we find abundant evidence that it has promoted in the highest degree the prosperity of our people. By common consent the United States is pointed to everywhere as the most marvelous national growth recorded in history. [Applause.]

THE DECLINE OF OUR FOREIGN CARRYING TRADE.

I forgot, Mr. Chairman, that in one particular, namely, our foreign carrying trade, and one only, it was pointed out by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN], as it has been heretofore by others, that we had retrograded rather than advanced. My friend from Tennessee went further, and charged that the decline of this foreign carrying trade is due to our protective tariff.

When the gentleman made the charge I endeavored to call his attention to the fact that the decline in our foreign carrying trade began immediately after 1855, when the revenue tariff of 1846 was in force, and that in the six years between 1855 and 1861, while this policy continued, the average annual decline was as great as since the war under the protective tariff. This is proved by the official statistics, which show that 75½ per cent. of our exports and imports were carried in American vessels in 1855, and only 69½ per cent. in 1861.

Moreover, the statistics show that in 1855 there were 507 vessels of the class used in foreign trade built in the United States, in 1859 there were 309, and in 1857 only 117. [Applause.]

Therefore there is as much reason for saying that the revenue tariff before the war caused the decline of our foreign carrying trade as there is for charging that our protective tariff brought it about.

Looking still further at the statistics, it is found that during the four years of civil war the Confederate cruisers swept more than one-third of our shipping in the foreign trade from the ocean either by capture or sale to avoid destruction, so that when the war ended in 1865 only 28 per cent. of our exports and imports were carried in American vessels.

I take it for granted that my friend from Tennessee will not charge to the protective tariff this loss of 38 per cent. of our foreign carrying trade through the ravages of the Alabama and other Confederate cruisers.

Since the war the decline has gone on year by year a little more slowly than before the war, until last year only 14 per cent of our exports and imports were carried in American vessels.

From what I have already stated it is evident that this decline is not due to a falling off of cargoes to be carried, for our exports and imports have increased in an unexampled manner. The trouble is that foreign vessels have seized upon the cargoes which ought to be carried in our own vessels.

The statement of this fact shows that our foreign carrying trade occupies a position different from that of every other industry in this country. While every other industry is protected to a greater or less extent, either directly or indirectly, from foreign competition, the foreign carrying trade alone since 1850 has been open to the free competition of British and other foreign vessels. In other words, all our domestic industries have been prospering under the policy of protection. Our foreign carrying trade has been well nigh destroyed under the policy of free trade.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman from Maine yield to me for a question?

Mr. DINGLEY. I will if my time can be extended.

Mr. McMILLIN. You can have an extension of time. What I want to know is whether the American citizen is permitted to buy free the vessel that is to run in this trade, or whether he is permitted to bring in free the materials of the ship that is to be built in this country?

Mr. DINGLEY. I will meet that point as I proceed.

Mr. McMILLIN. What I want to show is that we have not free trade in that business.

Mr. DINGLEY. In the business of the ocean carriage of our exports and imports we have had free trade.

Do not understand me as saying that any tariff has destroyed our foreign carrying trade, for tariffs have had nothing at all to do with it It is other legislation which opened our foreign carrying trade in 1850 to British competition and placed this business on a free-trade basis, thus giving an opportunity for other causes to operate against us.

This is brought into a clearer light when it is noted that our coastwise shipping, which is absolutely protected from foreign competition, has highly prospered, notwithstanding the severe competition of railways, until to-day it has a tonnage three times as large as the home fleet of Great Britain and five times as large as that of any other nation. [Great applause on the Republican side.]

Computing by the accepted rule that one ton of steam is equal in carrying power to three tons of sail, and our coastwise tonnage was in 1869 an equivalent of 4,300,892 tons of sail, and in 1887 this had increased to an equivalent of 6,075,716 tons, an increase of nearly 50 per cent. in less than twenty years.

No country on the face of the earth is able to present such a marvelous growth of home shipping, and no other country has so cheap water and rail transportation.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. May I ask the gentleman a question right there?

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Is not that partly because the cargo in the coastwise trade goes to a place where there is no duty and comes back to a place where there is no duty, although the vessel has an outgoing cargo and an incoming cargo? In other words, is not the coastwise trade carried on under absolute free trade, while the port to which and the port from which the vessel sails are absolutely without any tariff law?

Mr. DINGLEY. Let me show my friend that vessels in the foreign trade are precisely in that position. Mind you, there is no lack of cargo to be carried either way in either the foreign or the coastwise trade. We have permitted the British and other foreign vessels to come in on equal terms and take the cargoes, whereas in the coastwise trade we have excluded all except American vessels.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman from Maine not state the reasons why, in his opinion, the marine has declined?

Mr. DINGLEY. I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not like to interrupt the gentleman, but he will permit me to say that I think there are other causes for the decline of the marine than the tariff,

Mr. DINGLEY. I am glad the gentleman has reached that conclusion. I had supposed from what I had heard on the other side of the House that this was considered the sole cause, and that all we have to do to revive our foreign carrying trade is to go back to the tariff of 1846.

Mr. DOCKERY. Not by any means.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. There are other causes relating to material, naval architecture, etc.

But is it not true that one of the reasons besides what the gentleman has spoken of—the monopoly the coastwise trade has by excluding the competition of foreign vessels—is it not one of the reasons that the coastwise trade has grown because of absolute free trade between the ports between which the coastwise vessels trade? They go from one port to another, and both ports are under the same law, which as to that trade is absolute free trade.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LONG). The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. I wish to show the gentleman that his suggestion that the coastwise trade is prosperous because the vessels engaged in it have cargoes that they can take, for instance, from New York to Boston or from New York to Charleston, applies as well to the foreign trade. There is the same abundance of cargoes between Boston and Liverpool, between Boston and Havre, and between New York and any of these foreign ports. There is abundance of cargoes in each case. The difference is, we admit the British and other foreign vessels to compete with us in carrying our exports and imports, and they can beat us on free-trade principles. In the coastwise trade none but American vessels can engage.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Is it not the fact that going from Boston to Liverpool a ship takes an outgoing cargo upon which there is no duty at either port, but when it comes back it comes back with a cargo on which there is a duty? Therefore, so far as our trade is concerned, that ship-owner being obliged to be an American, and the ship, by our registry laws, being obliged to be an American ship, it can not find a cargo belonging to American owners which he can swap for a cargo that is to come to American ports, and it has to come around by Great Britain.

Mr. DINGLEY. But that makes no difference with the carrying trade. The American vessel is not obliged to carry a cargo that belongs to Americans any more than the British vessel is obliged to carry a cargo that belongs to a British subject. There are abundant cargoes to be carried between all the ports of this country and of other countries. There is no trouble on that score. The difficulty is not that the American vessel has not the same chance as the British; the trouble is that it has no better chance, and it is beaten in the race of competition because it costs more to run an American vessel than a British vessel on account of our higher wages of labor and better fare. Therefore the gentleman's comparison between the ocean carrying trade and the coastwise trade is not pertinent at all, because both have an abundance of cargo to carry.

Furthermore, the gentleman says that the coastwise trade is a monopoly. Of course the inference to be drawn is that our people pay a great deal higher rates than are paid to the similar home fleets of other nations. Now, it is a fact that there is no people on the face of the earth who get their coastwise carrying trade done cheaper than the American people do, because we have reserved that whole business to our own vessels, so that they are encouraged to go on and build up their business without any fear of being suddenly driven off by foreign competition.

Mr. DOCKERY. In other words, there is competition and yet no "trusts" in the coastwise merchant marine.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. That is, competition has made the coastwise trade very cheap and valuable, while competition has made the ocean carrying trade utterly valueless.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all. The theory on which protectionists proceed is this, that we are a nation of 60,000,000 people with all these advantages, and that when our people can carry on competition among themselves, knowing that they are not to be driven off by the cheaper labor of some other country whenever there happens to be some little depression of business, knowing that they have got the business to themselves, the result of competition among ourselves, and the consequent result of exciting the inventive genius of our people, gives us, in the long run, cheaper prices than we would have if we were liable at any time to be deprived of the business by foreign competition.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is it not true that the rivals abroad with whom our vessels have to compete are subsidized, while ours are not?

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, not only have we put our foreign carrying trade on a free-trade basis with respect to the competition of foreign vessels, but Great Britain, under the guise of free trade in her foreign carrying trade, has erected the most stupendous system of protection by subsidies ever known on the face of the earth. [Applause on the Republican side.]

PROTECTION FOR FARMERS.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. The gentleman has stated that except this foreign carrying trade almost every other industry in this country is protected directly or indirectly and is prosperous.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is so as a rule. Of course there are periods of depression in all kinds of business.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Is it not true that since 1855-'56, about one-third of a century, the export prices of our products have never been as low, except as I now state: Corn but once, wheat not once, wheat flour not once, cotton not once, pork but once, beef not once, butter but three times, cheese but once? If that be true, why does the gentleman say that agriculture is prosperous under his high protective tariff?

Mr. DINGLEY. I will answer that question, because I heard a gentleman here with apparent sincerity press that point with much vigor.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I press it with real sincerity, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman asks why when wheat and corn are lower than formerly that fact does not prove that protection has not advanced the interests of the farmer. The gentleman understands that the price to the farmer is what he receives on the farm, and does not the gentleman know that the cost of transportation between Minnesota, for example, and Mark Lane in London has been reduced more than 30 cents per bushel from what it was before the war, and that therefore, even if wheat in London is 30 cents lower than it was then, still the farmer gets as much or more for his wheat than he got before?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Upon what principle does the gentleman argue that because transportation has been reduced the farmer should give all the benefit of that reduction to the monopolist?

Mr. DINGLEY. But he does not.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. That is just what you said.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all. Upon the same principle, why does not the gentleman turn around and make an argument like this: The manufacturer now gets only 5 cents a yard for a product which before the war brought 10 cents a yard; therefore, has not protection been a great disadvantage to the manufacturer? Does not my friend know that the cost of production, largely through the influence of our protective system, has been greatly reduced in the manufacture of nearly all the articles which the farmer buys, and also in the production of wheat itself? Does it not cost less to produce a bushel of wheat now with all our improved farm machinery than it did thirty years ago?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Yes, and that is just——

Mr. DINGLEY. I want to add that there never has been a time when the farmer could buy so many yards of sheeting, so many yards of cloth of any kind, or so much of any product that he consumes on his farm for a bushel of wheat or a bushel of corn or a bushel of potatoes as he can to-day. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. And that is the way you explain the proposition that the farmer is benefited by protection when I ask you the question, and you can not deny that in one-third of a century farm products have never been so low as they are now.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, I want to say a word more about the farmer, although it is a little out of the line of the discussion I was pursuing. The claim of the protectionist with reference to the farmer relates not merely to what he may do with that portion of his product which he exports, but it is claimed that the home market, by reason of the diversification of industries, has been so largely increased that the farmer, instead of being obliged to ship abroad three-fourths of his product, finds a better market at home.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Does not the export price fix the price of that which is sold at home?

Mr. DINGLEY. Right on that point I wish to ask my friend a question, for if ever there was a fallacy it is right here. I want to ask the gentleman whether the price of wheat, for example, in Mark Lane is not fixed rather by the quantity of the surplus we have to send abroad than by anything which may transpire in Mark Lane? Suppose Europe wants this year 100,000,000 bushels of wheat, and no more. Now, if Russia and this country and other wheat-exporting countries have each 75,000,000 bushels to export, there being sent abroad a surplus beyond what the market demands, prices inevitably go down. But suppose that, in consequence of having a market at home for a large part of our product, we ship abroad only 25,000,000 instead of 75,000,000 bushels, thereby bringing down the quantity of wheat shipped to Europe so as to not exceed the demand, is not this home consumption as potent an influence in determining the price of wheat in Mark Lane as anything transpiring there? In other words, is not the price in Europe greatly affected when our own markets take so much of our wheat that our surplus for shipment is small?

HOME MARKETS AGAIN.

Mr. BRUMM. Will my friend from Maine allow me to put one question——

Mr. DINGLEY. I must beg to be allowed to decline. I have no right to take up the time which other gentlemen may wish to occupy.

Mr. BYNUM. I would like to ask one question if my friend from Maine will permit me.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would be very glad indeed to yield, but I do not like to occupy the time to which other gentlemen are entitled.

Mr. BYNUM. That is the very same reply which I made to the gentleman the other day when he wanted to interrogate me, yet he was very persistent.

Mr. DINGLEY. Very well; I will hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. BYNUM. Does the gentleman know that the percentage of agricultural products exported now is greater than in the period from 1850 to 1860?

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand that, for we are exporting many kinds of agricultural products that Europe has begun to demand within a few years.

Mr. BYNUM. Then how is a home market being created when the percentage of exports is larger?

Mr. DINGLEY. We have been settling new agricultural lands with immigrants who have rapidly increased our agricultural products, but at the same time our home demand has been rapidly increasing.

Mr. BYNUM. Does not the gentleman know that we are manufacturing now more than we can consume?

Mr. DINGLEY. This is hardly so. Last year we imported $44,902,718 in woolen goods, $49,293,163 in iron and steel, $28,940,353 in cotton goods, $21,933,028 in linen and jute goods, $31,347,923 in silk goods, $11,199,945 in leather and leather goods, $7,319,895 in glassware, and over $25,000,000 of other manufactures—over $220,000,000 in the aggregate—all of which we ought to have manufactured ourselves.

OUR FOREIGN-CARRYING TRADE AGAIN.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, for the reason that in former debates on this subject of the decline of our foreign carrying trade, I have always understood him to maintain that neither high nor low tariffs have affected this matter.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am not arguing that the tariff has anything to do with this question.

Mr. DOCKERY. You are discussing the question of "free trade."

Mr. DINGLEY. I am not contending that the tariff has anything to do with the decline of our carrying trade.

Mr. CASWELL. I hope that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] may be allowed to conclude his remarks without further interruption. Gentlemen who are to follow in this debate have some interest in the consumption of time; and these interruptions are hardly fair to them.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from Maine has not hesitated to put questions when other gentlemen were on the floor. I would be glad to ask him a question on a point upon which he interrogated me a few days ago.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would be very glad to answer questions to any extent, if I could do so without interfering with the rights of other gentlemen.

Mr. McMILLIN. The question I wanted to ask, if the gentleman will permit, is this——

Mr. DINGLEY. I will yield.

Mr. McMILLIN. When I was arguing the other day that the tariff had had a depressing effect upon our foreign carrying trade, the gentleman from Maine denied the statement, and said that the deterioration had begun before the present rates of tariff were inaugurated. In view of that statement, I wish to know why he contends to-day that foreign competition or "free trade" has destroyed our foreign carrying business, and protection has preserved intact our coastwise shipping.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not the protective tariff, but protection in the broad sense.

Mr. McMILLIN. I did not understand the gentleman to make any such distinction. He contended farther that the reverse of protection has destroyed our foreign carrying trade.

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLIN. Now, if a non-protective policy has destroyed our foreign-carrying trade, why did the decline begin at the time the gentleman mentioned—before the present tariff rates came into operation?

Mr. DINGLEY. Because under the tariff of 1846 there was no protection for our carrying trade any more than there is now. Our discriminating charges against British vessels, which were abrogated in 1850, protected our foreign carrying trade up to that time.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then the tariff has had nothing to do with it?

Mr. DINGLEY. As I have said from the start, I am speaking of the principle of protection and the principle of free trade. I have always contended that the change from the tariff of 1846 to the present tariff has not had anything to do with this matter. I do not think I can be misunderstood on that point. I am simply saying that we have saved our coastwise trade because we have shielded it from the competition of British and other foreign vessels, not by the tariff, but directly by the navigation laws; and we have lost the foreign carrying trade because we have not shielded it from direct foreign competition since 1850.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, solely for information, because I know he is thoroughly familiar with this subject. Has the gentleman himself made any calculation or investigation as to the amount of money which is annually paid to foreign ship-owners for our foreign carrying trade?

Mr. DINGLEY. It is not far from $150,000,000 annually.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Are there not two principal reasons for the decline of our foreign merchant marine: first, the fact that it costs $100,000 to $150,000 more to construct an American ship than to build a foreign vessel; and second (this being the more important reason), the fact that the daily operating expenses of a foreign vessel are from 30 to 35 per cent. less than those of an American vessel?

Mr. DINGLEY. The last reason practically presents the difficulty that meets us.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. In an American-built vessel which costs $500,000, 95 per cent. of the cost is labor.

SHIP-BUILDING UNDER DIFFERENT TARIFFS.

Mr. DINGLEY. Inasmuch as it has been intimated that the present tariff is not so favorable for ship-building as the tariff of 1846, I desire to correct that impression. Under the tariff of 1846 all materials for the construction and repair and supplies of vessels bore a duty. Under the present tariff all lumber, timber, hemp, manilla, iron and steel rods, bars, spikes, nails, bolts, copper and composition metals, and wire rope for the construction, equipment, and repair, and all supplies of American vessels for the foreign trade, are admitted free of duty, so that on the whole the present tariff is as favorable for the construction of vessels for the foreign trade as the tariff of 1846. The difference in cost in this country and England in other materials of a vessel was as great before the war as now, so that if we had been called upon to build iron steam-ships before the war we should have had the same difficulty as now. The tariff of 1846 would not have helped us.

CAUSES OF DECLINE.

The causes of the decline of our foreign carrying trade since 1855, in the face of the unexampled increase of our exports and imports offered for transportation, must evidently be looked for entirely outside of tariffs or mere party issues. They may be briefly stated to be these:

First. The revolution from wood to iron in marine architecture, and from sails to steam in propelling power, which began to be felt about 1855. This gave England an advantage which we had so long as wooden sailing vessels controlled the commerce of the world.

Second. The admission of our great rival to our carrying trade on equal terms with our vessels about the beginning of 1850, which gave England an opportunity to use the advantage which she gained about 1855, as already stated.

Third. The adoption by England of the policy of aiding the establishment of steam-ship lines to all parts of the world by postal subsidies. The value of this aid may be appreciated when it is stated that she has expended $200,000,000 for this purpose in the last forty years, not to mention the great assistance she has given her ship yards by building 80 per cent. of her naval vessels in private establishments.

Fourth. The destruction of one-third of our merchant marine by Confederate cruisers between 1861 and 1865, and the advantage which England gained in building up great iron-ship yards while we were engrossed with war.

Fifth. A greater increase of wages of men engaged in ship-building and in the sailing of vessels in the United States in the last twenty years than in the foreign countries which are seizing upon our foreign carrying trade.

Sixth. The great opportunities for uses of capital and enterprise in building railroads, establishing manufacturing industries, and opening up the new West, which have afforded larger profits than could be obtained from the foreign carrying trade in close competition with foreign vessels. The capital and labor put into railroads in the United States in excess of that put into railways in Great Britain since 1855 would have built an ocean fleet of three times of the whole tonnage now sailing under the British flag.

AN OBJECT-LESSON IN FREE TRADE.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that our coastwise shipping has been saved and swelled to these magnificent proportions not by a protective tariff, but by protection, by legislation which directly excludes foreign competition. Our shipping in the foreign trade has been overwhelmed, not by a free-trade or revenue tariff, but by legislation which has admitted foreign vessels to open free-trade competition.

Instead of the decline of our shipping in the foreign trade, affording proof of the baneful effects of the protective principle, it is, on the other hand, an object-lesson, showing in a vivid manner the kind of destruction which would come to other industries in this country if we should open them up to the equal competition of similar foreign industries, as we have in the case of our foreign carrying trade.

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that when we admitted British vessels to participate in our foreign carrying trade on equal terms with our own, in 1850, our statesmen did not foresee that a revolution had already begun from wood to iron and sails to steam, which would deprive us of the great natural advantages we had so long as wooden sailing-vessels controlled the ocean carrying trade, through which we had been enabled to hold our own. But when this revolution began to be felt, about 1855, when British iron steam-ships, built from the ore in the mine by cheaper labor than we have, and, far more important still, manned with officers, seamen, engineers, and firemen commanding far less wages than similar employés receive on board our vessels, then the principles of free trade applied to the foreign carrying trade began to do its work, and American interests in this business began to decline.

The contest would have been more severe and prolonged than it has been had not the civil war interfered to tie our hands, destroy a third of our marine in the foreign trade, and given Great Britain an opportunity to build up great iron-ship-building plants by government contracts for war vessels; and especially had not the British Government strengthened the hands of her ship-owners by postal subsidies to establish steam-ship lines to all parts of the world, while our Government has refused aid to our vessels.

LOWER WAGES ABROAD WHAT TROUBLE US.

In the attempt to compete on free-trade principles in the foreign carrying trade with British steam-ships we have been worsted, first, because England had cheaper labor than we have to mine her ore, make her iron, and build her iron vessels, but (in view of the fact that the difference in first cost of a vessel spread over thirty to fifty years is a small item) mainly because England has cheaper labor to run her steamships after they are built.

I have heard this denied, but in order to establish this fact beyond question I read from a special report on wages of officers, engineers, and seamen on British and on American vessels, made last November by United States Consul Russell at Liverpool, a free-trader, by the way, who would not be likely to color any facts to bear against his cause, and published in the February consular reports, as follows:

British vessels in domestic ports can procure crews for from 37 to 32 per cent. lower than those paid on American vessels, which is a serious item in the disbursement account. Then, again, the cost of maintenance on American ships is about 40 cents per day per man against the English 29 cents, or a difference of 27 per cent. in favor of the latter. When it is considered that provisions, such as beef, pork, and flour, which are the principal articles of food consumed, can be obtained in the United States, if anything, at a lower price than in England, it seems remarkable that the crews of our vessels should cost 27 per cent. more per man for maintenance; yet such appears to be the case. It is an acknowledged fact that the living on board our vessels is superior to that of other nations, and it is generally asserted that larger quantities of food are supplied to the crew, the scale of provision laid down by Congress being rarely, if ever, resorted to.

I invite the attention of gentlemen who contend that there is not much difference between wages in the United States and Great Britain to this official statement that crews can be procured for British steam-ships at 37 per cent. lower wages than they can be procured in this country for American steam-ships, and that it costs 27 per cent. more to feed the American crews than it does the British crews, because our laborers properly insist on better living.

FREE SHIPS NOT A REMEDY, BUT A SERIOUS PERIL.

I should like to ask the gentlemen who think that the slight initial saving which might be made in going to the Clyde and having our ships built would enable us then to compete on equal terms in the foreign carrying trade with our British rivals, to tell the House and the country how they propose to run steam-ships after they have been built in free competition with British vessels which are manned by officers and men who receive 37 per cent. less wages and 27 per cent. poorer fare than our own officers and crews require!

The simple statement of the situation shows the absurdity of the free-ship remedy for a revival of our merchant marine in the foreign carrying trade, to say nothing of the grave national peril involved in relying upon Great Britain to build our vessels and abandoning our own ship-yards, which Jefferson well said are as necessary as forts in case of war.

Nothing can be more obvious than that if we persist in turning over our shipping in the foreign trade to open competition on free-trade principles with British and other foreign vessels without aid from our Government, the day is not far distant when every American vessel in that trade will have been driven from the ocean.

THE LESSON TO BE HEEDED.

Let this illustration of the disastrous effects of free trade in our foreign carrying trade warn us in time against trying the same experiment with other industries in this country.

It ought to be sufficient to deter us from hazardous experiments which look attractive in the figures of rhetoric, that under the protective policy which has prevailed for more than a quarter of a century the United States has grown so wonderfully in population, agriculture, manufactures, and all the elements which have to do with material prosperity, that even the most distinguished and most highly honored statesman of Great Britain—the peerless Gladstone—has spoken of her in debate in Parliament as the most marvelous and prosperous nation in Christendom. [Prolonged applause.]

APPENDIX.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Washington, D. C., December 9, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to you herewith tabular statements showing the articles of imported merchandise which were entered for consumption in the United States during the year ended June 30, 1884, with the values thereof, the rates of duty, and the amounts of duty collected thereon, the average value per unit of quantity, and the average ad valorem rate of duty.

These statements exhibit in detail for a full year the operation of the tariff act of March 3, 1883, in comparison with the operation of the tariff previously in force for the year ended June 30, 1883.

The total value of the imports of merchandise entered for consumption in the United States during the year ended June 30, 1884, was $667,575,389, as against $700,829,673 during the preceding fiscal year; the value of dutiable merchandise so entered amounted to $456,295,124, as against $493,916,384 during the preceding year; the value of merchandise free of duty amounted to $211,280,265, as against $206,913,289 during the preceding year; the total amount of duties collected during the fiscal year was $190,282,836, as against $210,637,293 during the preceding fiscal year; the average ad valorem rate of duty on dutiable merchandise was 41.702 per cent., as against 42.646 per cent. during the preceding fiscal year; and the average ad valorem rate of duty on free and dutiable merchandise was 28.503 per cent., as against 30.055 per cent. during the preceding fiscal year. These facts may be more concisely presented in tabular form, as follows:

Value of imported merchandise entered for consumption, and duties collected thereon.

THE GENERAL RESULTS OF TARIFF LEGISLATION IN THE UNITED STATES FROM 1791 TO 1884.

Prior to the year 1867 no separate account was kept of the quantity and value of each kind of imported commodities entered for consumption and of the amount of duty collected thereon. The following table is therefore divided into two parts, the first of which shows for the years 1791 to 1866, inclusive, the value of the net imports of merchandise into the United States, the amount of duty collected thereon, and the average ad valorem rates of duty on dutiable and on free and dutiable goods imported; and the second of which shows for the years 1867 to 1884, inclusive, the value of merchandise entered for consumption free of duty and dutiable, the amount of duty collected, and the average ad valorem rate of duty on the total value of both free and dutiable goods entered for consumption.

The foregoing table presents an epitome of the results of tariff legislation in the United States from the beginning of the Government to the present time.

It must be observed, however, that the average ad valorem rates given in this table do not constitute an absolutely correct presentation of the general results of the various tariff laws which have from time to time been in force in this country since the organization of the Government. There are other factors to be taken into consideration. Such ad valorem rates have, from year to year, been more or less affected by changes in the relative proportion of the several kinds of dutiable goods imported upon which the rates differ. For example, either a falling off in the imports of goods paying high rates of duty or an increase in the imports of goods paying low rates of duty during any one year might cause a very considerable fall in the average ad valorem rate without any change in the tariff laws; and conversely an increase in the imports of goods paying high rates of duty or a decrease in the imports of goods paying low rates of duty might cause a very considerable increase in the average ad valorem rate of duty in the absence of any change whatever in our tariff laws.

The average ad valorem rate on all dutiable merchandise from year to year has also been affected by fluctuations in the prices of goods upon which the duties are specific. This was fully explained in the special report of this office on the operation of the tariff act of March 3, 1883, for the six months ended December 31, 1884.

Again, the average ad valorem rate for any one year may fail to indicate the results of even radical changes in the tariff laws, the operation of which has been to raise the duty on certain commodities and to lower the duties on others. For example, the act of March 3, 1883, raised the average ad valorem rate on sugar and melada, on manufactures of cotton, on earthen and china ware, on glass and glassware, on spirits and wines, and on malt liquors, and reduced the average ad valorem rate on iron and steel, on wool, on manufactures of wool, and on manufactures of silk, but the average ad valorem rate on all dutiable merchandise was not much changed.

A complete explanation of the effects of all the changes of law and of commercial conditions upon average ad valorem rates since the organization of the Government would evidently involve a treatise of great length.

These statements serve to indicate the important truth that figures are but words, and that frequently in the absence of adequate explanatory statements the infirmities of speech attach to them as to other words, even when they are used honestly and in their normal significance for the purpose of presenting and illustrating concrete facts.

The following table shows the average ad valorem rate of duty on all merchandise and on the principal commodities imported during the years ended June 30, 1883 and 1884, with the increase or decrease in the several rates:

THE OPERATIONS OF THE TARIFF ACT OF MARCH 3, 1883.

From the foregoing table it appears that the average ad valorem rate of duty on all imported merchandise entered for consumption during the year ended June 30, 1883, was under the operations of the act of March 3, 1883, reduced only ninety-four one-hundredths of 1 per cent.; but by making due allowance for the fall in the prices of goods upon which the duties are specific, for the effects of the provision of the act of March 3, 1883, that the customs valuation of imported goods shall no longer include commissions, the cost of the necessary coverings

*The statement in regard to the receipts and expenditures of the Government, made by the Secretary of the Treasury, shows the receipts from customs to have been $214,706,496.93 for the year ended June 30, 1883, and $195,067,489.76 for the year ended June 30, 1884. This statement includes not only duties on imports, but also tonnage tax and certain customs fees, whereas the above table shows only the amounts of duty collected on merchandise.

†The value of the merchandise entered for consumption during the year ended June 30, 1884, amounted, as above stated, to $667,575,389, and embraced both goods entered for immediate consumption on arrival in the United States and goods withdrawn from warehouse for consumption during the year. The value of the imports into the United States, as hereinbefore shown, amounted to $667,697,693, embracing both goods entered for immediate consumption on arrival and goods entered for warehousing awaiting the payment of duties. The two statements differ in character.

and casings of goods, internal transportation charges in foreign countries, etc., and for the transfer to the free-list of goods the duties upon which are much below the average ad valorem rate, it has been ascertained that the reduction made in that rate by the provisions of this act mentioned was about 5 per cent.—i. e., 5 per cent. of the value of imports.

The amount of duty received fell from $210,637,203 during the year ended June 30, 1883, to $190,282,836 during the year ended June 30, 1884—a fall of 9.7 per cent.

JOSEPH NIMMO, JR.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLOUNT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (H. R. 1148) to grant the right of way to the Kansas City and Pacific Railroad Company through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 2605) relating to the anchorage of vessels in the port of New York;

A bill (S. 2671) to create and organize the county of Latah;

A bill (S. 738) granting a pension to Enos J. Searles, of Clermont, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. 1325) providing for the purchase of additional ground in the city of Indianapolis, Ind., adjoining the post-office site, and for the improvement of the building thereon, and appropriating $150,000 therefor;

A bill (S. 333) granting a pension to Reuben Brownmiller;

A bill (S. 334) granting an increase of pension to Charles F. Allgower;

A bill (S. 2267) for the relief of the Omaha tribe of Indians, in Nebraska, to extend the time of payment to purchasers of lands of said Indians, and for other purposes; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 56) authorizing the use and improvement of Castle Island, in Boston Harbor.

PUBLIC BUILDING, ROANOKE, VA.

Mr. SOWDEN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back the bill (H. R. 6683) for the erection of a public building in the city of Roanoke, Roanoke County, Virginia; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, ST. ALBANS, VT.

Mr. SOWDEN also, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back with amendments the bill (S. 1876) for the purchase of a site and the erection of a custom-house and post-office at St. Albans, State of Vermont; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TARIFF.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the tariff debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Chairman, labor is the source of all wealth. Capital produces nothing, therefore labor being the foundation of all wealth, it must bear the burden of taxation. The question of taxation is always of vital importance to the people, and one that touches more closely the individual than any other question with which this House has to deal. I come to the discussion of this question, not as a free-trader—I believe the best way to collect the necessary taxes for the support of the Government is by levying a tax on imports. I believe, as far as may be, the tax should be levied on those articles of import known as luxuries, so that the taxes may be borne by those who are best able to bear them, and that the necessities, as far as may be, should be put on the free-list. I am not in favor of any radical changes in our tariff laws, for the business of the country is now upon a high-tariff basis, and any radical and sudden change would disturb our business interests. I am the last man in the country that would desire to interfere with our manufacturing interests, for I represent one of the largest and most important manufacturing districts in the country, and my home is within the sound of the machinery of the largest cotton-manufacturing corporation in the world.

There are in my district thousands of men, women, and children who earn their bread in our manufacturing institutions; and I should deem myself worse than a traitor did I by my vote on this floor in the least degree detract from their opportunity to earn an honest living in their chosen calling; but I have not forgotten that I am a citizen of a great nation, as well as a citizen of a great manufacturing State; that any legislation that has not for its ultimate end the good of the whole people is vicious legislation, and having fought in the hour of the country's danger for the preservation of the whole Union, I must now, as the people's representative, vote for the interests of the whole people. Our present system of tariff was levied as a war measure, and those who presented it to this House and to the country felt called upon to apologize to the people for it, and to appeal to their loyalty to endure the burden, promising when the war should end and the need of this burden of taxation should no longer exist that the tax should then be removed and the people relieved. The people did endure it loyally, the war was brought to a close, the armies disbanded, and the soldiers returned to their peaceful occupations; everybody rejoiced that the struggle was ended and that prosperity was manifest in every part of our great, free country.

But were the burdens of the people removed? Did the same party that promised relief, remaining still in power, fulfill its promise? No; instead of relieving the people they conceived the thought that this great nation that had freed itself from the tyranny of the Old World, that had maintained its national existence and integrity through external and internal strife, was not able to cope with the Old World in the domain of business and commerce; and to enable our people to protect themselves from the manufacturers of Europe, they increased the tax on importations in order that we might stimulate home production, and protect the American laborer from the cheap labor of Europe. Under this system, it is true, our country has prospered; we have increased largely in population and in wealth; we have met the interest on our public debt, and paid the principal as fast as it has become due, and to-day we have a hundred millions of the people's money in the Treasury in the form of a surplus, and it is fast accumulating. Yes, accumulating so fast that the whole country is alarmed, and the people regardless of party affiliations admit the necessity of a reduction of taxation. The people are looking to this House to-day as they have never looked before for relief, and he who refuses to vote for relief on fair business principles will not fail to hear from those whose servants we are and by whose votes we have been sent here to legislate for their welfare. The only difference between us to-day is the manner in which taxes shall be reduced.

Our friends on the Republican side say we must continue the tariff on imports at the present rates as a means of protection to American manufacturers and American labor; that we have had great prosperity as the result of our protective system, and to give it up will be to give our markets to the foreign trade. This side, while admitting that the country as a whole has prospered under our system of protection, deny that it has prospered because of protection; that protection has shut us out of the markets of the world and forced us to confine our trade to our own markets; that it has stimulated production until we can no longer consume our products, and the result is depression in business, idleness for our laborers, and a threatened panic in every avenue of trade. Is it true that the country has increased in wealth under the system of protection more than it did under a low tariff for revenue? Let us look at the statistics of the three decades previous to 1880. The true valuation of this country in 1850 was $7,135,788,228; in 1860 it was $16,159,616,068; in 1870 it was $30,068,518,507; in 1880 it was $43,642,000,000. Now, if you will figure the per cent. of increase you will find the country increased in value from 1850 to 1860, 126 per cent.; from 1860 to 1870 the increase was only 93 per cent.; and from 1870 to 1880 the increase was only 45 per cent. Now, certainly, if protection has made our country so very prosperous our protection friends will be able to explain to the country why it is that for the ten years preceding 1860 the valuation of the country under a low tariff increased 126 per cent., while in the next two decades it only increased 93 per cent. and 45 per cent., respectively. If they say it is not fair to consider the decade from 1860 to 1870 on account of the war then the showing is still worse for protection, for from 1870 to 1880, the best possible period for a comparison of the protective system, the increase was only 45 per cent. against 126 per cent. from 1850 to 1860.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in order that we may see what influence protection has had upon these industries, which it was intended especially to protect, let us take for example wool. The tariff law of 1867 was passed to encourage wool-growing and wool-manufacturing; but instead of increasing the wool product it decreased it, especially in the older wool-growing States. I will now give a table of statistics, showing the product in the older States and the entire product for twelve years from 1866 to 1877, inclusive:

Year.	Older States.	Total clip.
	Pounds.	Pounds.
1866	120,000,000	137,000,000
1867	140,000,000	160,000,000
1868	150,000,000	177,000,000
1869	135,000,000	162,000,000
1870	130,000,000	163,000,000
1871	110,000,000	146,000,000
1872	120,000,000	160,000,002
1873	125,000,000	174,000,000
1874	120,000,000	178,000,000
1875	125,000,000	192,000,000
1876	112,500,000	198,250,000
1877	120,000,000	208,250,000

By examining these figures it will be seen that there was an increase in the wool clip till 1868; then there was a constant falling off till 1871, and, in fact, the wool clip of 1868 was not again reached till 1874; and the product of the old wool-growing States was the same in 1877 that it was in 1866, eleven years before, though the entire clip had increased from 137,000,000 to 208,000,000 pounds. This shows very plainly that wool-growing was not stimulated in these States where the bulk of the wool had been produced previous to the high tariff of 1867. Now let us see what effect the tariff had on the number of sheep in the great wool-growing States of the Union:

The total number of sheep in the United States in 1867 were 39,385,386; in 1877 there were 35,804,200; a loss in ten years of 3,581,186.

Ohio had in 1866, 6,568,052; in 1877 she had 3,900,000; a loss in eleven years of 2,668,052. Michigan had in 1866, 3,473,075; in 1882 she had 2,320,752; a loss in sixteen years of 1,152,323. Pennsylvania had in 1866, 3,230,440; in 1882 she had 1,785,491; a loss in sixteen years of 1,444,949. New York had in 1866, 5,117,148; in 1882 she had 1,732,332; a loss in sixteen years of 3,384,816. Indiana had in 1866, 2,783,367; in 1882 she had 1,111,516; a loss in sixteen years of 1,671,851. Illinois had in 1866, 2,446,081; in 1882 she had 1,026,702; a loss in sixteen years of 1,420,379. Iowa had in 1866, 1,950,752; in 1882 she had 482,681; a loss in sixteen years of 1,468,071.

Now, to show that the tariff of 1867 did not have the effect of increasing the price of wool to the producer, let us look at the following facts: The average price of wool from 1847 to 1866, a period of twenty years, during none of which time the tariff on wool was more than 30 per cent., several years of which time it was free, was 48 cents a pound. The average price of wool from 1867 to 1887, inclusive, with a tariff of from 40 to 60 per cent., figuring from a gold basis in both cases, was 44 cents a pound, or 4 cents a pound less under the protective tariff of the last twenty-one years than it was under the low tariff of twenty years before.

Will gentlemen on this floor who are so anxious to keep a high tariff on wool explain to this House and to the country what benefit the wool-grower has derived from the system of a protective tariff? I say the wool-growers of the Northern States have not been benefited by a high tariff on wool. The stimulus given to the production of wool was in the Southern and Western States and Territories, and the older wool-growing States were forced largely to go out of the business. Why? Because of the better facilities for producing wool in the warmer climates and the less cost of production. In New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio the land is worth from $50 to $100 per acre. In Texas there are very large tracts of school lands owned by the State. Sheep-raisers rent that land at from 6 to 10 cents an acre, or if they want to buy the land they can get it for $1 an acre.

How can an Ohio wool-grower, who has from $50 to $100 invested in an acre of land, compete with the man who has only from 6 to 10 cents invested? How can he compete with the man who herds his sheep on Government lands and has not a single dollar invested in farms? Again, the Ohio farmer must feed his sheep four months in the year, while the Texas farmer has continual summer. If the Ohio farmer would make a success of wool growing he must ask for a tariff to protect him from Texas and the prairies of the great West; they have injured him far more than the importations of foreign wool. All the protection Ohio and the Northern States can ever have on wool is the protection which nature has provided in soil and climate, which enables them to produce a quality of wool that can be produced nowhere else. This is all the protection that nature and an honest government ever intended they should have. Now, why, in a country like this, with such a diversity of soil and climate, should we attempt to protect an interest in one part of our country that nature has declared can be better served without protection in another? Texas can produce wool for 10 cents a pound as easily as Ohio can produce it for 20 cents, and every dollar of taxes paid by the people on wool imported into this country is paid as a premium to those who feed their sheep on Government land. Now, the Texas Representatives on this floor, who represent the great wool-growing interests of the South, are very generally voting to remove the tariff from wool, and thus relieve the people of five millions of taxes and make it possible to relieve them of twelve millions more on manufactured goods.

It seems to me that we can not better fulfill our pledges to the people, both Democrats and Republicans, North and South, than by first placing wool on the free-list. Now, so far as our woolen manufacturers are concerned, we want for them free wool, in order that they may be able to compete with foreign manufacturers in the markets of the world. I am confident that free wool, while it will not interfere with wool-growers, will increase the manufacture of woolen goods by placing our manufacturers on a level with foreign manufacturers; they having their wool at the same cost, can then compete in any market of the world. A man largely interested in the manufacture of woolens approached me a few days ago and said: "My corporation is losing money every day because of the increased cost of raw material over that paid by the foreign manufacturer; but," said he, "give us free wool and put us on a level with the foreign manufacturer, and then we can compete with him." Why should we maintain a high tariff on wool and make necessary an enormous tax on manufactured goods to offset it? This is taxing every citizen in the land for the protection of a single interest, or, in other words, it is placing a tax on sixty millions of people for the benefit of one million, and the statistics already given show that they even have not been benefited by it. Any policy that taxes the many for the benefit of the few is un-American and opposed to every principle of republican form of government. The agent of the largest cotton manufacturing corporation in the world a few years ago was asked what action he desired Congress to take on the tariff on cotton goods such as his corporation produced. His reply was, "That depends upon what you do with raw material. If you increase the tariff on raw material you must increase it on my goods; if you decrease it on raw material you may decrease it proportionally on my goods; if you will take it all off of raw material I will take care of my own goods." He said to another gentleman, when talking on the same subject, "Give me free dye stuffs, and I will compete with the world."

I some time ago advocated this doctrine to one of the largest and most prosperous woolen manufacturers in New Hampshire. He said in reply, "Your principle is right, but I am afraid if we begin to meddle with the tariff the whole system will fall. The woolen manufacturers have agreed to stand by the wool-growers in return for their support of a tariff on manufactured goods." Here we have an acknowledged combination between the various interests to keep a high tariff both on raw material and manufactured goods in order to protect each other, and force the consumer to pay the bills.

The bill we have before us now does not contemplate the destruction of the tariff on manufactured goods. That has never been the policy of the American people. But it gives the manufacturer raw material at such a price as will enable him at an ad valorem duty of 40 per cent. on his goods to produce as cheaply as the foreigner and give him an equal chance in the markets of the world. Why should the manufacturer object to this so long as the American policy of allowing a reasonable ad valorem protection on the manufactured goods is recognized? The Democratic party has no desire to ruin American industries. They are interested in the prosperity of this country as well as the Republican party; they breathe the same air and enjoy the same sunlight; they are protected by the same flag and are in as much need of food and clothing as the Republicans are; and there are as many in their party who earn their bread by honest toil as there are in the Republican party. It is about time the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber ceased to charge the Democratic party with a desire to bring disaster upon the business interests of this country, and to proclaim to the world that this effort to reform the tariff laws is an attempt of the Southern Representatives to overthrow the business interests of the North. We have no South nor no North; our interests are one; this is our country.

We are only trying to carry out the fundamental principles of our Government by legislating for the whole people, and not for the few as against the many. We recognize no favored classes, and believing the policy of the Republican party for the last twenty years has tended to build up a moneyed aristocracy that is dangerous to the liberties of the people, we propose now to return to the principles of true democracy and equal taxation for all. The people demand it, and we shall try and prove true to the trust reposed in us. Our country is naturally an agricultural country. The prosperity of our people depends largely upon the success of our agricultural interests. Now what protection has the farmer as compared with the tax he pays? He has a protection of 20 cents a bushel on wheat. We produce more than we consume, and therefore are forced to export the surplus. The price is fixed in the European market, and the home price is determined by the export price. It matters not whether you make wheat free or put a tariff of $1 a bushel upon it. It could not affect the price one iota. He has a protection on potatoes and a few other products. Now let us look at the other side of the question. He is taxed on the plow and harrow with which he prepares his land for sowing; he is taxed on the drill with which he plants his seed; he is taxed on the reaper with which he gathers his crop; he is taxed on the twine with which he binds it; he is taxed on the machine with which he thrashes it; he is taxed on the bags in which he carries it to market; he is taxed on the wagon in which he transports it to the railroad; he is taxed on his harness and on the shoes which he puts on his horses. All this for the privilege of selling his wheat at a price fixed in the English market. He then in return pays a tax on his cotton goods; on every pound of woolens which he buys to protect his family from the cold; he pays a tax on the plate he eats off of; the knife and fork he eats with; the cup and saucer he drinks out of; the sugar he puts in his tea; the salt with which he seasons his food; he pays a tax on every thousand of lumber he puts in his buildings; in fact on every necessity of life he is taxed. How it must delight the intelligent farmer as he sits by his fire of a winter night and meditates upon the protection he gets upon what he produces and then compares it with the taxes he pays for the benefit of a protective system. No class of people in this fair land has paid so much and got so little in return for the system of protection. The protectionist tells us that the tariff on imports increases the price of labor, and it is for the protection to American labor that he insists upon a tax on imports. I would like to ask the protectionist in what way American labor is protected. I think no one will deny that the price of labor is regulated by the law of supply and demand, and every employer of labor gets it as cheaply as possible. Has there ever been a tax put upon the importation of foreign labor? Is not every port in the United States open for the landing of any foreigner who desires to come to this country to compete with those who are already here, with a single exception of the Chinese?

Have not the protected interests of this country until within a short time systematically brought into this country foreign contract labor to compete with American labor? Was this done by the protectionist because he had such a mighty interest in the protection of American labor? Go into the British provinces and ride through the country villages, and what will you see? Large posters announcing that one thousand operatives are wanted in this city, and two thousand in some other city. I suppose they are wanted for the protection of American labor. Oh, no! It is because they can get labor cheaper in the provinces than in the United States, and like everybody else they go into the cheapest market for what they want to purchase, and then cry protection to American labor. This is mere sophistry, and the people are beginning to understand it. I receive circulars which tell me if we remove the tax on foreign lumber we will ruin our lumbering interests and throw a million laborers out of employment. Now, if you will go into the lumber fields of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, and look into the lumber camps, you will find nine-tenths of the laborers are from the British provinces, who come over for the lumbering season, and when the timber is at the mills or in the streams ready to float down to the mills you will see these workmen wending their way back to Canada, with their winter's wages in their pockets to spend for the support of their families in the Canadian market, while in New England our lumber fields have been decimated to supply the home consumption, and because of the tariff on Canadian lumber we are forced to purchase our supply from the millionaire statesmen of the West, who have grown rich by employing foreign contract labor and getting the benefit of protection on that which the labor has produced.

Thus foreign labor gets the work. The American lumberman puts the increased value of his lumber in his pocket, and comes to Congress to vote for a continuation of the tax, and to proclaim that a million American laborers will be ruined if we take the tax off of lumber. For my part I have no fears of the result. Now, I would not be misunderstood. I have no objection to foreigners coming to this country who desire to better their condition and become American citizens. I bid them a hearty welcome to our shores, but I say the time has come when this hypocrisy of demanding protection from cheap foreign labor, while those who get the protection are straining every nerve to get that same cheap labor to perform the work required, should be stopped. The honest American laborer, the honest foreigner who has come here ta better his condition, is beginning to see the result of protection, that it is for the benefit of the employer, and not the employé, and he is demanding honest legislation for the protection of honest labor.

But the protectionist says we have greatly prospered for the last twenty years. For twenty years we have had protection; therefore protection has been the cause of our prosperity. Let us see how the protective doctor likes his own medicine. Before the present protective system came into vogue in this country a labor strike was scarcely ever heard of. Under protection, strikes have become the commonest thing in the world. There has hardly been a time for years when there has not been a strike of the workmen in some of the protected interests. Business has everywhere been demoralized because of strikes. Now, using the argument of the protectionists, I say because strikes have been known only under protection, therefore our protective system is the cause of all our strikes. Before our present protective system we knew nothing of tramps. Under our protective system tramps have become a national epidemic, so that in New Hampshire we passed a law making it a crime to be a tramp, a penitentiary offense, and many other States have followed our example. Following the argument of the protectionist, I say as tramps have only been known under protection, therefore our protective system has produced all our tramps. Is not my argument as good as theirs? Ah, is there not a better foundation for my argument than there is for theirs?

Mr. Chairman, how long would the people endure this tax if instead of collecting it indirectly it was collected directly when they purchased the article for consumption? A man buys a dollar's worth of sugar, an officer demands 50 cents; he buys a dollar's worth of rice, an officer demands 40 cents; he buys a pair of woolen blankets, an officer demands $2; he buys a bolt of cotton cloth, an officer demands $1.50; and so through the entire list of taxed necessities. Reduce the amount one-half, if you please—I care not how much it is reduced—collect your tax direct and let the collection result in a hundred millions a year more than is necessary for the support of the Government, and there would be revolution and the party that advocated such a tax would be speedily relegated to the rear. Yet we are, by an indirect tax on the people, gathering into the Treasury, of the people's money, tens of millions a year that is forced to lie idle. By what moral right is this money collected? Does the Government own the people's property or earnings? Is the Government Treasury a depository of the people's money?

I claim that every dollar of money collected from the people above the needs of the Government economically administered is simple legalized robbery. It takes the money out of the legitimate channels of business; it creates a stringency in the financial world, and is ever threatening panic and disaster; and the Secretary of the Treasury is forced to go into the market and purchase the Government bonds at a premium to prevent financial panic. He has been forced within the last six months to take the currency that was issued for the people, that was hoarded in the Treasury by this system of robbery, and give it to the national banks, and the people have been forced to go to these banks and pay interest on that money that has been taken from them wrongfully in order that they might save themselves from bankruptcy. That same money belonged to the people and should have been left in their hands. Money is not made to hoard in the public Treasury, but to put into circulation for the benefit of the people, and they demand at the hands of this Congress that they be relieved of the burden of taxation that ruins business and threatens disaster to the nation.

But our friends on the other side say, "Oh, we want to reduce the surplus, but we will do it by abolishing the internal revenue, by taking the tax from tobacco and whisky. See how the poor laboring man is burdened with the tax on his pipe and the poor Congressman with the tax on his cigar! This poor laborer for which we have such an absorbing love should by all means have his free smoke. And see how the poor laborer suffers because of the immense tax he pays on the spirits that enter into the arts and sciences!" I suppose they must refer to the art and science that some of the Republican States have so successfully learned of keeping a prohibitory law upon the statute-books and yet manage to have free drinks. And this is the grand old party, the God-and-morality party, the party of great moral ideas, the party of the saints, the party that has such a mighty love for the poor laboring man!

Oh, how the mighty are fallen in these latter days, when the party of Lincoln and Sumner have come to advocate free tobacco and free whisky, while they demand a tax on the blankets, the clothing, and the food of the poor!

Would to God Lincoln might be here once more with power to emancipate the American people from the curse of a mighty iniquity, as he did the negro from the curse of slavery. Now, if the statement of the protectionist that a protective tariff increases the price of labor be true, then the interests that have the largest protection ought to pay the highest wages. This is not so. The shoe interest has grown to be one of the largest interests in the line of manufacture in this country. Cotton has a protection of 50 per cent., woolens a protection of 58 per cent., while manufactured shoes only have a protection of 30 per cent. Now, any one who has investigated the subject knows that the wages of operatives in shoe manufactories get about 50 per cent. better wages than the operatives in cotton or woolens. One of the largest shoe manufacturers in New England told me a few days ago that the wages of his employés last month averaged $10.93 a week, men, women, and children. In this corporation they manufactured cheap shoes that sell for from 85 cents to $1.50 a pair. The average wages of operators in woolens and cotton is considerably less than $1 a day. I have talked with many of the largest shoe manufacturers of my own State, and they all tell me if they can have their raw material free, leather, serge, buttons, thread, etc., they can compete with the world, sell their shoes in the foreign markets, and will ask no protection on the manufactured goods.

The reason why they can pay higher wages to-day than any of the other great manufacturing interests is that we have free hides and only 20 per cent. on leather. Take away your tax on raw material and give us an opportunity to go into the markets of the world, and we need have no fear of foreign competition. We can sell more in their markets than they can sell in ours. It has been shown very clearly upon this floor that while we pay much higher wages per diem in this country than is paid in the same industries in Europe, yet the labor cost of manufacturing a given product here is less than in the Old World. Where, then, is the difficulty? It is in the system of first taxing the material that enters into the manufacture and creating a necesssty to tax the manufactured article to overcome it. Thus the laborer's wages is not increased, but the price of what he consumes is. Make first the raw material as cheap as possible the laborer's wages will be kept where they are, and the purchasing power of what he earns will be increased. It is easy to show, further, that under our protective system the wages of labor have not been kept up. The average wages paid in the worsted manufactories of this country in 1870 was $338, in 1880 they were $302—a decrease of $36 per year. In the carpet manufactories the average wages in 1870 were $387—in 1880 $335; a decrease of $52 a year; and if you will investigate the wages paid in the various protected industries you will find they are far less to-day than in 1870.

But the protectionist tells us that the tariff stimulates production and therefore reduces the price to the consumer. Admit it. The iron industry has been stimulated until our power of production is greater than our power to consume. In the beginning of this hard winter just passing away every time you took up a morning paper you would see an account of iron furnaces that had been banked somewhere in Pennsylvania. That meant an overproduction. The owner banked his furnace until the surplus should be disposed of and there should be a demand for a new supply. God only knows what it meant for the poor laborer who went home penniless to his wife and children who depended upon him for bread. God only knows the sufferings of that family as the winter's blast piled the drifts in front of his hovel, while they waited the starting of the fires in the furnaces that should give them promise once more of bread. This is one of the protected industries that stimulates production. It is a false stimulus, and one that does not give steady employment to labor and bread to the poor. It cripples competition, which is the life of trade in every nation of the earth. We are taught in the Scriptures that "God has created of one blood all nations of men to dwell on all the face of the earth." That is equality. In the Declaration of Independence our fathers, accepting this as the voice of God, proclaimed "that all men are created free and equal and are endowed with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." If these principles be true, then the doctrine of protection as it is illustrated in our policy is wholly, radically, and supremely wrong, for it destroys competition and builds walls around nations, shuts up the channels of commerce, and prevents men from seeking happiness and prosperity in the natural channels of trade. We therefore demand legislation that will result in a more free interchange of commodities, and give to our people a broader field of trade. It is conceded by all parties that we need this.

Mr. Chairman, I can not refrain from replying to some of the statements made by my colleague in his speech on the tariff. I have the profoundest respect for him as a man and a gentleman, and recognize his ability as a debater upon this floor, but as a representative of New Hampshire I must object to some of his statements. He said:

If the President's recommendation should be enacted into law, thriving villages would be depopulated and the hum of countless industries hushed. Where now are thrift and enterprise and prosperity, where happy homes and contented communities exist, will be ruin and sorrow and desolation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my colleague and myself are neither natives of New Hampshire; we are both adopted citizens of the State; he coming from Canada and I from the great State of Ohio, both undoubtedly to better our condition; and the people have honored us both by sending us to this House to represent their interests. Now, I do not believe the people of New Hampshire would thank either of us for standing here and proclaiming to the world that New Hampshire with her $50,000,000 in the savings-banks of which my colleague boasts, with her immense manufacturing interests and great water-powers, with her great agricultural interests and the intelligence of her citizens, with her lofty mountains and beautiful lakes that attract the people from every part of the land and the world in the summer months, that they may enjoy our beautiful scenery and breathe our pure atmosphere, leaving millions of money in our people's pockets in return for health and renewed vigor—I say our people would not thank either of us for proclaiming that New Hampshire is a poor, toddling weakling that can not take care of herself without taxing the whole nation for her protection. With her great natural resources, with the intelligence and native genius and energy of her people, she can stand alone with the balance of the world and bid defiance to any other State or people of the earth. Why, sir, I verily believe the bones of Webster and Greeley and Hale and the scores of other statesmen that first saw the light and received their early education among the hills of New Hampshire would rattle in their graves at such a slander spoken against the people of their native State. While I am honored by the grand old State of New Hampshire with being one of her citizens, I shall defend her with all my powers against such a charge.

During the campaign of 1884 the Republican papers and Republican stump orators proclaimed to the people of New Hampshire that if Grover Cleveland was elected our mills would be idle and the grass would grow in the streets of our manufacturing villages and cities. Grover Cleveland was elected and inaugurated President of these United States. The mills have not been idle, the grass has not grown in our streets, and the first act of our largest cotton-manufacturing corporation in my adopted city after Mr. Cleveland's inauguration was to establish a new corporation and put into it a million dollars of her surplus earnings. The people of New Hampshire are too intelligent to be longer frightened by such a ghost. Carry out the recommendations of the President's message and New Hampshire will receive renewed inspiration and accomplish greater things in the future than she has in the past. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In 1868 Senator Sherman said:

Every advance toward a free exchange of commodities is an advance in civilization; every obstruction to a free exchange is born of the same narrow, despotic spirit which planted castles upon the Rhine to plunder peaceful commerce; every obstruction to commerce is a tax upon consumption; every facility to a free exchange cheapens commodity, increases trade and production, and promotes civilization. Nothing is worse than sectionalism within a nation, and nothing is better for the peace of nations than unrestricted freedom of commerce and intercourse with each other.

How different from this are the sentiments of the Senator to-day; yet we believe the people of this country have more faith in the sentiments of Senator Sherman of 1868 than they have in Senator Sherman of 1888. The Senator may have gone backward in his subserviency to the monopolistic tendency of his party, but the people of this free country have moved forward and demand a release from the heavy burden that confines them to a home market, and destroys that commercial freedom so essential to a nation's prosperity. On the 29th of March, the Farmers' Alliance, of Minnesota, passed the following:

Resolved, That we heartily indorse President Cleveland's views on the tariff issue.

Resolved, That the so-called protective tariff is an iniquitous tax on people for the benefit of monopolies and trusts, and we demand its immediate repeal on all raw material and the necessaries of life.

These resolutions were unanimously adopted, not by a Democratic convention, but by the farmers of a great State, regardless of party affiliations. I warn the gentlemen on the other side that the people are awake to their best interests, and will no longer blindly follow party dictation, but will be controlled by true American principles. Now we wish to quote the sentiments of some of our Massachusetts statesmen on the proper manner to reduce the tariff. I quote the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] who, as chairman of the Republican State committee in calling the convention together in 1884, said:

Grave public questions confront us. There is a large, perilous, and growing surplus in the revenues. It must be removed, not by needless and extravagant expenditure, not by abolishing the proper taxation of whisky and tobacco, not by a stupid and injurious and horizontal reduction for politics only, but by plain business methods, by freeing entirely those great necessaries of life which enter into the daily consumption of every household, and by wise and discriminate reductions.

Now I wish to quote from another honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], who presided over the same convention. In his address he said:

There are only two ways to reduce the tariff. One by raising the tariff to a prohibitory height, which nobody advocates; the other, the free-list. The free-list is the honest revenue reformer's hope.

Now, I want to commend these sentiments, and I rejoice that the Democracy of New Hampshire and the Republicanism of Massachusetts can meet on a common ground, and give the people relief, and relieve the Treasury of a great surplus at the same time. If Mr. LODGE has not changed his sentiments on whisky and tobacco, and Mr. LONG on the subject of the free-list I shall expect to see them show their faith by their works and come up and vote, first, for free wool, and then, as a return for that, vote to reduce the tariff on woolen goods manufactured in New Hampshire and Massachusetts to 40 per cent. ad valorem, which we can easily do, and then get the blessing of the poor who can wear flannels next winter as well as we.

Show me your faith without works, and I will show you my faith by my works.

That Scripture will apply to the tariff question as well as to religion. Our aged and experienced friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] said in his address on the tariff:

The enactment of this bill (Mills bill) would instantly paralyze the enterprise and energy of the people; under the baneful influence of such a law the report of the census of 1890 will announce the overthrow of our manufacturing supremacy, and the reduction of our commanding commercial position to that of a colonial dependence.

Mr. Chairman, I have read in one of the old histories, written many centuries ago, of a class of people who had a monopoly of a certain industry and made great gain therefrom. And there was a certain man came into the land where these people dwelt and preached against them, and his words were so powerful that those who used curious arts brought their books and burned them before all men, and they counted the price of them and found it fifty thousand pieces of silver. And we are told at—

The same time there was no small stir about that way, for a certain man named Demetrius, a silversmith, which made silver shrines for Diana, brought no small gain to the craftsmen, whom he called together with the workmen of like occupation and said: "Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth; moreover, ye see and hear that not alone at Ephesus but almost throughout all Asia this Paul has persuaded and turned away much people, saying that there be no gods which are made with hands; so that not only this our craft is in danger to be set at naught, but also that the temple of the great goddess Diana should be despised, and her magnificence should be destroyed whom all Asia and the world worshipeth." And when they heard these things they were full of wrath and cried out, saying, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians."

Now, like these people of old, Pennsylvania has for a long time had a monopoly in many of those industries which have brought to them great wealth. An apostle has come into their midst who dwells at the other end of this avenue, and has proclaimed to the people against such a monopoly, and many who have heretofore believed in their doctrine are repenting of their sins and proclaiming their conversion before all the people. [Applause.] And now comes the great apostle of protection and calls together his people and says: Sirs, ye know that by this protection we have our wealth. Moreover, ye see and hear that not only in Pennsylvania, but almost throughout all the nation, this apostle of reform hath persuaded and turned away much people, saying that there be no justice in this doctrine of protection, so that not only this our wealth is in danger to be set at naught, but also that the great goddess of protection should be despised, whom Pennsylvania and all the land hath heretofore worshiped. And when they heard these words they were full of wrath, and cried out, Great is the goddess of protection! [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, but a little over a hundred years have passed since our fathers were struggling, a little band, for national freedom. We have to-day a territory stretching from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the Atlantic Ocean to the setting sun, a soil as rich as any on God's footstool; a variety of climate that will produce almost everything that grows out of the ground; our hills and plains underlaid with rich mines of gold, silver, copper, iron, lead, and coal; our immense forests and unprecedented water-powers sufficient to move all the machinery of the world; having passed through great wars with foreign nations, and contended with our own kindred, having always as a nation proved our valor on the land and on the sea; having grown to 60,000,000 of people, with our free schools in every part of our fair land; boasting that there is not another people on the earth so intelligent and so free; inviting all the oppressed of the earth to come to our shores and enjoy our free institutions and help develop our resources, and yet with all that nature has done for us, with all our wealth, our industries, our resources, and our intelligence we proclaim to the world that we can not live without protection from every other nation of the earth. In other words, we plead to the world the baby act.

As an American I deny the assertion. Give us a free and open market with the world, break down the barriers that a false system has built around us, go back once more to the principles of true democracy, take off the embargo that the Republican party has placed upon our shipping, let our flag be seen once more floating before the mast on every sea and in every port as in the olden time, and once again you will see our country prosperous, our people happy, and foreign nations will seek protection from us, the grandest, the freest, the noblest nation of the earth. [Applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing speech, the hour having expired, on motion of Mr. DARGAN, by unanimous consent, the time was extended until the conclusion of the speech.

Mr. CASWELL rose.

Mr. GALLINGER. I would like, if there be no objection, to be permitted to occupy the floor for the purpose of propounding four or five perfectly courteous interrogatories to my colleague who has just addressed the committee.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not like to interpose any objection, but there are gentlemen who have been waiting and are ready to proceed, who ought not longer to be delayed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was not aware any other members desired to speak this evening or I would not have made the request.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Yes; the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] has the floor, and I understand is ready to proceed.

Mr. CASWELL. If we intend to observe the rules of the House, Mr. Chairman, and to confine debate under the one-hour rule, we must stop the practice of extending the time in every case. To-day two or three gentlemen have occupied the entire time, and while upon the list I am the next one to speak nevertheless I dislike to proceed at this very late hour in the day with what I have to say on this important subject.

Mr. WARNER. It is very late in the day, and I hope there will be no objection to allowing the gentleman from Wisconsin to proceed with his remarks in the morning, instead of compelling him to go on with them now.

Mr. CASWELL. By the extension of the time in every case I have been thrown over to this very late hour in the day, and it would be very hard indeed to try to keep members here.

Mr. McMILLIN. This delay has been caused by the courtesy of extending the time of gentlemen who have preceded the gentleman from Wisconsin. I move, if the gentleman will permit me, that the committee rise.

Mr. CASWELL. I yield for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that recognitions that have been promised for to-morrow will perhaps make it impossible to recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin, but he can be recognized on Saturday, first or second on the list, if that will suit his convenience.

Mr. McMILLIN. Would the gentleman prefer to go on to-morrow rather than on Saturday?

Mr. CASWELL. I should much prefer to go on to-morrow, if possible.

The CHAIRMAN. Promises for recognition have been made for to-morrow, and the gentlemen who have been promised have reason to suppose that they will be permitted to occupy the floor.

Mr. CASWELL. So it was announced that I should speak to-day, but the whole time has been consumed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again state that it can recognize the gentleman on Saturday, either first or second on the list, if that will suit him, and without any embarrassment to any other gentlemen who are to speak on that day.

Mr. CASWELL. I should prefer to continue to-morrow.

Mr. WARNER. Let me make a suggestion. I understand the gentleman from Wisconsin has the floor now in his own right, having been recognized. Certainly his time has been taken to-day. If the committee rises now, would it not follow that he would be first entitled to recognition, as a matter of justice, to-morrow?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would feel compelled to recognize the gentleman.

Mr. WARNER. That is all right.

The motion of Mr. McMILLIN was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. McMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the tariff bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a joint resolution (H. Res 83) accepting the invitation of the French Republic to take part in an international exposition to be held in Paris in 1889; when the Speaker signed the same.

DISPOSAL OF CERTAIN PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to submit at this time a report from the Committee on the Public Lands, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. I refer to the joint resolution (S. R. 73) relating to the disposal of public lands in certain States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the submission of the report at this time?

There was no objection.

Mr. McTHOMAS. Before consent is given to the consideration of this resolution I desire first to ask if it is unanimously reported from the Committee on the Public Lands?

Mr. STOCKDALE. It is, sir.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered.

Mr. STOCKDALE. The committee recommends two amendments, which had better be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "entry," in line 3, and insert "sale as offered lands."

Add also a proviso, as follows:

"Provided, That any isolated or disconnected tracts or parcels of the public domain, less than 160 acres, may be sold at private or public sale for not less than $1.25 per acre by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, when in his judgment it would be proper to do so."

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, was passed.

Mr. STOCKDALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OHIO.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to concur in the Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. 3215) authorizing the construction of a bridge at Pittsburgh, over the Ohio River.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill, after which objection will be asked for.

Mr. DALZELL. I will state that the amendment suggested by the Senate was simply to reserve the power in Congress to alter or amend.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this bill is not before the House.

Mr. DALZELL. It was at the Clerk's desk on yesterday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill was laid before the House this morning, and is now in the hands of the committee.

Mr. DALZELL. I think that is a mistake.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is so informed by the Clerk.

Mr. DALZELL. It was reported to the House some ten days ago, and is now on the Calendar. The report of the committee is there.

Mr. ENLOE. While waiting for that can not we consider something else?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Chair will recognize another gentleman until the Clerk has procured the bill referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS TENNESSEE RIVER.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1889) to authorize the Tennessee Midland Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Tennessee River at any point on the line between the counties of Decatur and Perry, in the State of Tennessee, it may deem proper.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the bill, after which objection will be asked for.

Mr. ENLOE. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bill. It is in the usual form. It has passed the Senate and has been reported by the House Committee on Commerce with amendments.

Mr. KERR. Unanimously reported?

Mr. ENLOE. Yes, sir.

There being no objection, the reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendments proposed by the committee.

The amendments are as follows:

Add to section 2:

"And equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph companies; and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and its approaches for postal telegraph purposes."

Add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 6. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains or cars over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case the owner or owners of said bridge and the several railroad companies, or any of them, desiring such use, shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid, and upon rules and conditions to which each shall conform in using said bridge, all matters as issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War upon a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and being read the third time, was passed.

Mr. ENLOE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

T. H. NORTON AND J. M'LEAN.

Mr. GOFF. I ask that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill S. 109, and that the same be considered now.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (S. 109) for the relief of Thomas H. Norton and James McLean.

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $3,200 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of the funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay Thomas H. Norton and James McLean, being amount of excess paid by them on coal entry No. 1 at Del Norte land office, Colorado, July 10, 1882.

Mr. GOFF. There is a unanimous report of the Committee on Claims in this case.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Let the report be read.

Mr. GOFF. I ask that the reading of the report, which is somewhat lengthy, be dispensed with.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. What is the amount?

Mr. GOFF. Thirty-two hundred dollars.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. What is the basis of the claim? Can the gentleman give an explanation of it in two minutes?

Mr. GOFF. Certainly, I was prepared to do that if the House should dispense with the reading of the report. The other day the bill was called up, and there was no objection to it, but half past 5 o'clock having arrived the House had to take a recess.

This matter arose out of an entry of 360 acres of land. The statute requires that if a railroad had not been constructed within 15 miles of the land the price should be $10 per acre; if it was constructed within 15 miles the price should be $20.

The entry was made and the receiver of public moneys accepted the draft of these parties at the price of $10 an acre. It turned out before the draft was collected, after an interval of forty and odd days, the railroad had come within 15 miles of the land. The receiver then claimed that he must be accounted with for what was the price, not when these parties accepted the land, but when he received the money. But he accepted the draft at the time as payment for the land. The matter went to the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary said he thought these parties ought to have relief, but he did not think that he could grant it.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GOFF moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE AT OMAHA, NEBR.

Mr. McSHANE. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] has withdrawn his objection to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6440) which I called up the other day.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6440) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at or near Omaha, Nebr.

Mr. McSHANE. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be dispensed with. It is reported unanimously by the Committee on Commerce.

There was no objection.

The Committee on Commerce recommended the following amendment:

In the second section, after the word "States," in the eighth line, insert "and all companies and individuals." Also insert the word "telegraph" after the words "right of way for."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LYMAN. I desire to offer an amendment which we have agreed should be inserted.

The amendment offered by Mr. LYMAN was read, as follows:

Insert after the word "Nebraska," in the seventh line of section 1, the following:

"Said bridge when built shall not be located less than one-third of one mile from any other bridge across said river then built or in process of construction."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCLAMMY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OHIO CONNECTING BRIDGE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill called up by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has been found.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

A bill to authorize the construction of the Ohio Connecting Railway Company bridge, with an amendment by the Senate.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

On page 2, after line 26, insert:

"SEC. 7. That Congress shall have power at any time to alter, amend, or repeal this act."

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DALZELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ROBERT S. M'DONALD.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent to call up from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill H. R. 827. The proposition is merely to refer a claim to the Court of Claims.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 827) for the relief of Robert S. McDonald.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Robert S. McDonald, of Benton County, Mississippi, the sum of $3,784, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for stores and supplies taken and appropriated to the use of and used by the United States Army during the late war.

Mr. MORGAN. Let the Clerk report the resolution.

The Clerk read the report (by Mr. CROUSE), as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 827) for the relief of Robert S. McDonald, report herewith a resolution authorizing the Court of Claims to adjudicate the same, and recommend its passage:

"Resolved, That the claim of Robert S. McDonald, with all the papers in the case, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, under the provisions of the acts of Congress of March 3, 1883, commonly known as the "Bowman act," and the amendment thereto, the fourteenth section of the act of March 3, 1887, commonly known as the "Tucker bill."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution reported by the committee.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. MORGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended for thirty minutes.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I object.

Mr. BUTLER asked unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6602) for the relief of James Obrion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. TAULBEE. I object, and call for the regular order.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well. There will be nothing else done.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] demands the regular order.

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes. If this House is to be controlled by one individual I may as well be the individual as anybody else. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

To Mr. GAINES, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BURNES, for ten days, on account of important business.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled the joint resolution (H. Res. 83) accepting the invitation of the French Republic to participate in an international exposition to be held in Paris in 1889; and the Speaker signed the same.

OVERLOADING OF VESSELS ON GREAT LAKES.

Mr. DUNN. I am directed by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to report back with a recommendation that it be adopted the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 9, 1888.

Mr. NUTTING submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and ordered to be printed:

"'Whereas at a convention of seamen held at Toledo, Ohio, January, 188, delegations were present from Chicago, Milwaukee, Detroit, Toledo, Cleveland, Buffalo, and Oswego, and said delegations represented more than 5,000 seamen of the great chain of lakes. That said convention passed the following preamble:

"'Whereas 73 vessels, aggregating a tonnage of 20,678 tons, and valued, with cargoes, at $2,500,000, together with 204 lives, were lost on the Great Lakes during the season of 1887; and

"'Whereas the 204 lives lost, with the vessels mentioned, caused such an intense feeling of indignation throughout the country that the press was loud in its denunciation of underwriters and the incompetency of Government inspectors; and

"'Whereas, as is well known, a majority of vessels lost on the Great Lakes during the season of 1887 were rendered unseaworthy by being loaded beyond their carrying capacity, thereby causing them to founder and carry to the bottom with them, in most cases, the entire crew, and as a consequence leaving widows and orphans destitute of their natural protectors:' Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested, if consistent with the public good, to transmit to this House all information in custody of said Department in regard to the matters and things set forth in said preamble; and said Secretary is requested to state whether there is any rule, order, or regulation of the Treasury Department the enforcement of which would prevent the overloading of vessels with freight, and as to whether there is any law or laws in force regulating the quantity of freight vessels on the Great Lakes shall carry."

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. DUNN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EMORY R. SEWARD.

Mr. KERR. I desire to submit a privileged report, the report of a committee of conference.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7319) for the relief of Emory R. Seward, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all after the word "Provided," in the said amendment, and insert in lieu thereof the words:

"If in the judgment of the Chief of Engineers the necessities of commerce require the completion of said contract, or any portion of it, there shall, in making settlement with the said Emory R. Seward, be deducted from the above-named appropriation such an amount as in his judgment it will cost, in excess of the sum of $625, to complete such contract in a manner to meet the necessities of commerce at that point."

T. J. CAMPBELL,
DANIEL KERR,
Managers on the part of the House.
JOHN H. MITCHELL,
JOHN C. SPOONER,
E. K. WILSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The following statement of the House conferees was read:

The House conferees, in explanation of the conference report, say that on examination of the amendment proposed by the Senate we were satisfied that it would provide an additional, though perhaps an unnecessary safeguard in carrying out the purpose of the bill, and therefore recommend the adoption of the modified amendment of the Senate.

The report of the committee of conference was adopted.

Mr. KERR moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CALIFORNIA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Elections, in the case of Lynch vs. Vandever, from the Sixth Congressional district of the State of California.

The SPEAKER. The report and accompanying resolutions will be referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed. Does the gentleman desire immediate consideration?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I will call this up some time hereafter, but will give notice of the time before calling it up.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the regular order is the consideration of bills upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. MILLS. I move to dispense with that business for to-day.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interfere with the understanding between the members of the Committee on Ways and Means, or to interfere with the discussion of the tariff matter; but I want to offer a brief observation with reference to the condition of business on the Private Calendar——

The SPEAKER. But this motion is not debatable.

Mr. TAULBEE. I understand that it is not. However, if the point is not made, I presume that I may be permitted——

Mr. MILLS. I must demand the regular order.

Mr. TAULBEE. Then let us have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. The gentleman from Texas moves to dispense with private business for to-day.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 58, noes 52.

Mr. TAULBEE. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. TAULBEE and Mr. MILLS were appointed tellers.

Mr. MILLS. Let us have the yeas and nays at once.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 107, nays 91, not voting 126; as follows:

Mr. MONTGOMERY with Mr. DORSEY.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa, with Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida.

Mr. CUMMINGS with Mr. DAVENPORT.

Mr. BURNES with Mr. MORROW.

Mr. WILKINS with Mr. HOPKINS, of New York.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. TAULBEE. Is it not necessary that two-thirds shall vote in favor of this motion?

The SPEAKER. It is not. Such was the rule until the beginning of the Forty-ninth Congress. It was then changed. There was an apparent conflict between clause 1 of Rule XXVI and clause 3 of Rule XXIV, and during the Forty-ninth Congress a change was made in clause 1 of Rule XXVI so as to require only a majority vote to dispense with the consideration of the Private Calendar on Fridays.

Mr. TAULBEE. If I understand the meaning of Rule XXVIII aright, I am of the opinion that it will be necessary, in order to change the regular order for the consideration of private business, taken in connection with Rule XXV and Rule XXVI, to have a two-thirds vote in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. This is not a motion to suspend the rules. Rule XXVIII refers to motions to suspend the rules.

Mr. TAULBEE. This is a motion to change what is the business under the rule.

The SPEAKER. It is a motion to determine what business the House will consider.

Mr. TAULBEE. It is a motion to suspend the operation of Rule XXVI.

The SPEAKER. It is simply a question as to what business the House shall proceed to consider.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 2493) to perfect the quarantine service of the United States; and

A bill (S. 2644) granting the right of way to the Fort Smith, Paris and Dardanelle Railway Company to construct and operate a railroad, telegraph, and telephone line from Fort Smith, Ark., through the Indian Territory, at or near Baxter Springs, in the State of Kansas.

STATISTICAL BUREAU.

Mr. WHEELER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 9827) to create and establish a tariff statistical bureau; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and ordered to be printed.

TARIFF.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Chairman, when Congress assembled in December last this country was enjoying a greater prosperity than any other country in the world. There was no impending crisis or threatened disturbance. There was a surplus of money in the Treasury, but the circulating medium was not so withdrawn from business as to create a stringency, and the country was in a very prosperous condition.

Congress had not been in session for nine months. It was a new Congress without official information on the state of the country. The Constitution that convenes us enjoins upon the President to "give to Congress information of the state of the Union."

I doubt if ever before since the organization of the Government did the Executive fail to comply with this provision. But in place of this annual message the Executive sends to us a platform for his party, stating the issue which is to divide the two great political parties in the Presidential campaign soon to follow, wholly ignoring the vast interests which are committed to his charge and in aid of which we are here to legislate. Hardly a reference does the President make in his message to the duties of the session, except to the one measure which he brings to the front for the contention of both Houses.

Unfortunately for the country we are here to serve, this message of discord prostitutes the session from a legislative body to the arena of a political strife.

The cause for precipitating the issue is alleged to be a surplus in the Treasury, a circumstance that would have occurred at any time in the last twenty years had the Executive ceased to apply the surplus money upon the national debt.

But, I ask, what cause of alarm does the surplus present. Are we so untrustworthy that we can not guard and protect it? Should we doubt our own integrity and ability to preserve this money? Certainly we should not distrust the Executive's watchfulness with his reserve power. At any other time this surplus would have been pointed to by the Administration as an evidence of success. If this accumulation of credit in any way disturbed the business of the country the President had only to obey the law and purchase bonds of the United States for cancellation as the law requires and as both branches of Congress and the people are now insisting he shall do. But a large part of this money constituting the surplus is simply placed to the credit of the Treasury in the public depositories in every part of the United States, and the banks holding those deposits are paying it out over their counters as business may require.

Mr. Chairman, the presence of this surplus in the Treasury gives little cause of alarm compared with the assault made by the President himself upon the business and industries of this country. The surplus has caused no disturbance whatever, no apprehension or alarm; while the message, coming as it does from the high position occupied by its author, falls with great weight upon the business of the country. It excites a fear and apprehension which will cost our people untold millions.

But, sir, the time had come when the people must be aroused, an alarm must be sounded, not really at the condition of the country, for that was never better, but at the dangers which overshadow the future of this Administration. It had been in possession of the Government nearly three years. It came into power upon the plea of economy and a promise that it would exhibit to the people gigantic frauds as soon as possession of the records could be obtained. In both these pretenses they have failed, utterly failed. The frauds were not there, but, instead, a record that challenges a parallel in the history of the world for honesty and fidelity to the people. There never has been an administration from the foundation of the Government down to the present that exceeded this one in personal extravagances. Year by year, since it came into power, has its expenses increased, and year by year they will continue to increase.

Mr. Chairman, if we expect to meet the demands upon the Treasury a very great reduction of taxes will be impossible. If we pay our current expenses, as we must, the interest on the public debt, provide for the sinking fund, and discharge our obligations to the soldiers and their families, if we pay the millions of dollars of just claims against the Government, some of which are drawing interest, we must continue to raise nearly the same revenue we now do. This must be collected through the custom-house or the internal-revenue bureau.

In addition to the demands upon the Treasury to which I have referred, there will mature in three years $230,000,000 of United States bonds, bearing 4½ per cent. interest. The passage of the bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means will reduce the revenues, they say, $78,000,000. This would leave us without any provision whatever for paying these bonds, and how, I ask, are we to meet them?

We are in daily receipt of petitions from all parts of the country protesting against further extension of the national debt or any part of it, and yet here is a bill proposed by the majority of this House deliberately reducing the revenues so low that not one dollar can be applied upon the national debt after its passage. If the revenues remain as they now are, the entire surplus, from this time on to the maturity of these 4½ per cent. bonds, would be needed to pay them. But we need not retain the money in the Treasury. The plain, simple duty of the President is, as it has been during the past year, to purchase from time to time, as the surplus would permit, these bonds and keep the money in circulation. In this way, with the revenues as they now are, he could retire gradually these bonds till the hour of their final maturity would find but few outstanding.

The law authorizing the President to so use the surplus was enacted on the 3d of March, 1881, and reads as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury may at any time apply the surplus money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as he may consider proper, to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds.

An observance of this law would have taken care of every dollar of the surplus of which we now hear so much. But it would have deprived the President of his chief argument which he is now using as a party measure to coerce Congress into the passage of this bill and the people into the support of his administration.

But, sir, if the current expenses of the Government had been paid in the last year and a proper amount of money used in the construction and preservation of our public works and the improvement of our harbors, if the pressing demands, debts, and liabilities of the Government had been paid as business men discharge their obligations, there would have been but little, if any, money in the Treasury with which to purchase bonds.

This surplus was grown to its present proportions for a purpose. Its preparation has been going on for a year or more. Much needed appropriations in the last Congress were withheld and Government business suspended. Our fortifications have been unprotected, piers have gone to pieces, and the channels in our harbors have been filling up because the money to protect these works could not be spared from the surplus. An appropriation of $10,000,000 for the improvement of the rivers and harbors passed both Houses of Congress at the last session, but met with a silent veto in the hands of the President because the money was needed to swell his surplus. Two deficiency bills, amounting to $10,000,000, have already passed this Congress to meet the expenses of the last and other Congresses. I will not stop here.

Our feeble and dilapidated Navy has not a parallel upon the seas. It is excelled by every first and second class power in the world. More than $40,000,000 could be profitably expended in the construction of a navy that would even be respectable. The building of ships would give much life and aid to business and employment to thousands of men. But the money can not be spared. I repeat, had this Government been honest with its citizens and dealt with them as business men deal, had it provided the means necessary to a faithful administration of the Government, the surplus of $55,000,000 would never have appeared.

The amount collected from customs in the year ending June 30, 1887, was		$217,286,893.13
From internal revenue		118,825,201.22
From all other sources		35,292,983.31
Total receipts during the year		371,405,277.66
Total disbursements	$267,932,179.97
Applied on sinking fund	47,894,200.00
		315,826,379.97
Leaving a surplus for the year of		55,576,897.69

But, sir, it may be a reduction of taxes can be had to some extent without great embarassment to the Treasury. If so, I for one am ready to give assent though by the act we commit ourselves to an extension of the national debt which matures in 1891, for we shall have no way of meeting the bonds when they fall due.

In the plan of reduction, however, I shall differ materially from that adopted by the Committee on Ways and Means. I would confine the reductions of duties to the necessaries of life, and to such articles as are not produced or manufactured in this country, or which are produced in such limited quantities as to make the cost of production too great.

The President tells us in his message that the removal or reduction of duties cheapens articles of like grade of home production to the extent of the duty removed. Sir, the greatest part of the goods in use by the poorer and middle classes of the people are manufactured by ourselves, and their price is in no sense affected by the tariff, while it is a fact too well known to be contradicted that the imported goods and home manufactures of similar kind and quality are consumed by the wealthier classes, and a substantial reduction of the duty laid upon such goods will chiefly lighten the burdens of the rich and shift a corresponding amount of taxation to some other source. In other words, a reduction of duties cheapens the price of goods purchased by wealthy people, while it affects but slightly the articles purchased by the poorer classes.

If this reform party wish to relieve the people from unjust burdens, why do they not provide some substantial reduction on articles of general consumption? Why do they not provide in this bill for the removal of the entire duty on sugar? That would reduce the taxes $60,000,000 a year. It would take $1 of taxes from the food of every man, woman, and child in the United States. Such relief would extend to every family, whether they be rich or whether they be poor. Every one consumes sugar, and the same number of dollars would be lifted from each person alike. With great reluctance I would withdraw protection from any industry which has prospect of such growth and development as to warrant that competition which would insure a reduction of price.

But as this promise does not exist for the sugar production in the United States, and as it is conceded that there must be a reduction somewhere, and that some industry must surrender its protection, I would select those which have the least prospect of success and which will contribute most to the comforts of the people when made cheaper. For years we have fostered and favored the sugar interest in the United States, maintaining a higher rate of duty upon it than upon any other article of general consumption. The protection of sugar has cost the people in the last twenty years one-half the sum necessary to pay the national debt, and its developement has made no progress whatever.

The State of Louisiana alone of all the Southern States has made it a principal industry. She has raised about 93 per cent. of all the cane sugar of the United States. In 1860–'61 the sugar crop of Louisiana was 265,063,000 pounds; in all the other Southern States, 9,661,000 pounds. In 1861–'62 the crop in Louisiana was 528,321,500 pounds; in the other Southern States, 11,509,000 pounds. Coming down to the present time, we find the State of Louisiana producing in 1884–'85 only 211,402,963 pounds; the other Southern States, 14,560,000; in 1885–'86, Louisiana, 286,626,486; the other Southern States, 16,128,000; showing an absolute falling off in the quantity produced.

We have been told of the beet sugar and of the sorghum sugar that would soon be produced in large quantities, but they do not appear in our markets in quantities sufficient to affect the price. But even now I would follow the example of Germany and other countries, and give a reasonable bounty for all the cane, beet, and sorhgum sugar which could be produced in the United States. But we should no longer continue this great tax upon the mouths of 60,000,000 people, under the guise of revenue or protection. The entire sugar crop in the United States is only 10 per cent. of the amount consumed, while the duty is nearly one-half the price we pay.

The pending bill takes from this duty only about $10,000,000, leaving $50,000,000 to be hereafter collected each year. This will tax the man who owns no property, not even the roof under which he sleeps, just as many dollars as it does the man whose holdings are measured by the millions in lands and estates, which are guarded and protected by the strong arm of the Government. Yet these gentlemen call this bill a just measure of relief. What principle is there in this revision that places wool and flax and hemp and jute upon the free-list and at the same time taxes the sugar which every one must eat 75 per cent.

Has the political complexion of the State of Louisiana anything to do with the extraordinary measure of protection meted out to her? I trust not, for the question is too important to be influenced by the political fortunes of any State. And yet I greatly fear if that State were located somewhere in New England, or among the Northwestern States, which can not always be relied upon to sustain the present party in power, sugar would share in this bill the same fate of wool and the other farm products so universal in the North, and find its place upon the free-list. If I were to make further substantial reductions in taxation I would go to the internal revenue and take away the tax upon tobacco, except its manufactures. Tobacco is an American production, and the machinery of its taxation is distasteful to our people.

In my judgment such further reduction is unnecessary, perhaps unwise, but the people are demanding it, and I yield my assent. It is possible, too, that the tax should be taken from such spirits as are used in the arts and for medicines, but I would go no further in the reduction of the tax on spirits; and I want to say here to gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, who are so swift to charge free whisky to us, that you are greatly mistaken in your accusation; you may boast of your reduction on clothing and the goods that men of wealth alone can buy, and of the cheapening of every article that enters into the construction of railroads, of Pullman cars and palace cars, but you shall not truly say we favor a repeal of the tax on spirits. If I understand the temper of this side of the House, a very large majority is against it.

Under our system of protection we have in twenty years passed from a minor position to the very front of all the nations in the world. Our common people own their homes, find employment, and are educating their children in the line of industrial habits. Labor is respected and so well paid that all the comforts of life are brought within its reach. Here we find production and consumption dwelling together. Every American product of field, mine, or factory, the value of which is much increased by labor, can only be cheapened by lowering the price of labor.

What farm product is there on which a duty is laid that we can not produce here as well as elsewhere?

What manufacture is there on which a duty is laid that we can not make here as well as in England? Why, then, do we not successfully compete with other countries in whatever we make? There is but one answer to be made. We can not compete with these foreign productions and pay our present price for labor. We can compete with every country in the world in everything except in the products of cheap labor. That alone enables them to drive us from the markets of other countries, and it will enable them to drive us from our own markets unless we maintain such a duty upon their imports as will secure for our people a fair compensation for their labor.

It is vastly better for us to have the articles we consume produced here than in some other country. Whatever we make or raise with our own hands is so much added to our aggregate wealth, and we are not obliged to part with an equivalent.

Under this protection we are now manufacturing $7,000,000,000 worth of goods a year and our farm products amount to $3,000,000,000 more, making a total annual production of $10,000,000,000. Of this vast amount only about 5 per cent. of the goods and 8 per cent. of the farm products are marketed abroad. All of the remainder is consumed at home. The President and his party tell us that we must reduce the tariff and encourage importations from other countries if we would find a like market for our own productions with them. There is no logic in this statement; we can not compete with them now with all our industries in successful operation and maintain the price we pay for labor. How can we compete in foreign ports with our fabrics displaced at home by importations with the cost of transportation added, any better then than we now can? How are we better able to sell our products abroad after a disturbing element has forced us from our own markets and greatly injured our business? But it is absolutely certain, if we keep our mills in motion, we shall be obliged to seek a foreign market after we destroy our own. We must not forget that these importations are the product of labor in the form of goods imported to displace American labor. In 1887, $679,000,000 worth of goods and raw materials were imported to the United States; more than $500,000,000 of this was the product of labor, displacing just so much here.

Had our tariff been so high as to prohibit this importation all of the $679,000,000 in value would have been raised and manufactured here in our own country. But the bill before the House would double the quantity every year, to the displacement of just so much more of our labor and raw material.

That is not all. The men and their families who performed this work in foreign lands required food and clothing, houses and fuel, and all that sustains life while employed, and had they been here our producers would have enjoyed the benefits. Nay, more. All the shops and machinery used for the manufacture of these imports were constructed by foreign labor and material in place of ours.

If this work can be performed in America, why should it be done elsewhere? Why not pay the $679,000,000 which these goods cost us to our own people and enrich Americans, not Englishmen? Have we not the land on which the raw material can be raised? Have we not the mines, the ore, the timber; in fact, the resources of every description? Have we not the labor, skilled and unskilled, which can perform the work in converting this material into the finest and best manufactures in the world? And have we not millions of idle capital seeking investment? Why, then, go to England, to Germany, or any other country for goods or material which we can produce at home? Simply because we have to pay our laborers a fair compensation for their work. There is no other reason for it.

If we will reduce the wage-earner to the scale of Great Britain, Germany, Belgium, and France, we will have no occasion to visit their markets for the goods we need; but when they place the products of their cheap labor by the side of ours in the form of material, goods, and machinery, we must close our factories or scale down our labor. In either case as the laboring men are deprived of the means of support they will leave the factory and the shop to setttle upon lands, and soon they will find themselves raising produce without a market for it.

If we pass this bill and provide a market for the manufactured goods of Great Britain, we shall win for her a greater victory than she can win for herself in Parliament or upon the battle-field. Pass this bill and all the free-trade journals of England will sound our praise, and the Cobden Club will send congratulations and welcome us with open arms as they proceed to absorb and demolish the great industries of America. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I hear from the other side of this Chamber much said about monopolies. I have heard that same song for more than a half score of years. In fact the ghost of monopoly is always with them, on all occasions and for all purposes, ready to aid and assist them when reason is dethroned and arguments will not prevail. And yet no one here arises to defend or excuse monopolies and trusts, but all are ready to condemn them. I know of no connection between a protective tariff and monopolies. In fact the very object of a tariff is to protect the weak. No country in the world has greater monopolies than free-trade England. But I can imagine no monopoly so sweeping and disastrous and so humiliating to witness, none that would so crush out the spirit of our people, as the monopoly of Great Britain upon the markets and industries of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, when I travel through this country, from one end to the other, and see the thrift and industry of the people, when I see the school-houses, the churches and colleges, the learning and intelligence, when I see the cultivated farms, with the seeders and mowers moving in all directions, as the seed time and harvest come, when I see factories and workshops in the villages and cities, I see something for every willing hand to do. I see comfortable homes and houses for all classes of our people, which I know to be the fruits of well-paid labor, and I contrast this country in its grandeur and glory with the countries where free trade abounds with a pride and satisfaction which I can not describe. [Applause.]

Go to England, and you will find her streets and public places thronged with a poorly-fed, poorly-clothed, and destitute people, seeking a few hours of work to buy bread for hungry wives and children.

Those who are so fortunate as to obtain employment receive but half the compensation paid to our people for like service. Such is the situation in Italy, in France, and in Germany. The battle there with the millions is a battle for existence, a struggle for life. Official reports tell us that in Manchester alone 90,000 women are working in the factories for $60 per year. The laboring men throughout England receive but $125 to $150 per year. In no spot or place in the wide world do the laborers receive such compensation as here in America. I submit a table of prices, taken from consular reports, compiled by the Secretary of State in 1885, showing the price per week paid for labor in seven foreign countries, in New York and Chicago.

Occupations.	Austria.	Belgium.	France.	Germany.	Great Britain.	Netherlands.	Switzerland.	United States.

But they say "Remove the duties on imports and we can make good our loss in the price of wages by the saving in the price of goods we purchase." We should not forget that this saving will be very small, while we will feel the full weight of a reduction in the price of labor the year round. It may be true that a coat on which much labor has been expended can be bought in England for $10 which would cost thirteen in this country; but we must not forget that the extra dollars are paid to support the price of American labor. In the one case the tailor receives $3 for his four days of toil, while the other is paid six or seven dollars for the same work. So it is with every other occupation in which labor forms a principal part.

Labor and capital should work together. Neither can succeed without the other, and the nearer we bring the market to the place of manufacture the better for both.

No class of people have more interest in protection than the American farmer. A home market is his crowning success. Since our protective system our population has increased so rapidly that the farmer is enabled to sell for home consumption 92 per cent. of his entire crop. It will be a great mistake for the American farmer to build a hope on a foreign market. Better by far that he look to our own country as the only reliable field for the consumption of his products. But even under the present tariff there were imported into this country last year farm products amounting to $74,734,573. I submit a table showing the amount of each:

Animals	$4,631,846	Provisions	$1,896,259
Breadstuffs	6,640,228	Rice	1,674,394
Flax, hemp, etc., raw	12,312,853	Tobacco, raw	8,704,559
Fruits	15,840,827	Vegetables	2,350,351
Hay	790,394	Wool, raw	16,424,479
Hops	3,404,669
Barley malt	153,363	Total	74,734,573

These importations took the place of so many products that should have been raised by our own farmers, and the labor employed in their growth and culture should have been American. But this bill places a large portion of these articles upon the free-list, and if it becomes a law more than twice this amount will be imported to us and sold every year hereafter.

This bill proposes to wipe out all protection whatever to the farmer in his struggle to keep alive the sheep industry and place him and the American people wholly at the mercy of foreign competition. It places wool upon the free-list, and, according to the President's rule, reduces its price 10 and 12 cents per pound. This would inflict a severe blow upon our farmers without reason or justification, as wool is now as cheap as any one could possibly wish. It would wipe out and destroy more than $200,000,000 in value now employed in the raising of sheep.

Since the reduction of the duty on wool of 12 per cent. ad valorem, in 1883, the sheep in the United States have decreased 6,000,000 head. Take from the present low price of wool 10 and 12 cents per pound, or even one-half that sum, and it will destroy every flock of sheep in the country. Australia, with her 75,000,000 sheep, of excellent grade, stands ready to profit by our misfortune. Her labor and lands cost but a nominal price, and the removal of the duty on wool will place her product in our mills. The duty, and that alone, keeps it in check. South America, too, will be here with her wools, and our free-traders bid them welcome. If we are to give up these industries, one after another, why not place wheat upon the free-list? It can be purchased in the Northwest, on the Canada side, for 8 and 10 cents less than upon our side. Let Minneapolis obtain a supply for her great mills from the region of Manitoba, grown by Canadian farmers. India, too, is at the port of New York, with her wheat at 70 cents per bushel, and if it were not for the duty of 20 cents the great cities of the coast would buy their bread of India. Why not take away this duty as well as that upon wool?

There is still another product, most valuable to the farmer, which this bill will greatly injure. The tobacco crop has become extensive and very remunerative. Its chief profit lies in the higher grades. The Island of Sumatra can furnish us with a wrapper one pound of which is equal to three of ours for wrapping purposes. It has been held in check only by a duty of 75 cents per pound. This bill reduces that rate to 35 cents. Its passage will be looked for by the merchants and shippers who hold large quantities in store to launch upon us at the first opportunity. Pass this bill and they will supply our market.

The President tells us in his message:

> The radical reduction of the duties imposed on raw material used in manufactories, or its free importation, is of course an important factor in any effort to reduce the price of these measures. It would not only relieve them from the increased cost caused by the tariff on such material, but the manufactured product being thus cheapened, that part of the tariff upon such product, as a compensation to the manufacturer for the price of raw material, could be accordingly modified.

By the reduction of the duty on tobacco the President would cheapen the price of cigars to the consumer, but he would make competition by the American farmer with Sumatra tobacco impossible.

The President consoles the laborer by telling him wages should not be reduced, because the manufacturer, the duty being removed, can purchase his raw material at reduced prices. But he fails to point out a remedy for the farmer, who sees his product placed in competition with those of other countries where land and labor are of little value. Manufacturers, however, will not be pleased with a dependency upon foreign markets for their raw material. The maker of twine for binding grain writes me—

> If the duty is taken from hemp and flax (as this bill proposes) we believe there will not be a pound grown in the United States.

If we cease to raise raw material the manufacturing plants will be transferred to the field of production, and where cheap labor may be had also. If I were a manufacturer of woolens I should regret to see the sheep driven from this continent. Once gone, and the foreign grower could name his own terms, and our independence would be changed to dependence, which in the time of war, if we were to clothe an army, might present a serious problem.

Attempt has been made and it is now daily charged that protection is maintained for the benefit of the manufacturer and not in the interest of labor. The President is author of the statement that a reduction of the price of goods might take place without a corresponding reduction in the price of labor.

If people are beguiled into the support of this theory, and ultimately find themselves degraded to the level of Europeans, God help the party that led the way to the tomb of American labor.

Let me ask those who are disposed to listen to this folly, how they propose to obtain from the employer a greater share of his profits than they are now receiving? Would a blow that cripples the business in which they are engaged tend to better their condition? Would they be as likely to receive a just share of the earnings if the goods they make are reduced in price by foreign competition, as they would be if no reduction were made? If the manufacturer is obliged to produce an article at a less price than he is now receiving, would he not be likely to scale down the wages of his employés to meet the reduction on the price of the goods; and if he choose to do so, or withdraw his capital from the business, how are they to prevent it?

These questions, it seems to me, are entitled to careful consideration Akin to this theory is the oft-repeated charge that labor is now being cheated of its just share, and that this protection inures wholly to the benefit of the manufacturer in the shape of enormous profits, and that if a reduction of the tariff takes place, and a corresponding reduction of all the fruits of labor, from the farm hand to the artisan, still the employer, whether he be farmer, herder, builder, manufacturer, contractor, or jobber, merchant, or miller, can if he will pay the same price for all his labor and have remaining his just and full share. What a pity it is that some of these theorists could not have a little experience and be a farmer, a manufacturer, or other employer for a while, so he could test the correctness of his wisdom. I sometimes think if the leaders of strikes were obliged to labor themselves their occupation would soon be gone, and if we had less Solons and more of the practical ways of Benjamin Franklin we would not weave so many snares for our constituents.

If we will study the laws of trade, supply, and demand, and consider the inevitable result of competition, we must abandon the idea that, in a country like this, where all the channels of industry are open and free, where intelligence and enterprise have marked every epoch of our lives, from our fathers and founders of the Republic down to the present hour, one class of the people can engage in business alongside of millions and millions of capital unemployed and carry it on reaping enormous gains year after year undiscovered by their astute neighbors whose money is earning nothing whatever. Mr. Chairman, it is asking too much to believe these charges, to say nothing of the sincerity and purposes of such arguments. Why, sir, look at the great volume of idle capital in this country.

The deposits in the savings-banks on the 30th day of June last—and the greatest part of them is in the States alongside of these very manufacturing establishments—amounted to $1,235,000,000; and it is said two-thirds or more of these deposits belong to the laboring people. Why do they not invest their money in the capital stock of these factories, instead of depositing it in the banks at a nominal rate of interest, if the earnings of their employers are so great? Go further. The deposits of business men and capitalists in the national banks at the same time were $1,274,000,000, and $1,000,000,000 more was deposited in the State and private banks, making a total of $3,509,000,000 of idle capital subject to order in the banks.

Yet we are told that by the side of this vast amount of unemployed capital these manufacturers are able to prosecute their business with such success as to acquire immense fortunes in a very short period.

A noted statistician cites the business of seventy cotton mills in New England with a capital of $61,000,000, for three years, the dividends of which averaged 5½ per cent. per annum on the capital invested.

It is well known that should a 3 per cent. United States bond be placed upon the market a thousand million dollars would be taken at the par value within sixty days. It is difficult to understand, if these manufacturers are massing such fortunes and appropriating to their own use far in excess of their just proportion of the profits of their transactions, as the President and our tariff reformers would have us understand, why they should rob the farmer and place wool and other raw material required by the manufacturer for his purposes upon the free-list to augment his profits already too large.

The complaint has the ring of unsoundness, and is in conflict with every well-settled principle of competition, while the commercial reports which I have been able to secure absolutely overthrow the statement. It is folly to believe that such large profits are made and retained by the manufacturer while so much capital remains idle, but which would be gladly used, even with small profits, if opportunity were afforded.

Competition will establish values, and it is folly to say that any enterprise which has character and principle can yield such large fortunes by the side of untold sums of idle capital. An honorable and profitable business always invites capital until competitoin brings the product of the business to the lowest remunerative price. Duties are imposed to bar out the goods of unhealthy productions.

Bankrupt sales are destructive and harmful, as every one knows, to a legitimate business. Sacrifice must be made, and the assets are forced upon the market. In transactions of this kind every principle of trade is violated, and injury results from the demoralized condition of the market which it produces.

No healthy business can compete with such sales. So with the foreign trade and products transported to this country at prices below our own. Labor has been defrauded of its just dues. The product is brought to our market for sale and to take the place of our goods and our labor. This bill proposes to let them come. We say, "No! Go back with your wares; they shall not enter our ports for sale until you pay into our Treasury such a duty as will make you respect the labor of this country and place your goods alongside of our fabrics on equal footing."

The complaint of heavy taxes has taken chronic form. Many really believe we are a greatly oppressed people. Those who assail the protective policy charge that nearly everything we eat, drink, or wear is laden with heavy duties, while as a matter of fact the principal articles of consumption and use in the daily routine of our families is neither taxed nor influenced by taxes. These articles are either upon the free-list or of a class not affected by duties. Protection as to them has long since accomplished its purpose, and they can be purchased here cheaper than elsewhere. Such is the condition of much of our farm produce, wheat, oats, beef, and pork. Importations of this class are rarely known except along the Canada line. During the last year the importations of merchandise were valued at $733,000,000 on which no duties whatever were laid, while duties were collected from $450,000,000. Careful examination will disclose that the articles which enter most into consumption among the poorer and middle classes will be found upon the free-list.

The entire tax collected through the custom-houses and the Internal-Revenue Bureau in 1887 was $336,110,284.95. Of this $135,373,392.22 was collected from spirits and tobacco alone, $15,549,301 from silks, $2,949,360 from fancy articles, and $37,292,855 from animals, breadstuffs, fruit, hay, hops, malt, provisions, and vegetables, leaving only $144,954,376.13 collected from all other sources, and of this sum $68,016,686 was laid upon sugar, which I would remove at once, but which this bill does not propose to do.

Take away the duty on sugar and there will remain only $86,937,689.13 which was collected from all other sources. A small per cent. only of the revenues were collected on the imports which were necessary to the comforts and conveniences of life.

They tell us our protective policy has driven our commerce from the high seas, and that we have but few ships under our flag, while free-trade England covers the ocean with her masts. Great Britain has her provinces in every part of the world, and her carrying trade with them is done by water. But while England has invested her capital in ships, America has invested hers in railways. Our possessions are at home, our commerce is internal and worth vastly more to us than England's ocean trade is to her. The United States has 150,000 miles of railway track, valued at $8,000,000,000, nearly one-half of the railroads in the whole world. We have a coast marine covering the shores of this great continent, and not equaled in any country. Our trade, our commerce, and our markets are at home, and we, upon this side of the Chamber, are here to defend and protect them against assaults or invasions from any source whether it be foreign or domestic.

But, Mr. Chairman, while we are now in the enjoyment of very great prosperity we should not close our eyes upon the future. The delusive picture of foreign markets for our products is drawn before us with promises of trade and great exportations as soon as we open our gates to the admission of foreign commodities. I ask, what do we have in this country, except it may be our cotton and wheat, that is not produced in other countries with cheaper labor and cheaper lands? Reports tell us to-day Russia alone can supply the United Kingdom with wheat and have 30,000,000 bushels of her surplus yet to spare. India can do nearly the same. The store-houses of England, from basement to attic, are filled with manufactured goods, waiting for the passage of this bill now before the House. This is the picture of to-day, and you take away the protection we have thrown around the industries of America and you will find its repetition year after year until the standard of American labor is prostrated to the level of competition. I warn this House against the fatal step.

But, sir, before we enter upon a general reduction of the tariff, we should consider well its effect upon the great industrial interests of this country, and whether the proposed change is not in the interests of some other than our own. We are constantly referred by gentlemen upon the other side to the example of free-trade England. I am willing to leave them to study the history of that country, but for one I prefer to follow the living example of progressive America. The time was when we might look forward to England, perhaps with profit, but the time has now come when we must look far in the background to discover her locality, and I do not propose to do it. [Applause.]

Rather let us stand by the fostering policy which has made us so great, and this the grandest country in the world. I would add to the structure which our fathers began, and rear the Republic, like the strong oak, to stand alone and erect amid the storms that come against it. I would do this for my country as a whole, for there is not a State I would not assist nor an inch of soil I would not protect. [Applause.]

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Chairman, immediately after this Congress organized President Cleveland transmitted his now celebrated annual message, which opened with these suggestive words:

You are confronted at the threshold of your legislative duties with a condition of the national finances which imperatively demands immediate and careful consideration.

The amount of money annually exacted, through the operation of present laws, from the industries and necessities of the people largely exceeds the sum necessary to meet the expenses of the Government. * * *

It will not do to neglect this situation because its dangers are not now palpable, imminent, and apparent. They exist none the less certainly, and await the unforeseen and unexpected occasion when suddenly they will be precipitated upon us. * * *

Our surplus revenues have continued to accumulate, the excess for the present year amounting, on the 1st day of December, to $55,258,701.19, and estimated to reach the sum of $113,000,000 on the 30th of June next, at which date it is expected that this sum, added to prior accumulations, will swell the surplus of the Treasury to $140,000,000.

And, after a masterly presentation of the reasons rendering a reduction of our system of tariff taxation necessary, he concluded as follows:

The Constitution provides that the President "shall, from time to time, give to the Congress information of the state of the Union." It has been the custom of the Executive, in compliance with this provision, to annually exhibit to the Congress at the opening of its session the general condition of the country and to detail with some particularity the operations of the different Executive Departments. It would be especially agreeable to follow this course at the present time, and to call attention to the valuable accomplishments of these Departments during the last fiscal year. But I am so much impressed with the paramount importance of the subject to which this communication has thus far been devoted that I shall forego the addition of any other topic and only urge upon your immediate consideration the "state of the Union" as shown in the present condition of our Treasury and our general fiscal situation, upon which every element of our safety and prosperity depends.

It is needless to say that that message attracted the attention of the country, and gave to the subject of revenue reform an importance in public estimation it never before possessed. It made this question the paramount issue before the country. It brought it to the front; and the response that has come up from the people is such that no set of men will—as in the Forty-ninth Congress—dare to attempt to prevent a consideration of this bill, or any other upon the subject.

It was not to be anticipated that there would be a general acquiescence in the views of the President. The selfish interests of the monopolies and "protected" industries indicted by this message were expected to rush to arms, as they have done, in defense of their long enjoyed system of plundering the people through the means of a protective tariff. From the day that message was read to us our mail has been loaded down with letters, circulars, petitions, pamphlets, and marked copies of newspapers, appealing to us to let the present tariff tax remain upon the articles, products, or commodities that they were each respectively interested in.

Everyone of the "protected" branches of business made an appeal, that showed it was "every man for himself and the devil take the hindmost." Even those who—taking advantage of the fact that they were "protected" from foreign competition—had banded themselves into "trusts" and other combinations to avoid competition and further increase or keep up prices, with an affrontery that would cause Satan to blush, have appealed to us to continue the system of robbery of the people by law that has prevailed for the past quarter of a century. Talk about paupers and beggars! A stranger, ignorant of the incentive and our past tariff system, would upon reading these appeals declare that those protectionists were our national beggars. And they are, in fact, our national beggars—begging for more, while they are the wealthiest in our land. All that wealth, prompted by self-interest could do, has been done to defeat a reduction of the present rate of tariff taxes. Arguments, appealing to the selfishness of different classes of our people, based upon groundless and false assumptions, have been made for years; and these means have been employed so long, and with such success, as to capture and secure, as the champion and protector of "protection" the entire Republican party of the country. This assertion no gentleman upon the other side can or will deny—with the possible exception of my colleague [Mr. NELSON], who may, notwithstanding the "cold shoulder" that has been shown him since he delivered his tariff-reduction speech, still claim to be a member of that party.

HOW PROTECTIONISTS ARE WORKING.

It is not to be wondered at that these "protected" interests, so varied, extensive, and powerful, should have secured control of one of the great political parties of the country. The protectionists have pleaded their cause with effect. While the great mass of the people who till the soil or are engaged in pursuits other than those "protected" have been moving along in the hope that their wrongs would be righted without much effort on their part, the protectionists have with ceaseless vigilance and lavish expenditure labored to defeat any attempt to reduce or disturb the existing list of tariff taxes. As a single fact in the great mass of evidence that could be produced to show the tremendous efforts that have been (and are being) put forth to convert the public to their way of thinking, I submit this item from the editorial columns of the Bulletin of March 7, 1888, a paper that is the organ of the American Iron and Steel Association.

366,413.

This is the exact number of tariff tracts, published by the Industrial League, of Philadelphia, which were distributed from the office of the American Iron and Steel Association from the 1st of January last to the close of business on the 5th of March. On the 28th of February the president of the Industrial League, Mr. Joseph Wharton, paid to Allen, Lane & Scott for printing tariff tracts, one bill which amounted to $2,638.36.

In its last issue it has this item:

657,487 TARIFF TRACTS.

From the 15th of January until the close of business on April 25, 1888, the American Iron and Steel Association distributed gratuitously 657,437 well printed tariff tracts, published by the Industrial League, of Philadelphia.

And by letters received, I am informed that they are flooding the State of Minnesota with these tracts.

Gloating over the reported suspension of The Million newspaper, this paper says:

We think that we know the exact influence which has caused the suspension of Mr. Philpot's free-trade newspaper, The Million, at Des Moines, Iowa. In 1886 the Industrial League, of Philadelphia, sent 72,556 protective-tariff tracts to Iowa, and down to the 1st of November in the present year it had sent 57,902 to the same State. These were distributed among the farmers and other voters of that State. The Million could not live under this steady fire of hard facts and common sense.

The editor of the Bulletin evidently thought he was satisfying the members of the Iron and Steel Association when he published this interesting item, and that their president, with lavish hand, paid "one bill, which amounted to $2,638.36;" but I doubt if the association will be pleased to learn that I thus assist in giving it publicity. As an interesting question in arithmetic, I submit the following: If one bill for printing alone of this protected association amounted to $2,638.36, what does the grand aggregate which the protectionists have expended to prevent reduction of tariff taxation amount to?

OUR FINANCIAL CONDITION.

Another question here suggested is: How much of this vast sum was expended through a sincerely philanthropic desire to benefit the laboring men, in whose behalf they shout so boldly in their frantic efforts to prevent a reduction of these tariff taxes?

On the other hand, the Democratic party has championed the cause of that portion of our people who are not benefited by protection, but who are compelled to pay a certain percentage upon everything they buy to these proprietors of "protected" industries without receiving anything in return. This class, who are thus unjustly taxed, includes farmers, workingmen, mechanics, professors, artisans, and in fact nine-tenths of our entire people, as I will show later on. They have had no associations, companies, or organizations to maintain a campaign in their behalf, or to flood the country with "tracts" presenting the people's side of this great question, and no treasury from which they could pay out nearly $3,000 at a time and as often as necessary. But we believe they have justice and right upon their side, and "thrice armed is he whose cause is just."

This is the situation as it presents itself to my view, and, conceding to each gentleman upon this floor sincerity and honesty in the expression of his opinions, I will now proceed to consider the questions submitted to us by the message of the President.

To my mind the facts fully warrant the importance given to them by the President. I shall not indulge in any fine-spun theories upon the subject of finance or import duties, or attempt any flights of oratory. The discussion of this question can only be made eloquent to our people by the presentation of facts, not mere assertions, that will throw light upon this all-important and absorbing subject.

The President tells us that at the close of the fiscal year, June 30, for the years mentioned the surplus was as follows:

1885	$17,859,735.84
1886	49,465,545.20
1887	55,567,889.54

He then estimated that the aggregate of this surplus at the close of the present fiscal year, June 30 next, would be $140,000,000. Later estimates place it at $155,000,000.

We have become so accustomed to speak of hundreds of millions that we fail to realize or appreciate the magnitude of these amounts. Pause for a moment and reflect upon it. Assuming our entire population to be 60,000,000, here is a sum of money equal to over $2.50 for every man, woman, and child, collected from our people in excess, bear in mind, of what is required to meet every matured obligation of the Government, and which is now lying idle in the National Treasury.

It is unnecessary for me to say that if this continues general bankruptcy must follow. The dullest of comprehensions will see that if this system continued we would have all the money in the country hoarded up in the National Treasury in a few years.

The money that is collected by the Government for the proper and legitimate purpose of meeting its current expenses is paid out to those to whom it is indebted soon after it is received. It therefore soon finds its way back into the channels of trade and commerce and contributes to the business prosperity of the country. But when revenues are in excess of the needs of the Government—when more is collected than needed—the amount of that surplus is as valueless to the country as if sunk in the depths of the ocean so long as it is locked up in the Treasury. It is therefore a great wrong—I had almost said crime—for us to longer permit this unnecessary accumulation and locking up the money of our people.

This brings us to a consideration of how we should reduce the revenues; and we should begin by examining the present sources of revenue.

The revenues of the present fiscal year we will have to estimate from, and by comparison with, the last fiscal year. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, we collected—

From customs	$217,286,893.13
From internal revenue	118,823,391.22
From sales of public lands	9,254,286.42
From profits on coins, bullion deposits, and assays	8,929,252.83
From tax on national banks	2,385,851.18
From fees, consular, letters-patent, and land	3,301,647.16
From customs fees, fines, penalties, etc	1,053,037.86
From sales of Indian lands	1,479,028.81
From Soldiers' Home permanent fund	1,226,259.47
From sinking fund for Pacific railways	1,364,435.87
From repayment of interest by Pacific railways	914,793.13
From sales of old public buildings	624,882.20
From sales of Government property	262,832.32
From immigrant fund	258,402.50
From tax on sealskins	317,452.75
From deposits by individuals for surveying public lands	94,289.76
From revenues of the District of Columbia	2,367,869.01
From miscellaneous sources	1,458,672.04
Total ordinary receipts	371,403,277.66

A glance at this statement of the different sources of revenue will show that any reduction, such as is absolutely necessary, must be made in either or both of the two first items, "customs" or "internal revenue."

The imports of this country during the last fiscal year were	$692,000,000
Of which were free of duty	232,000,000
Leaving dutiable	460,000,000
On which duties were collected	217,000,000

The average duty collected is therefore 47 per cent.

Of this $217,000,000, collected as "customs" or "import duties" (which are but other names for what we term the tariff), there were collected upon that portion of articles, which may properly be classed among the necessaries of life, the following amounts thereof:

Sugar, molasses, and sugar-candy	$58,016,686.00
Iron and steel, and manufactures of	20,713,234.00
Wool	5,899,817.00
Manufactures of wool	29,729,717.00
Silk, manufactures of	15,540,301.00
Glass and glassware	4,510,312.00
Earthenware	2,409,796.16
Hemp, jute, and flax goods	6,228,310.41
Lumber (in round numbers)	1,000,000.00
Salt (in round numbers)	700,000.00
Cotton and cotton goods	1,233,599.57
Total	145,981,773.14

The balance of the $217,000,000 was collected from articles and goods that partake of the character of luxuries, such as tobacco, diamonds, and jewelry.

Here, then, we find that there was collected during the last fiscal year, as tariff taxes upon these articles of necessity, the enormous sum of $145,981,773, every dollar of which was, of course, added to the selling price of these articles by the importer and collected from the consumer—the people.

THE TARIFF.

But this tax is not limited to articles imported into this country. It is manifest that if our merchants and dealers who import these articles did not have to pay this tax upon them they could afford to sell them to us for a less amount; the reduction being equal to the tax or duty now paid upon them. This being the case, this tariff enables our home manufacturer to add to the price of his goods the amount of the tariff tax, for without this protective tariff he would have to sell in competition with the imported article; he would have to sell at a reduction equal to the amount of the tariff tax removed.

That we may have a correct idea of the amount of tariff tax our people have to pay upon the necessaries of life which they purchase, I submit this list of several articles out of the many. It will well repay perusal and study:

TAXES ON THE KITCHEN.

	Per cent.
The iron the stove is made of	45
Hollow ware, pots, and kettles	53
Copper and brass utensils, if any	45
Crockery, of the commonest kind	55
Glassware, of the cheapest kind	45
Table cutlery and spoons	45
Pickled or salted fish	25
Salt	36
Sugar	48
Vinegar	36
Pickles	35
Rice	123
Oranges, and other foreign fruit, about	20

TAXES ON THE PARLOR.

Carpet, if made of druggets	74
Carpet, if made of tapestry	68
Furniture	35
Wall-paper	25
Window-curtains	45
Looking-glass	60
Ornaments or knickknacks	35

TAXES ON THE WARDROBE.

Men's clothing, of wool	48
Woolen hosiery and undershirts	75
Cotton hosiery and undershirts	45
Woolen hats and caps	75

Gloves	60
Blankets	60
Alpaca dresses	63
Any other woolen dresses	70
A pair of scissors	45
Brass pins	45
Hair-pins	30
Penknives	50
Needles	25
Steel pins	45
Ink	20
Paper	25
Razors	45

TAXES ON SUNDRIES.

Castor-oil	102
Castile-soap	50
A dose of Epsom salts	20
Insect powder	20
Salad oil	34
Commonest window-glass for houses	80
Paint (white lead) for the farm-house	54
Brick	35
Roofing slates	30
Horseshoe-nails	31
Trace-chains	53
A handsaw	40
Files	40
Spool thread	60
Bag and bagging for grain	40
A burr-stone	20
Combs and brushes	30
A wooden pipe	80
An alpaca umbrella	50
Any iron or steel a farmer may need, average of	45
Tin cups, skimmers, dippers, and all tinware	42
Tin-plate for canning meats and fruits	34
Fencing boards, $2 per thousand
Pine boards for building, about	20
If planed	33
Fencing posts, about	30
Shingles for roof	25
Lath for house-building	20
Barbed wire for fencing	55

This list comprises but sixty-six out of about four thousand articles so taxed. It is large enough, however, to illustrate the iniquity of a high tariff, and shows how much the consumers of these articles have to pay, without compensation, for the benefit of certain classes. It will surprise many to learn that $16.18 of every $100 worth of rough lumber they buy is a tariff-tax to keep Canadian lumber out. And where does the "pauper labor" come in here? Will any one say that lumber can not be cut as cheap upon one side of the line, between us and Canada, as another. The price of dry goods will be seen to be more than doubled by the tariff-tax, and other articles increased in an equally remarkable proportion.

These facts present the status of the customs revenue, or tariff tax, as clearly as I can present them in the brief space allotted to me; and before considering the question of where and how the necessary reduction should be made, I will first refer to the internal revenues, and examine into the character of the items that go to make up the aggregate given in the statement of the various sources of revenue which I have read.

THE INTERNAL REVENUE.

The sources from which was derived this $118,837,301.06 of "internal revenue" can be classified as follows:

Spirits	$65,829,321.71
Fermented liquors	21,922,187.49
Tobacco, in different forms	30,108,067.13
Oleomargarine	723,948.04
Penalties	220,204.83
Collections	29,283.49
From banks	4,288.37
Total	118,837,301.06

Now, I believe no gentleman here will have the hardihood to claim that any of the above internal-revenue taxes are imposed upon what are conceded to be the necessaries of life. Mr. Blaine did, in a recent letter, claim that tobacco was; but if his present "boomers" should be successful he will wish before the next campaign is over that instead of sending it he had said to his servant, "Burn this letter."

If we have any regard for the interests and welfare of the people at large and are not directly interested in "protected" industries, we must favor a reduction of the revenues of the Government to only what is needed by reducing these tariff taxes upon the necessaries of life, even to the extent of in some cases putting some of them upon the free-list. The revenues of the Government should as far as possible be derived from sources that can best afford to pay them, such as incomes, whisky, tobacco, oleomargarine, and other proper sources of internal revenue.

And here is a suitable time to meet and refute the charge so glibly made that we who advocate tariff of this kind are "free-traders." A free-trader is one who is in favor of free and unrestricted trade with the outside world and the payment of the expenses of the Government by direct taxation of the people.

Now, if there is a gentleman upon this (Democratic) side of the Hall who favors absolute free trade I do not know it. There is one upon the other side who comes so very near to it, in advocating reciprocity with Canada, that many may fail to discover the distinction. I of course allude to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH].

We as a party are pledged to the reduction of the tariff to such a rate as will not exceed the needs of the Government economically administered; and we favor so imposing this tax as to, as far as possible consistent with "the greatest good to the greatest number," give incidental protection to our home industries. Individually I would limit this qualification to such industries as have not become one of the numerous arms of that modern commercial octopus or "devil-fish," the "trust" fiend.

The person who will charge any person entertaining these views with being a "free-trader" is singularly oblivious to contradicting facts, or he purposely misrepresents. To prove this we have but to consider the amount of money that is required to be raised annually to meet the current expenses of the Government. Let us refer to it.

ESTIMATED FUTURE EXPENSES.

For the ensuing fiscal year, ending June 30, 1889, the Secretary of the Treasury gives the following as the estimates of the several Executive Departments:

Legislative		$3,272,110.85
Executive		18,852,734.95
Judicial		422,200.60
Foreign intercourse		1,947,865.00
Military establishment		25,692,574.54
Naval establishment		21,948,032.57
Indian affairs		5,488,097.66
Pensions		76,312,400.00
Public works:
Legislative	$4,000.00
State Department	6,000.00
Treasury Department	5,074,446.00
War Department	22,381,151.20
Navy Department	1,653,591.56
Interior Department	915,798.90
Department of Justice	44,967.00
		30,081,982.66
Postal service		1,403,499.42
Miscellaneous		20,802,193.36
District of Columbia		5,265,702.35
Permanent annual appropriations:
Interest on public debt	$42,500,000.00
Sinking fund	47,844,158.90
Refunding—customs, internal revenue, lands, etc.,	11,943,000.00
Collecting revenue from customs	5,500,000.00
Miscellaneous	7,853,640.00
		115,640,798.90
Total estimated expenditures, including sinking fund..		326,530,793.26
Or an estimated surplus of		56,469,206.74

Increased expenditures for river and harbor improvements and pensions may add fifteen to twenty millions to the above. If we were to make no reduction in the internal-revenue taxes and apply the whole of them to the payment of these expenditures there would still be over two hundred millions to raise by tariff taxation. Is not the imposition of this enormous sum of over $200,000,000 annually a sufficient incidental protection to our own industries and manufactures? And yet the bill under consideration proposes to reduce the internal-revenue taxes $24,455,607, which amount must be added to the more than two hundred million, which I have stated to be necessary to be raised by a tariff upon imported articles.

HOW SHOULD THE SURPLUS BE REDUCED?

This brings us to the question as to how the present excessive revenues should be reduced and whether the bill under consideration is worthy of support.

We are not "free-traders." We are simply demanding what was promised us by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] away back in 1870, when, in answer to a demand for a reduction of this high tariff, he said:

Keep your duties high enough to induce other men to build furnaces and rolling-mills, and before five years you will find American iron cheapened to the level of the markets of the world, and that, too, without a commensurate reduction of wages.

We are simply asking by this bill what President Arthur, in his annual message in 1882, recommended:

An enlargement of the free-list, * * * a simplification of the complex and inconsistent schedule of duties upon certain manufactures, cotton, iron, and steel, and a substantial reduction of the duties upon these articles and upon sugar, molasses, silk, wool, and woolen goods.

This he substantially repeated in his last message in 1884, and that distinguished financier, Secretary McCulloch, in his accompanying annual report, said:

As relief from the present burden of taxation is urgently and justly demanded, I deem it my duty to suggest that something in this direction should be done without delay. * * * This much, however, it may be proper for me to recommend: First, that the existing duties upon raw materials which are to be used in manufacture should be removed; second, that the duties upon the articles used or consumed by those least able to bear the burden of taxation shall be reduced.

We have waited many years for what the gentleman from Pennsylvania said would come more than a dozen years ago, and because we now favor a bill in accordance with what President Arthur and Secretary McCulloch declared to be right we are called "free-traders." If we are, so are many Republicans whose vision is not obscured by partisan bias.

BILL DOES NOT GO FAR ENOUGH.

I am frank to say that this bill does not meet with my unqualified approval. I am not fully satisfied with it, because it does not go far enough. We of the Northwest have had to submit too long to having our money taken from our pockets by the legalized robbery called a protective tariff to cheerfully acquiesce in the enactment of any measure that does not put an end to it. Tariff taxes necessary for the support of the Government, economically administered, and the meeting of all its obligations, we will willingly pay; but we insist that the taxation of the necessaries of life should only be resorted to after the luxuries have been taxed all they will bear. This bill is, however, quite an advance in the right direction, and with some amendments, not changing its main features, we all should be willing to vote for it as a compromise measure.

It is so far from being what would do full justice to the farmers and people of the Northwest, and is correspondingly in favor of the "protected" interests, that I can not see how any Representative of a district where those interests exercise a controlling influence can, in all fairness, refuse to vote for it.

Anticipating the inquiry, I will state that I would, if I could, place coal, iron, sugar, hemp, jute, and sisal grass, and other necessaries on the free-list, and restore some of the taxes which capital and wealth had to pay before the Republican party reduced the annual internal revenue from $309,266,000 to $116,000,000 (during the last twenty years it was in power), as stated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE]. This reduction that the honorable gentleman boasts of was made by relieving wealth of its share of the burdens of the Government which protected it, and transferring it to the poorer to pay. Under the law taxing incomes there were but 460,170 persons out of about 45,000,000 taxed, paying upon an aggregate income of $707,000,000, and that had to be abolished, at the behest of "protection," as an odious "war tax." The tariff taxes on the necessaries of life were retained, although as far back as 1866 they were denounced upon this floor by Hon. John A. Kasson, then a member, in more vigorous language than we now use. He said:

What you call "protection" amounts therefore to a system of legal robbery. In order to make the United States rich you must diminish the cost of your manufactures.

This was on July 9, 1866, and on the next day, speaking on a tariff bill, he gave his opinion of a protective tariff in general as follows:

Take the article of wool, for instance. No sooner do you propose to increase the tariff on wool than you immediately go to the manufacturers of wool and give them an increased protection on their manufactures. And thus those who raise the wool pay back a large part of the bounty that is paid for the raising of wool to contribute to the bounty given to the manufacturer, and the non-producer of wool pays both bounties in buying his clothing. And so it is in relation to the article of iron, or upon any other particular branch upon which you increase your tariff; you immediately go off in another direction and increase the tariff upon other collateral interests affected by it; and so you build up a gigantic system of bounties upon all these interests upon the plea of protecting them. The fundamental error in the bill is this: You endeavor to make the people of this country grow rich off each other.

This was said by Mr. Kasson before the Republican party had become the champion and defender of "protection" or, more correctly speaking, high-tariff taxes, upon food, clothing, and other necessaries of life.

I would here serve notice upon the "protectionists" that they had better meet us half way, and in a spirit of fairness. But a few short years ago, and they would have laughed in the face of any one who would have told them that the people would have in the Presidential chair a man who, in obedience to public sentiment, would issue such a message as the one now under consideration with this bill. They should take warning in time. Even the Republican party (their friend and present apologist and defender) has to admit that a reduction be made, which is conceding more than half the case made against them. So far as its representative men have spoken, the Republican party has declared in favor of the repeal of the internal-revenue taxes, and in favor of retaining the present burdensome and excessive high-tariff taxes upon food, clothing, and other necessaries of life. This is the only plan of reduction that I have yet heard authoritatively suggested by the other side. So anxious was their recognized leader, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], to repeal the tobacco tax, that he opposed the usual holiday recess, because this had not, that early in the session, been done. A general assault upon the internal-revenue taxes has been made. They are now denounced by the "protectionists" as "war taxes" that ought to be abolished.

WHAT THE PROTECTIONISTS ADVOCATE.

Just after the President delivered his message, and in December last, the Bulletin—that protectionist organ that I have already referred to—said:

REPEAL THE INTERNAL TAXES!

The reduction of the surplus revenue of the General Government is now the topic of general interest which is most widely discussed in business and political circles in all parts of the country. The difficulties surrounding this question are most happily stated by Congressman REED, of Maine, in an interview published on another page of our paper to-day.

Nevertheless, we hope to see an earnest and persistent demand made upon Congress for a repeal of the internal "war taxes." They make the surplus in the Treasury which ought not to be there. Over a hundred million dollars are collected every year from internal taxes on tobacco, whisky, and malt liquors.

* * * * * * *

If all the interests in this country which are hostile to the continuance of the internal taxes will but rouse themselves these taxes can be repealed or greatly reduced, for Congress is but the servant of the people, and it will listen to them if they will but express their wishes in letters, by petitions, through the newspapers, and, if need be, by mass-meetings.

In that article it suggested they call to their aid the Prohibitionists. Immediately this was done, and every member of Congress received a circular letter from Mrs. Joseph D. Weeks, of Pittsburgh, Pa., as the "chairman of the committee on repeal of internal-revenue taxes," urging that repeal. The name "Weeks" seemed familiar when I received this circular letter, and I was not surprised to find upon inquiry her husband to be the well-known general secretary of the "American Protective Tariff League" and State secretary of Pennsylvania for the same.

This was a remarkable case of convenience and marital harmony. This lady, as a brilliant example of what a wife can do to aid her husband in his efforts in behalf of "protection," deserves to have her name embalmed in history. Taken together these facts go far toward explaining the singular unanimity of feeling upon the subject of the repeal of the internal-revenue taxes that has been recently manifested by the Republican and Prohibition parties.

In his speech upon the day this debate opened (which speech was loudly applauded by every Republican member present) the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] said:

But the authors of this bill and the professional advocates of free foreign trade will assume from the drift of these remarks that I resist the reduction of the surplus, and am unwilling to abolish the taxes from which it flows in annually increasing volume.

Sir, I reply to such suggestions in the language of a resolution which I submitted to the House of Representatives more than seventeen years ago, on the 12th of December, 1870, and which was adopted with but six dissenting votes. It expressed the almost unanimous sentiment of the people, which had not then been corrupted by the influence of the "whisky ring" as it has been during the intervening years.

It was as follows:

"Resolved, That the true principle of revenue reform points to the abolition of the internal-revenue system, which was created as a war measure to provide for extraordinary expenses, the continuance of which involves the employment, at the cost of millions of dollars annually, of an army of assessors, collectors, supervisors, detectives, and other officers previously unknown, and requires the repeal at the earliest day consistent with the maintenance of the faith and credit of Government of all stamp and other internal taxes."

Mr. KERR. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. KERR. Does not the Democratic national platform call those taxes "war taxes?"

Mr. MACDONALD. I did not say it did not. I believe it does; but it does not recommend that they be abolished for the purpose of reducing the surplus or preventing a reduction of the tariff taxes.

I have listened in vain for any different suggestion, from my Republican friends, for a reduction of the surplus. The gentleman from Pennsylvania now enjoys the supreme satisfaction of seeing the Republican party go to him upon this question. Did the mountain go to Mahomet, or did Mahomet go to the mountain? [Laughter.]

HIGH TARIFFS DO NOT PROTECT LABOR.

Our position is that high tariffs do not protect our laborers and mechanics from the competition of the so-called "pauper labor of Europe." In other words, that a "protective" tariff only protects the proprietors of the several industries "protected" by it from competition in selling in our own markets.

What folly to speak of protecting our laborers and mechanics from the competition of the cheap labor of Europe, when a man can come from Europe to this country for $15; and when foreigners are emigrating here at the rate of from 40,000 to 50,000 per month. Here is an item that I find in a paper but a few months old, and which was among the daily dispatches of last October:

The total number of immigrants who arrived in the United States during the month of September, 1887, was 48,161, as compared with 39,917 who arrived during the same month last year. During the first nine months of the present year the arrivals were 411,000, against 294,596 in the corresponding period of 1886.

But aside from this conclusive fact, the number of our population who are engaged in protected industries is comparatively small. According to the last census there were engaged in gainful occupations 17,392,099, divided as follows:

Agriculture	7,670,493
Professional and personal service	4,074,238
Manufacturing, mechanical, and mining	3,837,112
Trade and transportation	1,810,256
Total	17,392,099

The only persons employed in the "protected industries" are included in the number engaged in manufacturing, mechanical, or mining occupations. Assuming, for the purpose of the argument, that all of the 3,837,112 so engaged were to be benefited by a protective tariff (which I deny), there would remain 13,554,987 who would have to be taxed to support the few. Why should four-fifths of the American people be taxed for the benefit of one-fifth, or rather for the benefit of those who give employment to the one-fifth?

We are told that the general prosperity of the country depends upon keeping up a home market maintained by a protective tariff. I have been taught to believe, and the people of the State I have the honor in part to represent believe, that the prosperity of our country depends entirely upon the prosperity of our farmers, and that the prosperity of the farmers depends in turn upon good crops and a good foreign market for their surplus products.

THE FARMER HAS NO PROTECTION.

Without any protection our farmers furnish 74 per cent. of all our exports, while the manufacturer furnishes only 19 per cent.; and upon our farmers' exports of products do we in the Northwest have to rely for our commercial prosperity. When the farmers' crops fail to be in excess of his own needs, business is prostrated; and almost equally calamitous to us would be the absence of a foreign demand for our surplus wheat, corn, barley, oats, and live-stock. The same can be said of the farmers who are engaged in raising cotton and other less important crops; but I am now considering the productions of my own State. Last year there were exported from the United States farmers' products of the following kinds and values:

Wheat	$140,768,915
Indian corn	18,279,499
Live-stock	10,055,874
Oats	491,140
Rye	195,129
Barley	243,505
Total	169,984,063

Our total exports for 1887 were as follows:

Agriculture	$550,000,000
Mining (only a part protected)	56,250,000
Manufactures	20,500,000
Forests	7,650,000
Fisheries	7,250,000
All others	7,250,000

What a commentary upon protection and its theories! And yet the farmers of the United States, who have to look abroad for their $550,000,000 worth of surplus products, are told that by allowing themselves to be taxed upon articles of food and clothing and other necessaries of life they are compelled to purchase they would thereby create a home market. What sophistry! And yet, strange as it would appear to a disinterested party, many farmers in our country have listened to just such erroneous teaching.

Our farmers have come to believe that this "infant" American industry must by this time have reached the age of mature manhood, or it never will. They believe that it has been pampered and fed at their expense and that of the other unprotected classes long enough, and that it is no longer entitled to any protection other than that which it would incidentally receive through the instrumentality of a tariff for revenue only. To show how insignificant in numbers, as compared with the great body of our citizens who are not protected, the persons engaged in these protected industries are, I submit the following statement, showing

WHO ARE PROTECTED AND THEIR NUMBERS.

Sugar planters	1,400
Laborers employed	14,500
Rice planters	1,500
Laborers employed (estimated)	5,000
Wool-growers owning flocks of over 100 head (estimated)	50,000
Manufacturers	52,127
Aggregate capitalists	105,027
Laborers employed in protected industries	1,500,000

THE TARIFF ON WHEAT.

When my colleague [Mr. NELSON] was addressing the House upon the subject of the tariff, some days ago, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. FUNSTON], in a manner which he evidently deemed overwhelming, asked him why he did not advocate putting wheat upon the free-list. I was surprised that my colleague did not confuse the gentleman then and there with a statement of the facts in the case, and an explanation of what a sham and fraud this tax upon wheat is. The same question has been asked by others, as if it was a "crusher," and could not be answered. I will here say that the farmers of my State—being men possessing a reasonable share of ordinary common sense—do not care a fig whether it is repealed or remains. It does them no good, and is no protection to them.

According to the official statement of imports and exports submitted to us by the Treasury Department there was imported into the United States during the seven months ending on January 31 last, wheat amounting in value to $261,966. But I have looked in vain for a statement of the net revenue derived by the Government as the duty or tariff tax on this wheat. A microscope will be required to make the discovery.

Nearly all this wheat came from Manitoba to the State of Minnesota, and it is a matter known to nearly all our people that the placing of this duty upon wheat thus imported is a mere matter of form.

After the law placing a duty upon wheat was enacted wheat buyers of Minnesota, Milwaukee, Chicago, and other places applied to the Treasury Department of the United States for permission to ship wheat purchased in Manitoba and intended for Europe through the United States free of duty and as a matter of convenience to them. This favor was granted to them by the then Secretary of the Treasury. Subsequently, and after the city of Minneapolis became the great flour-manufacturing city of America and the custom of what we term there "milling in transit" came to prevail, another application was made to the Secretary of the Treasury—who, if I recollect right, was the Hon. William Windom, of our own State—to allow the wheat purchased in Manitoba intended for the European market to be also "milled in transit" in Minneapolis in the same manner as wheat bought in Dakota Territory and Minnesota was done.

Here, perhaps, I ought to explain what is meant by "milling in transit." It is the result of railroad competition. The different railroads which convey wheat entirely over their own lines from points above and beyond Minneapolis and St. Paul to Chicago or Milwaukee or other points eastward contract with millers and with buyers to haul the wheat purchased by them from the points where purchased to the eastern terminus of their road, and, as a matter of convenience, permit them to unload wheat at Minneapolis or St. Paul, or wherever it is to be manufactured into flour and milled; and then they are allowed to ship the like number of pounds in the form of flour that they brought to the milling point in the form of wheat. In this way wheat can be purchased at points in the Northwest and brought to our mills in Minnesota and be manufactured into flour, and then reloaded and shipped to the eastern terminus of the railroad which brought it to the mill, and all for one single and agreed rate of freight.

This is what is known in Minnesota as "milling in transit."

As already remarked, these wheat buyers applied to the Treasury Department of the United States for permission to also mill wheat, purchased in Manitoba, in transit, and an arrangement was entered into by which persons could buy wheat in the province of Manitoba, ship it by way of Minnesota or St. Paul to the European market, and when it arrived at Minneapolis or St. Paul it could be "milled in transit," the owners of the wheat being charged with the duty or tariff upon the number of bushels brought to the mills to be ground, and when the same was ground and reshipped for the European market they were credited with the same number of bushels of wheat which the flour would equal.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MACDONALD. In a moment I will.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. It is on that point.

Mr. MACDONALD. Let me finish this statement.

So that in the transaction the Government received as duty from such wheat imported from the province of Manitoba, and brought into the United States, only that proportion per bushel that was represented by the bran and shorts that remained at the mills after the wheat was ground into flour. Hence it will be seen that notwithstanding a large amount of wheat appears to be imported into the United States annually, it is of no possible importance, and is only imported into the United States for the purpose of having it milled while being shipped to the European markets. Now, if the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. FUNSTON] or any other gentleman upon that side of the House can demonstrate how, under an arrangement of this kind, a tariff upon wheat is any protection or benefit to our farmers in Minnesota I should be pleased to have him do so.

I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois for a question.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. It is this: When was that arrangement made by which wheat was admitted from Manitoba free of duty to be ground at Minneapolis?

Mr. MACDONALD. It has been in existence since we adopted the practice of milling in transit. We do not complain of that practice. It makes no difference with the price of wheat, which is fixed in Liverpool, and it gives our railroads business and our millers work.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I suppose not, but I conceive that the farmers might complain of it. Is it under a law?

Mr. MACDONALD. It is under a regulation of the Treasury Department, and it can make no difference to our farmers whether the wheat goes through our State ground or unground.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I never knew it could be done until it was so stated by a gentleman from Minneapolis who was here recently, and I had some reason to doubt the correctness of the statement. But now the gentleman from Minnesota confirms it, and I would like to know whether it is done under authority of law.

Mr. MACDONALD. I understand the Treasury rules and regulations permit it. The gentleman from Illinois will understand that has been the prevailing custom for years. It began, in the first place, under Republican rule, and as a matter of convenience to facilitate shipments from Manitoba to Europe.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Is it not a matter of fact now that the millers of Minneapolis really purchase this wheat from Manitoba, just as they purchase any other wheat from Dakota or elsewhere, then manufacture it into flour and ship it, and thus escape a duty which they ought to pay under the law?

Mr. MACDONALD. No, sir; and I do not want to be understood to say that they do that, by any means.

Mr. LIND. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. LIND. It was stated this practice was inaugurated by Secretary Windom.

Mr. MACDONALD. I do not say that milling in transit was inaugurated by Secretary Windom.

Mr. LIND. No; but admitting it to be ground in bond. Is it not also a fact that under regulations established by Secretary Windom wheat was admitted in bond on the basis that only 75 per cent. of the tariff would be returned when exported? I will also ask the gentleman whether it is not the fact that the present Secretary of the Treasury has increased this to 90 per cent.; so that now as a matter of fact the Treasury Department allows a rebate of 90 per cent. of the 20 cents per bushel of the duty, whereas under the former administration it allowed only 75 per cent. I want also to state——

Mr. MACDONALD. I did not yield for a speech. I do not think I can yield further, as my time is fast running out. I am admonished by the Chair that my time has nearly expired.

Mr. LIND. I will only add there is none imported in bond in Minnesota.

Mr. FARQUHAR. But there is in New York.

Mr. LIND. Yes; there is in New York——

Mr. MACDONALD. I can not yield any further, as I wish to conclude my own remarks. If the gentleman wishes to make a speech in opposition to my views, he must do it in his time and not in mine.

All that the Government ultimately gets in the way of revenue out of that wheat is what the bran and shorts, or "offal," as some call it, amount to. There is no dispute but that the wheat so milled in transit goes over our railways as a matter of convenience. But gentlemen can readily see that the tariff on wheat is practically of no benefit to our farmers, and can not possibly affect the market price of wheat, whether that wheat comes in this way or remains out. In what I have said upon the wheat tariff I have only been answering the assertion which has been frequently made to the effect that the tariff on wheat was of material benefit to our farmers. It is of no benefit, or protection, whatever.

Mr. McCULLOGH. What change does the bill under consideration make in that respect?

Mr. MACDONALD. I do not know that it makes any. It does not. Will you vote for the bill if we take the duty off wheat?

Mr. NELSON. To ease the gentleman's mind we will put wheat on the free-list.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Will the gentleman from Minnesota permit a suggestion?

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Under the new regulations of the Treasury Department wheat is practically free now.

Mr. MACDONALD. I think 10 per cent. is all we retain of the tariff on wheat, and all we are entitled to under the arrangement I speak of, and that practically wheat is free. So this tariff on wheat is all a sham.

Mr. FARQUHAR. And it is free by Treasury decision and Treasury order.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. McCREARY. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended until he concludes his remarks.

Mr. BRUMM. I suggest that the extension of time be limited.

Mr. MACDONALD. I think I can conclude in twenty minutes.

By unanimous consent an extension of twenty minutes was granted.

OUR BURDEN OF DEBT.

Mr. MACDONALD. In answer to the declaration that our country is prosperous, we see the following statement of the mortgage indebtedness of the Western States going the rounds of the press:

Ohio	$701,000,000
Indiana	288,000,000
Illinois	920,000,000
Wisconsin	270,000,000
Michigan	250,000,000
Minnesota	175,000,000
Iowa	351,000,000
Kansas	200,000,000
Missouri	267,000,000
Total farm mortgages in the ten States	3,422,000,000

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] combated the accuracy of these figures, and gave a statement said to have been carefully compiled from authentic sources, showing the amount of this mortgage indebtedness in these States to be as follows:

Ohio	$350,000,000
Indiana	175,000,000
Illinois	200,000,000
Wisconsin	100,000,000
Michigan	125,000,000
Minnesota	70,000,000
Iowa	100,000,000
Nebraska	25,000,000
Kansas	50,000,000
Missouri	100,000,000
Total	1,295,000,000

These last figures are a bad enough showing in all conscience, but are they correct? At the meeting of the National Farmers' Alliance held last fall in the city of Minneapolis, the president, Mr. A. T. Streeter, in a speech, spoke thus of the condition of the State of Illinois:

In the great agricultural State of Illinois the farmers are sinking in debt; two-thirds of the farms are mortgaged so the principal and interest can never be paid. The official report of the secretary of agriculture shows that corn has been grown at a loss. In 1881 the loss was $12,735,710; in 1883 the loss was $8,821,400; in 1882, $1,178,554; 1885, $10,830,701; 1887, $19,700,209; total loss in five years, $52,377,528.

In 1884, according to agricultural reports, every crop of grain was grown at a loss, except potatoes, hay, and rye. It is better in other places. Last year I went through the State of blooming Kansas and learned that 95 per cent. of the farms were mortgaged, and many for all they are worth. Many of them are growing crops at a loss. One banking firm told me they had in one county advanced $12,000 to pay defaults in the interest on mortgages. How are those mortgages to be paid? In Texas I learned that every pound of cotton costs 2 cents more to raise it than it was sold for, and the rate of interest is 20 per cent. I never saw such miserable property.

The La Crosse Chronicle of a recent date, discussing this matter, said:

The farm mortgages of Wisconsin foot up $250,000,000, and those of Minnesota $175,000,000. This possibly represents about one-half the amount of which the tariff tax has robbed them. In other words, if this kind of taxation had been justly and properly equalized after the war necessity ceased, there would have been comparatively few mortgages, and the farmers would have been ahead about the amount of their present mortgage indebtedness. While the war lasted the farmers received war prices for their products—two or three hundred per cent. higher than now—lightening their burden; but since the war the market prices of their products have been constantly getting lower, while this kind of taxation, instead of being diminished, has been increased. The tariff duties of to-day are about 16 per cent. higher than Mr. Morrill's war tariff bill of 1862 imposed.

THE TARIFF AND WAGES.

The report of the minority—a report that has become notorious throughout the land as proposing nothing—has much to say about the labor cost of articles, especially in the manufacture of plate glass. It gives this quotation, accompanied with a tabular statement as to the labor cost in this country and England, France, Germany, and Belgium. It said:

It is labor that mines, loads, transports, unloads, and uses the coal, the sand, the limestone, and fire-clay used in making plate glass. It is labor that manufactures the felt, the arsenic, the emery, the copperas, and the soda which enter into the composition of plate glass. And it is labor that fires the furnaces, that tends the machinery, and finally prepares and forwards the product, and not until such labor in its various stages is paid for on the basis of European labor can the American manufacturer expect to make glass at a corresponding cost.

Now, here is a statement of the labor cost upon many other leading articles:

Table, compiled from Tenth Census, showing value of various manufactured products, per cent. of labor cost, rate of duty existing and proposed.

Industries.	Value of product.	Labor cost.	Percentage of labor.	Present tariff.	Proposed rate.
				Per ct.	Per ct.
Carpets	$31,792,802	$6,835,218	21.5	47	30
Cotton goods	210,950,383	45,614,419	21.6	50	40
Bolts, nuts, etc	10,073,330	1,981,300	19.7	59	35
Nails and spikes	5,629,240	1,255,171	22.3	43	34
Iron pipe, wrought	13,292,162	1,788,258	13.5	70	35
Oil, castor	653,960	44,714	6.8	194	97
Oil, linseed	15,393,812	681,677	4.4	54	21
Screws	2,184,532	456,542	20.9	50	35
Wool hats	8,516,569	1,893,215	22.2	54	40
Woolen goods	160,606,721	25,836,392	16.1	70	40
Worsted goods	33,549,942	5,683,027	16.9	68	40

It will thus be seen that while the labor in carpets, leaving off fractions, is 21 per cent. of the cost, the tariff is 47 per cent. In cotton goods the labor is the same and the tariff 50 per cent. In wrought-iron pipe, labor is 13 per cent. and the tariff 70 per cent. In castor oil, labor 6 per cent. and the tariff 194 per cent. In wool hats the labor is 22 per cent. and the tariff 54 per cent. In woolen goods, labor is 16 per cent. and the tariff 70 per cent. In worsted goods, labor is 16 per cent. and the tariff 68 per cent.

But I can not dwell upon this subject. I regret that my time will not permit me to discuss, as I would wish, the effect of the tariff upon the workingman; I mean the man who is employed in what we call the protected industries. It does not aid or "protect" the 4,225,945 farmers or the nearly 4,000,000 of farm laborers employed by them, or the 4,074,238 engaged in professional and personal service pursuits, the 1,000,000 domestic servants, the 64,698 clergymen, the 85,671 physicians and surgeons, the 227,710 teachers and scientific persons, or the 64,137 lawyers, or the 84,000 soldiers, sailors, and marines.

THE TARIFF DOES NOT PROTECT OUR WORKMEN.

On January 17 last, at a meeting of the Federation of Labor in Hilton's Hall, in this city, Mr. Paul T. Bowen addressed the workingmen of Washington upon the tariff. Mr. Bowen's position in the Knights of Labor organization adds much importance to what he said. He favored free trade, and upon the tariff and wages spoke as follows:

Protection and free trade do not govern the standard of wages. The element that makes wages high here is the abundance of raw material and the great quantity of free land. To the extent that our land is absorbed by capitalists our wages will sink, and are sinking, to the European level. High wages in this country preceded the imposition of high tariff—the tariff was invented to protect the wages that were already up, and it is illogical now to claim that the protective tariff is the cause of the high wages.

Does protection increase the manufactures? We are told that it does, that 3,837,000 people engaged in manufacturing would be thrown out of employment. On looking over the list enumerating these people it is found that carpenters, house-builders, blacksmiths, butchers, bricklayers, dressmakers, plasterers, and many other tradesmen are counted in. Would there be any houses imported, or would the horses be brought in so thoroughly shod as to keep our blacksmiths out of work if the tariff were removed? Throwing aside those whose trades would be in no way affected by either free or protected commerce, the number engaged in manufacturing who would be affected by a repeal of the tariff is remarkably small. If we had nothing in view but the increase of our manufacturing interests we should be much better off with free trade.

Does protection create national independence? It is said that by means of the tariff we are placed on such a footing that in case of a war our industries would not suffer; in other words, that it places us on an independent footing. Suppose we had free trade and there were a war, could we not wear our coats, which we get from England, a little longer by patching them? But no Englishman could digest his dinner, a greater part of which comes from us, twice.

Does it distribute property more equitably? We have now had a high tariff for twenty-five years, and the inequality between the rich and the poor has been going on until it is now alarming, and it is greatest in the lines of protected industries. But the great test is, does it protect American labor?

Who is there among the American workingmen so poor as those in the protected industries? They strike and try to improve their condition, but they are weak, and are put down by the importation of foreign contract labor. When protective taxes were established there was a general movement among European manufacturers to transplant their business bodily to America, and they did it. Was that protection to us? The economic value of a man, based on long-studied averages, is about $1,000, and the average tax on imports is 47 per cent. Why not tax contract labor at the rate of $470 per head? Who is it that is protected by the high tariff but the man who owns some part of the earth that produces something that comes in the tariff list? These test questions are not answered.

Does, then, protection protect, or does it realize the expectation or the predictions of its originators? If there is no truth in protective arguments, free trade comes up for consideration. Supposing the living expenses should be lessened, as it is claimed free trade will accomplish, since the average of wages is now only a bare living, when the cost of such goes down the average goes down too, so that the workingman would not be benefited. What is the best way to raise a revenue? Tax the income! Raise the money from the right men and spend it in the right way, for a Government telegraph, a Government railroad, broader educational system, put duties on luxuries, taxes on privileges, a tax on raw land, and subsidize these immense manufactures. Free trade in its broadest sense means free contract between man and man, when one man can feel himself equal to the other.

I can not take the time to answer all the fallacious arguments that have been advanced during this debate as to the effect of a protective tariff upon the wages of the laboring man and mechanic in this country, or the erroneous statements made as to how the same class of workmen are paid in Europe. I must content myself with the general statement that the only class of laborers in this country who are paid starvation wages are those employed in the "protected" industries; and that our best paid laborers are bakers, blacksmiths, bricklayers, masons, carpenters, painters, plasterers, plumbers, and others who are not protected.

"Facts are stubborn things," and will destroy volumes of theory. Is this statement of fact as to wages paid in protected industries denied? If so, here is the proof. About the 1st of November last the general executive board of the Knights of Labor issued an appeal to the assemblies of the order in aid of the striking coal-miners, in which the following occurs:

By the report of the bureau of statistics of Pennsylvania it is shown that the wages of the miner will not average more than $300 a year. In this calculation are included the wages of the subcontractor, under-bosses, and choice men, so that if the true average of the ordinary miners and mine laborers was taken the amount earned would not average more than $280 per year. The net amount received by each miner per ton for the coal he mines will not exceed from 9 to 15 cents. The advance in the price of coal to the consumer during the past year has been in many of the markets $1 per ton, or from six to ten times the amount received by the miner, who risked life and limb to bring it from the bosom of the earth.

The advance which would be accepted would not add more than 2½ cents per ton to the cost of producing the coal. The employers are at the same time the landlords, who own the houses in which the miners live and the stores in which they are compelled to buy their daily food. The doctors that heal the sick, the undertakers that bury the dead, and the ministers who preach the funeral sermons are the servants of the corporations. No question of recognition of the order is involved. It is simply a question of whether the men shall starve to death while at work or suffer a little extra privation for a short time in order to get means enough to keep body and soul together. No appeal for aid has been sent out from the general office more deserving of the prompt and generous action of the order.

Accompanying this appeal was a personal one from General Master Workman Powderly, who said:

We read of the heart-rending scenes of eviction as practiced in Ireland. We are told of the terrible work of the crow-bar brigade, which levels homes, severs broken, loving hearts forever, and drives dear ones from homes and kindred across the sea. None of these scenes can outrival the acts of cruelty that are practiced every day in the scourged, misery-clouded middle coal-fields of Pennsylvania. In the most prosperous times the miner and his family live from hand to mouth, scarcely able to keep body and soul in unison. Notwithstanding all this, no law is broken, no offense of any kind is committed.

A more honest, industrious, moral, or patriotic people does not inhabit any portion of our country; no more generous or manly men exist than our coal miners. They have done everything, they have endured everything, and have sought every way to improve their condition, so as to lift it to the standard of American manhood and citizenship. Failing in that, they have continued a hopeless struggle to keep food in the mouths of loved ones while enduring every privation themselves. The last hope is gone, tired nature refuses to longer perform its functions, and in despair the miners have laid down their tools. They appeal to their fellow-citizens for the bread which their honest labor could not win. I unite my humble voice with theirs, and ask relief for them. Give quickly, give liberally; they deserve all that you can do.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] closed his able effort, in behalf of protection, by giving us an exhibition of word-painting that showed ability worthy of a far better cause. I am sorry to mar his picture; but truth, as well as justice to the memory of Washington, Jefferson, and Jackson—whose names he invoked—required that I should remove his protection allegory from the frame and replace it with the truthful and awfully realistic production of Master Workman Powderly. And I am sorry to have to remind my esteemed friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] that all these horrors described by Mr. Powderly are in what he, on Saturday last, boasted of as "the protection State of Pennsylvania."

Within the past two months we have had the Reading strikes, because of a reduction of 7 per cent. in the wages of the iron-workers there; and riots of the striking employés of the blast furnaces in Ohio, who attempted to resist a reduction of 10 per cent. in their wages. And yet this is but a repetition of what has occurred frequently for many months past. It can not be said that these men are not among what our friends upon the other side call "protected" laborers.

But it must not be allowed to be said that the condition of these miners is all the evidence I have to submit to show that "protection" does not protect other workingmen and laborers as well as miners. In December last the following appeared among the daily Associated Press dispatches:

NEW YORK, December 5.

The Daily News, which claims to be the organ of the laboring classes, says: "It is estimated that there are fifty thousand skilled workers of both sexes out of employment in this city, and with the army of common laborers and men who do all sorts of odd jobs it is believed that the total number of persons who are willing to work, but can not obtain employment, is one hundred thousand."

Think of it! One hundred thousand workers out of employment in that city alone! Truly, great is protection!

But it may be said that the above dispatch requires corroboration. Well, here it is. The New York correspondent of the Philadelphia Ledger, the paper of that well-known Republican, George W. Childs, writing to that journal in the same month (last December), said:

The World and the Graphic, under the title of "The White Slaves of New York," for some time past have been gathering statistics and a mass of facts from actual observation and investigation on this subject, which reveal a state of things that should set every friend of humanity thinking.

Take the ready-made clothing trade for example, in which upwards of 10,000 persons, male and female, are employed, and what do we find? "In a room 10 by 12, with two begrimed windows looking out on Hester street, nine men were at work. Garments made and unmade crowded every available inch of space, and the fetid air was thick enough to cut. Behind this horrible workshop the eye and nostrils, growing accustomed, caught the sights and smells of and from an inner room not over 6 feet square. A red glare from a fire on an open brick hearth dimly lighted its darkness. Two women, half clad, were crouching away from the stranger's eyes, while here and there were children scrambling wherever the piled-up garments left them a breathing space. On every floor this scene was repeated. Even the corners of the passage-way were occupied by a presser's bench. Each of the four floors is divided into three tenements, but the whole space would not make over one large room. The average number of inmates was seven to twenty-one on each floor, eighty-four persons in all. Every tenement is a workshop. The prices which are paid to these people may well arrest attention also. Thus the usual rate for making an ordinary pair of men's trousers, such as are sold at about $3 a pair, is 25 cents each, or $2.50 per dozen. The pantaloon hands are, as a rule, the worst paid of all the men tailors. Vest hands are generally women and girls. Females are usually employed in Williamsburgh, where the greater portion of men's ready-made vests and boys' clothing are manufactured."

Columns of the Ledger might be filled with similar extracts, but these will do.

This correspondent adds:

It is not pleasant reading, but the well-to-do and the wealthy will make a great mistake if they shut their eyes to it instead of somehow endeavoring to abate the shocking evils which thus exist like a social cancer in the heart of the great city. It is not consistent with the peace or the safety or prosperity of any civilized community that human beings should thus be permitted to relapse to barbarism if there is any way to prevent it.

His words I commend to the serious consideration of all.

In the Minneapolis Star of the 28th of last month I find this item:

The conference between the sewing-girls' strike committee and the firm of Shotwell, Clerihew & Lothman this morning was without satisfactory results. The girls asked an increase of salary on all grades of work, which the firm refused to concede. The only concessions made were on three grades of pants, advancing rates 1 cent on two, and 2 cents on the third. The old prices were 8, 9, and 12. The firm agree to pay 10 each for the first two grades, and 13 for the last.

No table of figures can overcome such facts as I have stated and proved as to the condition of these laboring people.

Let me remark right here, for fear I might forget it, that the reason why such starvation wages are paid for making clothes and other articles of necessity, is because the proprietors of these industries have to pay more than they ought to for the material used and made up by these hard-worked and poorly-paid men, women, and children. Place the raw material needed on the free-list, and reduce the tariff on manufactured goods to about what is proposed by this bill, and the employers of these people can double their wages and make as much profit as they do now.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Will the gentleman tell us whether if the Mills bill passes the wages of those people that he has just been speaking about will be increased or diminished?

Mr. MACDONALD. They will be increased.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. They will?

Mr. MACDONALD. There is no doubt about it; and I will tell you why. The people who employ them to make the clothing will be able to buy their material sufficiently cheaper than now to enable them to pay better wages.

EFFECT OF THE PROPOSED BILL.

Now, as to the bill under consideration. As a satisfactory explanation of the changes it will effect, I adopt the schedule prepared by the majority of the committee and attached to their report, and will append it to my remarks.

I have said the bill is not what I desired. But its sins are those of omission. Therefore, what there is of it is good. It has been assailed by every "protected" interest in the land—the "horse-leeches" that for years have been sucking the life-blood of our people, and that fact commends it to my judgment. Paraphrasing an expression that has become historical, "I like it for the enemies it has made."

I can not now take the time to discuss the necessity or show as fully as I would wish the justice of the reductions proposed to be made by it; but I will refer to a few of the most important.

In addition to the tables already given and referred to, this one will aid materially in understanding what will be the effect of this bill. It is a schedule of articles mostly used by a family, as an illustration, and the duty on them, and also showing the reduction proposed under the Mills bill.

THE TARIFF ON WOOL.

It is said that its enactment will be disastrous to the wool-growing interest. Facts and figures disprove this, and show that the wool-growing industry has not done as well under a high tariff as under a low one. The following figures, compiled from the United States census and reports of the Department of Agriculture, prove this:

1869—LOW TARIFF.

Sheep in Pennsylvania	1,631,540
Sheep in Ohio	3,546,767
Sheep in New York	2,617,855
Prices—fine	56 to 60 cents
Prices—medium	45 to 50 cents
Prices—coarse	40 to 42 cents

1887—HIGH TARIFF.

Sheep in Pennsylvania	1,694,323
Sheep in Ohio	4,562,913
Sheep in New York	1,579,866
Prices—fine	33 to 34 cents
Prices—medium	37 to 38 cents
Prices—coarse	33 to 35 cents

SOME OF THE RESULTS.

Decrease of sheep in three States after twenty years' high protection	559,060
Decrease in prices, fine wool	23 to 26 cents
Decrease in prices, medium wool	8 to 12 cents
Decrease in prices, coarse wool	7 cents

On the 14th of December last, the St. Paul Pioneer Press, the leading Republican paper of our State, in an article upon "The Wool Duty," said:

Once in a while we get at inside facts which tell exactly how certain items of the tariff bear upon our industries. Such a statement has been published with reference to the manufacture of woolen goods. The proprietor of an Eastern woolen mill, a gentleman who is a Republican in politics and voted for Mr. Blaine in 1884, makes, through the press, an exceedingly interesting presentation of the facts with which he is familiar. The lesson of them is that, in many directions, our outrageous duties on raw materials are completely perverting the assumed object of the tariff, and destroying the manufacturing industries which that was intended to foster and increase.

In the first place, heavy taxes are imposed on varieties of wool which are used largely and must be used by our manufacturers, but which are not produced in the United States at all. So heavy are these taxes that where there is a net product of woolens worth $400,000 only $100,000 of this cost of production represents labor, and the other $300,000 is the cost of raw material. A duty of 57 per cent. on the manufactured product is a poor offset to a duty which is estimated at nearly or quite 100 per cent. on the raw material that constitutes three-fourths of the cost of production. It is the tariff which is driving this industry to the wall.

In this connection I submit the following, which appeared in the Philadelphia Record of last Saturday:

The five Congressmen from Philadelphia whose hearts yearn for the interests of workingmen may find profitable reading in the resolutions adopted last week by Philadelphia workingmen, at a meeting called by workingmen, officered by workingmen, and managed by workingmen according to their own notions. These two resolutions are particularly noteworthy:

"Resolved, That we especially request that wool be made free in the interest of the 60,000 textile workers of our city, who with free wool would compete with the world and obtain the privilege of making the finer grades of goods, from which the present tariff excludes them.

"Resolved, That we emphatically protest against petitions to Congress that have been or are being signed in the mills and factories, either under the direction of the foreman or otherwise, being accepted as the free expression of the sentiments of workingmen, as the manner in which these signatures are procured is but a species of slavery."

LUMBER SHOULD BE FREE.

As to placing lumber upon the free-list, why should it not be done? While I have received circulars and appeals from the Pacific coast and California, where they charge that nearly all the Government lumber has been secured by questionable means, I am pleased to say that I have heard of no protest from the Northwest. The farmers are in competition with European labor, and prices are low, and it is our duty to relieve them of having to pay $16 to $20 of every $100 worth of lumber they purchase, as a tariff tax.

A few years ago they had a disastrous fire in Chicago, and recognizing the great injustice of requiring the people of that devastated city to pay duty on building material, Congress made Chicago a "free-trade" city for a year, as to all building materials, except lumber. The only reason that can be assigned for it not then putting lumber on the free-list is that the great lumber interests of the country were too powerful and influential to allow Chicago to get free lumber, even if it was a mass of blackened ruins and appealed to the sympathy of the world as well as our entire country.

Sir, there are to-day living upon the prairies of Minnesota and Dakota settlers who, struggling very hard to shelter their wives and children from the piercing winds and storms, are as much in need of free building material as nine-tenths of those who were burned out in Chicago.

THE TARIFF FOSTERS "TRUSTS."

There is one vicious result from this tariff which ought to condemn it with all. It has made possible the formation of those conspiracies against the welfare of our people—"trusts."

The following is a list of a few of the trusts, together with the amount of bounty the present tariff seeks to allow them to collect from the people, also their expense for labor, and the excess of tariff bounty over the amount they pay in wages. Not one of these trusts could live were it not for the war tariff.

Name of trust.	Protected by duties averaging per cent.—	Adjusted to guaranty a bounty in each $100 of product amounting to—	Their whole expense for labor in $100 worth of product being—
Salt trust	50	$33	$25
Earthenware trust	56	36	40
Bessemer-steel trust	84	46	9
Plow-steel trust	45	33	29
General steel trust	45	33	29
Nail trust	45	33	29
General iron trust	45	33	25
Copper trust	24	22	21
Zinc trust	52	28	25
Tin trust	23	24	21
Lead trust	74	43	65
Glass trust	55	36	45
Soap trust	26	19	8
Linseed-oil trust	54	35	5
Rubber-shoe trust	25	20	24
Envelope trust	25	20	11
Paper-bag trust	35	26	15
Cordage trust	25	20	12
Average		30	24

The above table, which is taken from a pamphlet entitled Tariff Chats, by Henry J. Philpot, of Des Moines, Iowa, well illustrates the glaring hypocrisy of the claim that the war tariff must be kept up so that these trusts and combines may receive protection against the labor of Europe.

There are several others. The Farm Machinery and Industrial Gazette, of February of the present year, thus tells of the formation and operations of a "trust" that has been organized to compel our farmers to pay more than they otherwise would, or honestly should, for their binding-twine. It said:

The Binder Twine Association is a strong one, and quite likely to hold prices right through the season. It began by a combination of four Eastern manufacturers, who "cornered" all the manilla and sisal in the country, and that to arrive, as fast as imported, and set a price on it which no manufacturer could pay and undersell them. As fast as small manufacturers were "convinced," they became members of the trust, and were taken in out of the cold. Of course, so long as each member is compelled, for want of other supply, to buy of the trust, and must account for its product, on which it pays a dividend when its percentage is exceeded and gets one when less than its percentage is made, there is no chance nor reason for cutting prices. Nearly all manufacturers have taken a hand, and the very nature of the compact indicates that it will hold at least for this season.

And yet this is but a repetition of the story that can be told of all the other "trusts." This "trust," aided by the high tariff, compels our farmers to pay several cents a pound more than they should for binding-twine.

PROTECTION NO LONGER NECESSARY.

I have already stated that the so-called protective tariff does not protect the parties it is claimed to benefit, namely, the laboring men. I now wish to add the statement that our American manufacturing industries do not need protection any longer, and that the claim made by them that protection is necessary to enable them to compete with foreign manufacturers is proven by their own conduct to be untrue. It is a notorious fact that American manufacturers—the very men who are now clamoring for a continuance of this protective tariff—are and have been engaged in shipping their surplus manufactures to European and other foreign markets and there competing with the so-called pauper labor of Europe. Last year the London Iron, a leading labor and trade journal, in discussing the question of the introduction of American manufactured tools into the European markets, said:

Our American contemporaries have every cause to be surprised at the astonishing fact that thousands of tons of scrap-iron are every year taken to the United States and there converted into the simplest of American manufactures, the sad or laundry iron, and then exported back to Europe at no small profit. There is no corner of Europe where American small cast hardware is not for sale. The tool-makers and the machinists of Europe—such as Krupp, of Germany; Whitworth & Armstrong, of London, and Hotchkiss, of France—with their vast resources, are unable to produce a monkey or screw wrench equal to the American wrenches, and consequently they have to import these tools from the States. It is stated that there are no less than 80,000 dozen of them exported to Europe alone every year.

It is interesting to note that Charles Monckey, the inventor of this screw-bar wrench, received only $2,000 for his patent, and is now living at Williamsburgh, Brooklyn, in a small cottage bought from the proceeds of this sale. In the matter of the common pocket boxwood rules also the American manufacturers so far excel all others that, if not all European nations, certainly all nations outside of Europe are supplied from America. The manufacturers there print on the rule whatever system of measurement is followed by the country for which the goods are intended. American augers and auger-bits are used the world over, no other nation being able to compete. The Americans, with such facts before them, may well be proud of their manufactures.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] was singularly unfortunate for the cause of protection when he told us yesterday that he received a piece of cotton goods by mail from England, and that his wife found she could buy as good an article here in Washington as cheap as the sample was sold for in England.

This is what I have claimed. I go further and state that our manufacturers of cotton goods ship their wares to England and Europe, and, after paying freight, insurance, and other expenses, sell their goods as cheap to the people of those countries as they do to us. But what becomes of this claim that our manufactures could not compete with the pauper labor of Europe? This fact alone refutes that assertion.

The fact is, as was shown by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] yesterday, the labor in our factories is as much pauper labor as that of any country in Europe.

And on November 2, 1887, the New York Herald published a special cablegram from its London correspondent, which read as follows:

I learn that a body of merchants here are about to form an association to work up the markets in China with more enterprise and assiduity than ever before. New concessions are expected from the emperor, owing to the influence exercised by the late Chinese embassador, who left a warm friend of England. This new movement is stimulated by the recent reports of the activity of the Americans in Chinese markets. Manufacturers and merchants here begin to feel that they must be up and doing to hold their own. Every department of trade is being depressed and showing the narrowest possible margin of profits in spite of all the rosy articles put forward by the board of trade officials. In these days English merchants seem satisfied to follow the lead instead of having it.

Pursuing my investigations further, as to the amount of manufactured articles that we export from the United States to foreign countries, I turn to the latest official report that I have (being the Treasury statement of imports and exports already mentioned by me) and I find that during the seven months ending January 31, 1888, there were exported articles of domestic manufacture from the United States to foreign countries, as follows:

Agricultural implements	$1,187,315
Manufactured cotton cloth	7,154,702
Earthen, stone, and china ware	138,094
Glass and glassware	510,295
Instruments and apparatus for scientific and electrical purposes	375,990
Manufactures of iron and steel, including cutlery, machinery, and tools	10,013,299
Leather and manufactures of	5,764,719
Paper and manufactures of	581,887
Sugar and molasses	1,836,375
Manufactures of tobacco	1,931,771
Manufactures of wool	280,116
Other manufactured articles	357,233
Total (for the seven months)	30,131,796

It will be seen in the above list of articles which I have selected labor enters much more extensively into the cost of production than does the raw material, and I submit that as these exports are limited to articles that were shipped during the last seven months it is a pretty good list of exports to be sent from a country in which it is said by our protectionist friends the cost of labor is too high to permit its manufacturers to contend against the competing with the so-called pauper labor of Europe. And yet it is a shame and disgrace to us that it is not thousands of millions.

After arriving in Washington I happened to be with a party of gentlemen who were discussing the tariff question, and as an evidence that our manufactures were sold in the European markets in competition with similar articles manufactured there I mentioned the fact that when canvassing I met a Scandinavian-American, who had recently returned from a visit to Norway, and who informed me that while there he discovered that American-made pitchforks and hoes and other agricultural implements of that class were sold at from 15 to 30 per cent. less than the same article manufactured by the same American works could be bought for in this country.

That statement was not intended for publication; but it happened that the gentleman who represents the Chicago Herald in this city was present and wrote up that "interview," stating the facts substantially as I had to those gentlemen; and the same was copied quite extensively into the papers of the State I have the honor in part to represent. This statement of mine has been attempted to be contradicted in different ways. And I wish now to reiterate it, and to state that not only was I correctly reported, but that since I made those statements I have investigated and become satisfied that what my Scandinavian friend informed me was literally true. In this connection I might say that my colleague (Mr. WILSON) informs me that he has in his district a Scandinavian constituent who also visited Europe, and upon his return to Minnesota reported that he had made the same discovery. All of what I have stated and quoted upon this branch of the subject ought to sufficiently establish the fact that American manufacturers do not need a protective tariff, and only use it to enable them to charge their American customers more than they sell their goods to foreigners for.

This need not be surprising.

In a letter written by Hon. William M. Evarts, then Secretary of State, and now a distinguished Senator from New York, dated May 17, 1879, transmitting the reports of American consuls on the state of labor in Europe, the honorable Secretary, in an enumeration of his conclusions drawn from these reports, on page 36, says:

9. That the average American workman performs from one and a half to twice as much work as the average European workman. This is so important a point in connection with our ability to compete with the cheap manufactures of Europe, and it seems on first thought so strange, that I will trouble you with somewhat lengthy quotations from the reports in support thereof.

Hon. James G. Blaine, when Secretary of State, and introductory to the report of consuls in Europe on the cotton-goods trade of the world, dated June 25, 1881, said, on page 95:

In commenting on the strikes then imminent in Manchester, Consul Shaw, in the report transmitting the foregoing table, says:

"The plea that the factory operatives are now receiving higher wages in proportion to the time they work than American operatives is urgently made by manufacturers here, and this, together with increasing financial distress among mill-owners, is gradually allaying the discontent among operatives."

Again the honorable Secretary says:

The hours of labor in the Lancashire mills are 56, in the Massachusetts mills 60 per week. The hours of labor in the mills in the other New England States, where the wages are generally less than in Massachsetts, are usually 66 to 69 per week.

Undoubtedly the inequalities in the wages of English and American operatives are more than equalized by the greater efficiency of the latter and their longer hours of labor. If this should prove to be a fact in practice, as it seems to be proven from official statistics, it would be a very important element in the establishment of our ability to compete with England for our share of the cotton-goods trade of the world.

In the two prime factors which may be said to form the basis of the cotton manufacturing industry, namely, raw material and labor, we hold the advantage over England in the first and stand upon an equality with her in the second.

Having the raw materials at our doors, it follows that we should be able to convert it into manufactures, all things else being equal, with more economy and facility than can be done by England, which imports our cotton and then manufactures it in her mills. The expense of handling, transportation, and commission must be an important item in this regard as compared with our turning in the fiber from the cotton-fields to our mills and shipping it in the advanced form of manufactured goods. Add to this the secondary fact that it costs us no more to handle and manufacture the same than it costs in England, and we stand on an undoubted equality thus far in the race of competition.

Again, the power of concentrated capital and machinery, and the influence of these factors over wages and competition, is illustrated in the difference in wages in the several States of our Union, as in Europe. Mr. David A. Wells on this subject says:

The difference in wages in the same industries in different sections of the United States is well illustrated in the following returns of wages in the iron industries of different States, made under the census of 1880: Unskilled labor in blast furnaces in Virginia, 82 cents per day; in Alabama, 98 cents; in Pennsylvania, $1.09, and in Missouri, $1.29. Skilled labor in iron rolling-mills in Alabama, $2.25 a day; in Massachusetts, $2.70; in Pennsylvania, $3.03; in Ohio, $3.87, and in Kentucky, $4.62. The yearly average wages in the aggregate iron industries of the different sections of the United States is reported as follows: Eastern States, $417; Western, $396; Pacific, $354; Southern, $304.

I will conclude this branch of my remarks by reading the eighteenth annual report of the bureau of statistics of labor of the State of Massachusetts, published in December, 1887. On page 294 it says:

As the essential result of this investigation, it may be stated, then, that out of a total of 816,479 persons employed in gainful occupations in this State 241,589, or 29.59 per cent., were unemployed at their principal occupation, on an average, 4.11 months during the census year, the average unemployment for persons engaged in manufactures, pure and simple, being 3.90 months; in short, that about one-third of the total persons engaged in remunerative labor were unemployed at their principal occupation for about one-third of the working time.

OUR NEGLECTED SOUTH AMERICAN MARKETS.

It is proper to say here, that if we had not by our protective tariff shut out South America from our markets, and compelled her to look to England, France, and Germany for a market for her exports—principally raw material—we would to-day be exporting to them millions of dollars' worth of our manufactured articles where we now do hundreds.

Although they are right at our doors, we have compelled them to go to the other side of the Atlantic for their goods. South America buys more than $250,000,000 worth of manufactured goods each year from England, France, and Germany. These goods are mostly cotton fabrics, manufactured from American cotton.

Why is this? It is because our high tariff upon what the South American has to find a foreign market for prevents him from selling to us. Could he bring his wool, hides, and other raw materials to our market he would in turn buy our manufactured cloth, agricultural implements, tools, machinery, and the thousand other articles that he needs and we have for sale.

Instead of opening up this market by what ought to be substantial reciprocity, we have, with blind devotion to the heresy of protection, deprived ourselves of this market, which should have been ours years ago.

The bill under consideration will go far to remedy this disastrous condition of things.

The cry of "free trade" now raised is a craven and false one. It is the last despairing groan of a pampered set of purse-proud monopolists, who have used the means we so generously bestowed upon them for years to secure further gains by "trust" and "pool" extortion.

ENGLAND NOT JUBILANT.

In keeping with this free-trade cry is the assertion that England is anxiously hoping that we will adopt free trade. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] said that England was "on the tip-toe of expectation" as to this bill. If she is, it is because she does not wish us to pass it. Several newspaper extracts have been read in the hope that they would create the impression that this was so, but care was taken not to read the following from the London St. James Gazette, after it had given the outline of President Cleveland's message:

All the remark we shall make at present is this: The late Lord Overstone, whose judgment in such matters was in the highest degree authoritative, used to say that the commerce of this country would receive its first great blow when free trade was adopted by the United States. He was a free-trader himself, of course. The competition of a free-trade America was what he seemed to most dread for this country.

This item from the St. James Gazette is but confirmatory of what I have already shown as to England's fear of our competition in European and other markets of the world.

But I am admonished that I should come to a close, and do so with an appeal to my friends upon the other side to cease their captious criticism of our efforts to reduce the surplus revenues.

THE COUNTRY DEMANDS ACTION.

I do not ask them to vote for this bill in its present or any other form. I have stated what I consider its faults, and I know there are many gentlemen here who honestly differ with me, who favor tariff reform and reduction.

I appeal to all such to cease regarding this bill as a purely partisan measure and join us in a patriotic effort to perfect it by amendment, or be consistent with their declaration of being in favor of tariff reduction by proposing such a bill as will contain what they think the law enacted should be.

If they will do this we can then see how far we are apart, and to what extent we will have to yield to each other to meet upon a basis of compromise. It is not the part of wisdom to pursue this policy of making speeches in favor of protection and against this bill and propose nothing. If a like bill had been proposed by the members of the Committee on Ways and Means upon the other side (as the representatives of the majority of this House) I would say to my Democratic colleagues: "If this bill does not meet with your approval propose one that does or hold your peace."

They have insisted upon having seventeen days' valuable time consumed in general debate. Debate upon what? Why, sir, upon a bill proposing that which the party they represent is pledged to support—revenue reduction and reform. This bill will secure that result which they are pledged to; hence the difference must be only as to details.

The country demands that we take early action upon this matter. The resolutions adopted by the New York Board of Transportation on the 14th of last month but express the sense of the people of the entire nation. They are as follows:

Whereas both political parties have promised in their platforms of 1884 to modify the tariff and reduce the internal revenue, and prevent the accumulation of the people's money in the Treasury; and

Whereas it is of the utmost importance to the commercial and industrial interests of the country that the tariff question should be decided at an early day, for the reason that suspense is even worse than a change which may be more or less detrimental: Therefore,

Resolved, That this board respectfully calls the attention of Congress to the great importance of enacting at the earliest possible moment whatever tariff legislation is to be enacted; and we further would respectfully call the attention of Congress to the absolute necessity for reducing our revenues so that an unnecessary surplus may not be constantly accumulating in the Treasury and withdrawing from the channels of trade the currency which constitutes its life-blood.

Resolved, That it is the duty of Congress to relieve the people from the dangers at the present session.

Resolved, That the Secretary be, and is hereby, instructed to transmit a copy of these resolutions to each member of Congress, and to such other persons as may seem advisable.

And I would remind my Republican friends that their conduct which I have been criticising does not meet with the unanimous approval of all Republicans.

As a specimen expression I quote what the Indianapolis News recently said, after calling upon the Republican members in Congress to present a tariff bill. It said:

The Republican party can rest assured if it does not do this, and so in good faith attempt to redeem its promises, that it will suffer for it. It has repeatedly and solemnly promised revision of the tariff, and the time has come for it; revision that will revise, too; no sham measure like RANDALL's, which strips away nearly the whole of the internal revenue and, reducing a little dab of tariff duties, increases some others. It must be a measure challenging the Mills measure in an honest appeal to the country as to which is the better of the two as a real revision of the tariff.

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat, on Wednesday of last week, said:

The Republican party throughout the country demand that their Representatives in Congress frame a wise measure to lower the Government's income, and use every honorable resource at their command to pass it. A policy of mere obstruction to the Mills bill will not do. RANDALL may or may not resort to such tactics this year, but if he does he must have no aid from the Republicans. In the opposition to the free-traders the Republicans must lead—not follow. A majority of Congress are friends of the protective policy. The Republican members of the House will secure the support of every Democratic protectionist in Congress if they frame such a bill as the exigencies of the situation demand. They have the ability and the experience requisite to the task, and if they fail to perform it their constituents will hold them to a rigid accountability.

The Minneapolis Journal copied this quotation from the Globe-Democrat with approval on Friday last, and said:

The Democrats are making their record. They have drawn up a bill which stands as an administration and party measure. It is impossible to say what would be the effect of such a bill.

The Republicans oppose this measure and expose its inconsistencies in a manner which would be very embarrassing to its framers if it were not purely a political venture. At the same time the country recognizes the fact that the Democracy have taken a stand in favor of a reduction of the tariff, and that is what the country wants.

The country has the evidence before it that the Democrats would at least try to afford the desired relief from unnecessary taxation if it only knew how and had full control of the Government. It might not do the right thing, but it would at least make an effort. So far as the Republicans are concerned, they are only making a record as opposed to the Democratic bill. They are not offering the country anything in its place. Everybody knows that it is one thing to find fault and another to suggest a substitute for the imperfect measure. The Republicans are making a serious mistake, and one which they can not conceal from the country, in not offering a tariff bill of their own.

The Republicanism of these papers will not, I apprehend, be questioned. The two last I know to be "stalwarts." Other papers have spoken with equal clearness to the same effect.

Mr. Chairman, we upon this side desire and even challenge our Republican friends (in the language of the Indianapolis News) to introduce "a measure challenging the Mills measure in an honest appeal to the country as to which is the better of the two as a real revision of the tariff. [Applause.]

JOSEPH S. MILLER,
Commissioner.

Mr. GUENTHER. Mr. Chairman, my friend and colleague, Mr. HUDD, in his tariff speech the other day unqualifiedly indorsed the "Mills tariff bill." He swallowed the whole dose prepared by the Democratic majority of the Committee on Ways and Means, and seemed to relish it greatly, endeavoring at the same time, by all the political sophistry he is so capable of [laughter], to persuade the people of his district in particular, and of the State of Wisconsin in general, that it is a very palatable decoction, a great panacea; the cure of all cures [laughter]; the long-looked-for Democratic St. Jacob's Oil [renewed laughter and applause] that will heal all the evils the body-politic is afflicted with.

Knowing my genial and esteemed friend as I do, I was not surprised that he dealt severely with the Republican, and tenderly, lovingly, and with poetic eloquence sung the praises of the Democratic party. [Applause.] He even went so far as to begrudge us our very name, saying that we borrowed it from the Democrats and never returned it. [Laughter.] But my dear colleague, what's in a name? The name does not make the party, but the ideas it represents and the measures it advocates.

My friend takes the ground that because our income now exceeds our expenditures by about eighty millions the reduction must be made on custom duties alone, which he calls a war tax, leaving the internal revenues undisturbed. He arraigns the Republicans for favoring another method, a reduction of another war tax, the internal revenues, and certain reductions of customs duties, if necessary.

If I understand the temper of the Republican side of this House right, and I have reason to believe I do, I am safe in asserting that the Republicans generally are in favor of abolishing the entire tax on tobacco, amounting to thirty millions; also the tax on spirits used in the arts and manufactures, which would be about six millions.

Should further additional reductions be advisable, we propose to reduce the duty on sugar or putting it entirely on the free-list, and in order to foster and stimulate sugar production at home, pay a bounty to the producer amounting about to the present duty.

The latter course would result in an additional reduction of fifty millions, and would give the people free sugar, which would be a relief to everybody, and would not destroy or interfere with any established industry or prevent the extension of any of them. This would make a reduction of about eighty-five millions certain and absolute; not problematical, as the scheme proposed by the Democratic party, of which nobody can say just what, if any, reduction will follow. After we have reduced our revenues to the actual need of the Government, and I will state right here that the Republican party has always done that, for during the eleven years since 1866 when the Republican party had control of the House of Representatives, where, under our Constitution all bills to reduce the revenues must originate, it has reduced them $362,504,569, while during the eleven years since 1866 under Democratic control the reduction was only $6,368,935.

You have had control of this House again for the last five years. What reduction has the Democratic party made? What bill has it passed? My colleague makes a very cunning plea by manipulating figures and percentages, designed to mislead and prejudice his farmer constituents. He addresses his good friend, Farmer Goodman. He tells him that his wife has to pay a tax to the Government on the shawl she buys for winter wear of 86 cents on the dollar, which he figures out amounts to $3.87 cents on that article of wearing apparel, while the rich banker's wife only pays 20 per cent. on her sealskin sacque.

He never tells Farmer Goodman what that amounts to in dollars, because that would not suit him in his argument for the purpose of prejudicing him against the Republican protectionist. [Applause.] My colleague also does not confine himself to the facts in the case [laughter and applause], for I find that the duty on seal-skin sacques is 30 per cent. ad valorem, and not 20 per cent., and consequently Mrs. Banker pays a tax of $70 on her garment to the Government, against $3.87 on the farmer's wife's shawl, admitting that my friend's reasoning, that the price of every article is enhanced to the amount of the duty, a statement which has so often been shown to be utterly fallacious, is correct.

I append an extract from a speech delivered at the meeting of the Farmers' Congress at Chicago November 11, 1887, by Hon. Thomas H. Dudley, formerly United States consul at Liverpool, England:

By our present protective tariff on the lowest grades of unbleached cotton cloths there is a duty of 2½ cents per square yard; on bleached, 3½ cents; and on colored prints, 4½ cents, with a corresponding higher rate on the higher grades of cotton goods. Will any one assert that these duties have increased the price or in any way added one cent to the cost of cotton goods in the United States? In none of these cases has the duty increased the price; on the contrary, it has not only lowered the price, but it has also forced the English manufacturer to reduce his price as well—a step he would never have taken so long as he had the monopoly of our market and could fix his own price for his commodities. This reduction did not take place until our home competition came in and forced him to put down his prices.

Now let any American farmer reflect for one moment on the extent of the use of cotton goods in his house. All the underclothing of himself and the members of his family, and often the calico dresses his wife and children wear, the sheets between which he sleeps, the ticking on his bed, and, it may be, the cloth on his table, as well as the towels and napkins he uses, and the curtains at the windows, are all manufactured from cotton, and the manufacture of these goods gives employment to thousands of American workmen, who to a great extent form the farmer's home market.

Something over three years ago I attended the national agricultural exhibition of France. It was held in Paris, and a grand exhibition it was, quite worthy of the great nation it represented. I spent four days at the exhibition. There were 14 or 15 acres of ground covered with farming implements, tools, machinery, etc. All the exhibitors had their price-lists upon their exhibits, and I was careful to obtain copies of them. The lowest-priced horse-rake was 250 francs, or $50 of our money. You can buy one just as good in any town in the United States for $27. The lowest-priced mower was $102 in our money, and was no better than we sell for $60, if as good. The lowest-priced reaper, without the binder, was $185; no better than ours for $110. The plows, harrows, and cultivators were 20 per cent. above the price they are selling for in the United States. There was not a hoe, fork, shovel, spade, or rake on the ground but was dearer in price and inferior in quality to ours.

I therefore repeat what I have said before, that under our protective tariff the prices of all manufactured commodities instead of being enhanced have actually been reduced, and that nine-tenths of all manufactured commodities now used by our farmers and laboring people in the United States are as cheap as they are in England, and in many instances cheaper.

My friend exhibits great solicitude about the sick people, probably the sick Democrats [laughter], who, he says, are put under contribution for the good of the Republican party.

Castor-oil he quotes as carrying 102 per cent., Epsom salts 30 per cent. I see by the tariff law that it is 80 cents per gallon on castor-oil, but 102 per cent. sounds more formidable to a Democratic ear.

Mr. HUDD. It is 110 per cent. really.

Mr. GUENTHER. Very well, 110 per cent. But he omits to tell his friend Farmer Goodman that while he denounces a tax of 30 per cent. on Epsom salts he approves of that item in the Mills bill, which still leaves a duty of 40 cents per gallon on castor-oil, or 55 per cent. according to his way of figuring—according to his corrected figures. [Laughter.]

If 30 per cent. is outrageous on Republican Epsom salts, why is 55 per cent. any less so on Democratic castor-oil? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

I leave the answer to this conundrum to any costive Democrat in my friend's own district. [Renewed laughter.]

But when we propose to my amiable friend, the champion of the sick Democracy, to abolish the internal tax on alcohol used in the arts and manufactures, an article which so largely enters into most every medicinal preparation and imposes upon the sick and needy a tax all the way from 25 to 450 per cent., he shakes his ambrosial locks and says: "Oh, no! because if we do that we will cut off at least six millions of revenue, and our ability to slash into that diabolical Republican tariff would be so much lessened, and we would be that much more remote from our mecca 'free trade.'" My friend quotes a little distich. The last stanza is:

We are taxed from the cradle plump into the grave.

The poet must have thought of the internal-revenue collector when he wrote it. [Laughter.] Hardly has the baby been ushered into this internal-tax ridden world and stands in need of a little paregoric or a few drops of essence of peppermint, or some other remedy [laughter] to soothe the griping in its little bowels, up steps the internal-revenue collector, clothed with all the powers of the General Government, with the Army and Navy at his back, and inexorably exacts from the little yelling infant 315 per cent. internal revenue on the paregoric, 425 per cent. on the essence of peppermint. It is pay or yell. [Great laughter.] Being a bright American child, with an eye to business, it takes the paregoric, because that bears the lowest tax, saving thereby 90 cents on the dollar [great laughter] and giving an object-lesson in "Economy is wealth." [Renewed laughter and applause.]

But soon the little one succumbs, and thereby at least thinks it escapes the constant demands of the revenue fiend. But oh, no! It is taxed even after it is dead. The sorrowing mother, in order to preserve the dear little features for a day or two, places a piece of cloth saturated with alcohol upon the pale face. There is that omnipresent revenue spy again and demands 450 per cent. for the benefit of the Government with a surplus of three hundred and thirty millions in the Treasury. [Laughter and applause.] That infernal internal tax we Republicans want to abolish. [Applause.] I take it for granted that my colleague has sent at least one copy of his speech to Wisconsin to his friend Farmer Goodman, in Kewaunee County. [Laughter.]

Old Mr. Goodman was a former constituent of mine, when I had the honor to represent Kewaunee County in the Forty-seventh Congress. I know him well. He is a nice old gentleman, unfortunately a great sufferer from rheumatism, as so many farmers are in that portion of my State, which is not noted for the mildness of its winters. [Laughter.] His wife is an amiable old lady, but also very rheumatic. [Renewed laughter.] I can see him before me now, sitting by the blazing pine-knot fire and taking great comfort in his pipe, Mrs. G. knitting by his side. He reads aloud the speech of my colleague. The further he proceeds the more indignant he becomes over the utter depravity of that party of highway robbers that even stole their name from the Democrats. [Great laughter.] He is shocked "at the many pernicious acts of tariff legislation."

When he comes to the 102 per cent. on castor-oil his indignation knows no bounds. His wife becomes almost hysterical, contemplating that she uses at least half a pint a year in the family. [Laughter.] Mrs. Goodman likes it better than Epsom salts, but she vows that hereafter she will use the latter, as she does not intend to pay the Government any longer 102 per cent. on castor-oil when she can have Epsom salts at 30 per cent. [Laughter.]

By that time the son has come home. He is a good-looking, intelligent fellow of about twenty-five years. He reads the papers, and keeps well posted on current political matters. He is the youngest son, the pride of his old parents, and their only regret is that he will vote the Republican ticket, while the old man is a Democrat. [Laughter and applause.] He has read my friend's speech the day before, but there is no wool over his eyes, though. [Laughter.] He figures out to his parents that the 102 per cent. on that half pint of castor-oil they use per year amounts to just 5 cents. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

"But," his mother says, "think of the robbers charging me 3.87 cents on that shawl I bought four years ago."

"Well, mother," he replies, "if you have really paid that much, and I know you have not, you must remember that this tax is due in a great measure to the tariff on wool, whereby we have received a much higher price for our crop. The difference is altogether in our favor." [Applause.] "And then this money went to the Government to pay its running expenses. We would have had to pay it in some other way. The Government needs a great deal of money; over eighty millions alone per year for pensions. They pay brother Charles's widow $12 a month and brother Tom $24 for his lost leg." [Applause on the Republican side.]

"But," says the father, a little more mellow by this time, "they collect more money than they need; why don't they lessen the taxes?"

Young Goodman explains to him the Republican programme. The abolition of the tobacco tax strikes the old man very favorably.

"But," says he, "the tax on alcohol used for manufacturing don't amount to much."

"We'll see about it," says the son. "I have to buy for both of you a pint of alcohol every three weeks to dissolve that gum of camphor in, to rub your aching limbs. That makes two gallons a year. The tax per gallon is $1.80. So you see that you have to pay the Government $3.60 every year as a tax on your rheumatism. [Laughter and applause.] Now, that new tariff bill leaves that as it is, and the Republicans want to strike it out altogether; but Mr. HUDD and the other Democrats will not do it. But they will give you cheaper castor-oil, so you will save 2½ cents per year on that. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] But listen to what Mr. HUDD says here," and the old gentleman reads:

> As I have already intimated, the capitalists or money kings, the favorites of fortune that can check on the banks, on the credulity as well as on the indulgence of the law-makers, may have their pearls, their diamonds, in fact all the precious stones to wear and the foreign champagne to drink, the adornments, as well as the gratification of the gilded clique, at an average of 10 per cent., together with other kinds and degrees of the ornamental that are classed as jewelry articles at 27 per cent., and other apparel luxuries on a still smaller scale.

The son smiles and says: "I see by the papers that the Mills tariff bill leaves the taxes on all these things at what they are now, and so I can't see what fault Mr. HUDD has to find with the Republicans. If he thinks the tariff on these articles is not high enough, why don't he say so. He is satisfied with every feature of the new bill, and has not one word of criticism to offer."

Old Mr. Goodman gives up the discussion by saying he will write Mr. HUDD a long letter and find out about it. [Laughter.]

My dear colleague, let me tell you that you can not convert the thinking, intelligent farmers over to your theory. Neither can you fool the intelligent citizens of foreign birth by trying to obscure this tariff discussion by dragging in the Prohibition issue. [Applause on the Republican side.]

You do not oppose the abolition of the internal revenue, as you want to make believe, because it would "graft a thorn of sumptuarism on the Federal tree."

That pretext is a little too thin even for a free-trade tariff reformer. I am as willing to reform the tariff as you are. All important economic laws need revision, require changes and amendments from time to time, so as to meet the constant fluctuations of our economic conditions.

But, Mr. Chairman, I want the tariff revised by its friends, not by its avowed enemies. [Applause on the Republican side.] I want it revised, not in the interest of free trade, but with a view of protecting American labor against degrading foreign competition, of which I personally have some knowledge. I want it revised with the object of building up new industries and maintaining those we have. I want to protect everything that is American. [Applause.] I want the standard of our wages kept up, not lowered. I do not want American labor reduced to the same miserable level of Europe or Asia. I want to encourage our own industries, not those of foreign countries. I want to reduce importations of everything that we can successfully produce, not to increase our imports. I want to give additional employment to our people, not to diminish it by allowing foreigners to supply for our consumption what we should raise or make ourselves. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I want inequalities in the tariff remedied. I am willing to have duties lowered where our industries can stand a reduction. I want the duties raised where they should be raised, in order to place our farmers and manufacturers at least on the same footing with foreigners, and I want to give our people a little the advantage. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I am in favor of restoring the wool tariff of 1867. [Great applause on the Republican side.] I am a firm believer in a tariff which not only supplies the means for the expenses of our National Government, but which at the same time also builds up and encourages our home manufactures, develops our splendid and almost inexhaustible resources, and gives employment to millions of our people.

If I am called upon to help frame the laws for our people I consider myself first, last, and all the time an American citizen. I deem it my highest duty to look at all laws from a practical American standpoint and support such measures as in my judgment will insure the greatest national progress and make us a powerful and independent nation, independent of other countries as far as at all possible.

While I deplore the condition of the working classes in the country where I was born and raised, as compared with ours, while I pity the condition of the laboring classes in England, Ireland, and everywhere, and fervently hope that better days may be in store for them, for the distressed of all nations, I however do not feel called upon as an American legislator, faithful to the country of my choice and adoption, to extend aid to them at the expense of the toiling masses of America. [Great applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] answers his own question, "Is the tariff for protection legal, just, wise?" in the negative, and every tariff-reform Democrat applauds him. What does this applause signify? It means that the Democratic party is wedded to a policy, opposed to protection to American industries. My colleague, Mr. HUDD, wants to strike out the duties "on the necessaries of daily life."

I wish to ask him whether he wants to strike out the duty of 20 per cent. on live animals, of 1 cent per pound on beef and pork, 2 cents on hams and bacon, 4 cents on cheese, 4 cents on butter and substitutes thereof, 2 cents on lard, 20 cents per bushel on wheat, 10 cents per bushel on rye and barley, 10 cents per bushel on Indian corn, 20 per cent on mutton, 15 cents per bushel on potatoes, 20 cents per gallon on honey, 1 cent per pound on tallow, $2 per ton on hay, etc.

The following are the agricultural products that this bill places on the free-list:

> All wools, linseed, garden seed, rape and other oil seed, hemp-seed, bulbs and roots, split peas, beans and peas, milk (fresh), meats, game and poultry, figs, plums and prunes, dates, currants (Zante), vegetables (fresh), barks, beans, etc., hemp, beeswax, flax, manilla, other vegetable substances.

I ask of my colleague now, are you willing to abolish the tax on all these articles? He does not answer. I want to call my friend's attention to the fact that the pea industry in the district that he represents is a very prosperous one, and I do not think the farmers in Manitowoc, Sheboygan, and the other lake-shore counties will approve of a tariff bill that puts peas on the free-list. Again I ask the gentleman if he is ready to put those articles on the free-list, and I am perfectly willing to yield now for his answer.

Mr. HUDD. You will get it in due time.

Mr. GUENTHER. Oh, my colleague answers me as he answered Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan, who asked him if he was in favor of putting wool on the free-list, and if so, whether that did not constitute him a free-trader. He answers me in the same way, by not answering at all. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CARUTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GUENTHER. Yes, sir; with pleasure.

Mr. CARUTH. How are you as to the tax on empty bottles?

Mr. GUENTHER. I am all right. [Laughter.] I would like to know how you are as to the tax on full bottles? [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. CARUTH. I wish to ask the gentleman if he has changed his sentiments since he made a speech in the Forty-seventh Congress in favor of the reduction of taxation.

Mr. GUENTHER. If my friend will read my speech with intelligence he will see that I never advocated the lowering of the duty on glass bottles.

Mr. CARUTH. What ground did the gentleman take?

Mr. GUENTHER. I said that I wanted the tariff on glass bottles to remain as it was. The bill under consideration at that time proposed to raise the tariff to three times the then existing duty by a little process of manipulation, by substituting a specific duty for an ad valorem duty, thus raising the tariff from 35 per cent. ad valorem to 105 per cent. I opposed that, because I considered 35 per cent. sufficient; but I never in my life advocated the lowering of the then existing tariff on glass bottles. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CARUTH. I have the gentleman's speech here, and I ask him whether he did not at that time say what I am about to read?

In answer to the statement of my genial friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE], whom I love so much and esteem so highly, I am sorry to see that his vision is so impaired by the smoky monopolist atmosphere of Pittsburgh and Allegheny City that he can not distinguish between protection to monopolists and protection to American labor. If the gentleman would only display as much zeal and courage in opposing the monstrous demands of these monopolist constituents of his as he always exhibits in his attitude toward the President of the United States, I would look up to him with admiration as the foremost champion of the labor producing masses of our country.

Mr. GUENTHER. That is a very good speech. [Laughter.] I wish I had time to have the whole speech read. It seems to me I have heard it before, and I certainly stand by it. [Renewed laughter.]

Furthermore, I wish to tell my friend that a few weeks ago a petition came in here for a reduction of the duty on glass bottles to a quarter of a cent per pound, and the company of which I am the president, the Bethesda Mineral Spring Company, signed that petition without my knowledge, but I remonstrated and put myself on record in the press of this country against such a reduction. I do not approve of any lowering of the duty on glass bottles below one-half cent per pound, which I deemed sufficient then and now, although my company uses a great many every year. I am willing to pay in order to let the glass-blowers earn fair wages. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But to return to my Wisconsin friend now. He claims that this is a bill in the interest of the farmer. You leave manufactured articles on the tariff-list; everything in that line the farmer has to buy. But you place almost everything he produces on the free-list. Is this just, equitable, wise? Is this friendly legislation for the farmer?

I find in the latest quarterly report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics that for the three months ending December 31, 1887, we imported the following articles:

Instead of lowering the tariff on these articles, or placing, as the Mills bill does, many entirely on the free-list, I would raise the tariff so as to protect the American farmer against foreign competition. I can see no good reason why our farmers should not control our markets. [Applause on the Republican side.] My friend from Michigan [Mr. FORD], in his speech last Friday, asks:

Why should not the great American hen be protected against the pauper hen of Europe?

[Laughter.]

I answer, most assuredly it should; and I now give notice that I will offer an amendment to the tariff bill, or vote for one, placing a duty of 3 or 4 cents per dozen on imported eggs. I do not see why the American farmer should not be able to supply our markets with all the eggs we consume. In the three months, October, November, and December, 1887, we imported 6,594,672 dozen eggs at a value of $1,115,728.

I do not want the Canadians, who pay no taxes here, who assume no duties of American citizenship, to come into our markets and reap the profits which should go to the American farmers. That is the kind of a tariff reformer I am. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I am supposing that you succeed in passing the Mills tariff bill or a similar measure. What will the result be on the farmers, who, as you always claim, derive no protection from the tariff?

I venture the assertion, and I think every unprejudiced thinking person will agree with me, that hundreds of thousands of men, now finding employment in manufacturing establishments, will lose it, because the articles now produced by them will be more profitably imported from abroad. These hundreds of thousands of people, heretofore consumers of flour, beef, potatoes, vegetables, etc., will be forced to till the soil as a last resort. They will become producers of these articles themselves. The demand for the farmer's products will be lessened and the supply increased, and as the price of everything is regulated by supply and demand, it is easily seen that the prices of all these products will go down, and the farmer will soon realize, to his sorrow, that the reduction of the tariff affects him seriously.

My friend from Wisconsin says in his speech that the reason why this tariff bill is proposed is, "What shall be done with the surplus in the Treasury?"

That surplus in the Treasury, willfully retained by a Democratic administration, furnishes the pretext for an assault upon our protective-tariff system, that system to which every political evil, real or imaginary, is charged by the Democratic party, that system which is stigmatized by Democratic orators as the very debauchery of government.

If the Democratic party is so anxious to relieve the surplus, why was it not used by your Democratic administration under the law that has been on the statute-books for seven years—act of March 3, 1881—which is as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury may, at any time, apply the surplus money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as may be considered proper, to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds.

Why was it not done? Do you pretend to say that it is not good policy for the Government to use what surplus it may have to pay its debts and stop paying interest? It was not done because that would have deprived you of the pretext for a law to break down the protective tariff.

My friend at last comes to the lumber question, which is a very important one to the people of that section of my State wherein I live.

When I first glanced at the tariff bill reported from the Committee on Ways and Means, and read—

That on and after the 1st day of July, 1888, the following articles mentioned in this section, when imported, shall be exempt from duty:
Timber, hewn and sawed, and timber used for spars and in building wharves.
Timber, squared or sided.
Wood unmanufactured, not specially enumerated or provided for.
Sawed boards, planks, deals, and all other articles of sawed lumber.
Hubs for wheels, posts, last-blocks, wagon-blocks, oar-blocks, gun-blocks, heading-blocks, and all like blocks or sticks, rough, hewn, or sawed only.
Staves of wood.
Pickets and palings.
Laths.
Shingles.
Clapboards, pine or spruce.
Logs—

I felt like the fellow who was under sentence of death and was led to the gallows early Monday morning. Looking around him he said in a melancholy tone of voice, quite suitable to the occasion, "This is a mighty fine beginning of the week." [Laughter.]

My friend uses these words:

And I say boldly and knowingly now here in my place, that Wisconsin as a State nor the people thereof has received the slightest benefit from the tax on foreign lumber.

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion it does require a great deal of effrontery to make such an assertion and keep a sober face. [Laughter.]

I assert just as boldly and knowingly that the people of Wisconsin have derived great benefits from the tax on lumber in particular, and from the whole protective system in general.

The protective policy of the Republican party has built up the great manufacturing centers of the West and Northwest, Chicago, St. Louis, Milwaukee, and many others.

Mills, factories, furnaces sprung up like mushrooms, mines were opened, railroads built. Millions came to the West and Northwest, finding employment in the workshops, or, as farmers, a ready market for their products.

The tariff on lumber prevented the Canadians from competing in Chicago and other markets with Wisconsin and Michigan, and tens of thousands of people found remunerative employment in the woods and saw-mills of these two States. Their development has been wonderful. Had the Canadians been permitted to ship their lumber free to the United States, Canada would have witnessed that splendid prosperity and growth, in a great measure, that we have enjoyed, and not one-half of our people would have found employment in the lumber industries.

I pity the peculiarly constructed intellect that can not comprehend these self-evident facts. [Laughter.]

Why does Green Bay, the home of my colleague, offer a bounty to induce a lumber-manufacturing establishment to locate there? Strike out, as you propose, the duty on all manufactured lumber, and you will not induce anybody to accept your offer at double the bounty. The city of De Pere, in my friend's own county, is trying the same thing. The farmers everywhere appreciate the importance of new manufacturing establishments, because they create a home market and enhance the value of their lands, and raise the prices of their chickens, meats, vegetables, milk, butter, cheese, etc.

The lumber industry in the State of Wisconsin, fostered by the wise policy of the Republican party, has been a blessing to the poor immigrants who settled on farms in Wisconsin, and it is so still in the northern part. It is safe to say that there are thousands in my friend's district who go to the lumbering camps every winter and earn from $20 to $32.50 and their board per month, and that at a time when they would be compelled to be almost idle on their farms.

I object most decidedly to a policy which discriminates against the 20,000 people of my State who are making a living in this industry by withdrawing from them all protection, but leaving it upon most of the articles they consume. Why should they be singled out? Are they less deserving of recognition because the free-traders cry for free lumber?

Logs and round unmanufactured timber are on the free-list now. Is this not sufficient? Why will you place the manufactured articles also on the free-list, like shingles, laths, clapboards, etc.?

According to the census of 1880 there were about 8,500 people employed in the manufacture of lumber in my State. This number does not include the thousands working in the lumber camps, but only those in the mills.

These mills in 1880 numbered 704, with an estimated capital of $19,824,059, paying during 1880 in wages $2,257,218. The value of logs used in the mills amounted to $12,219,097.

It is estimated that at least 70 per cent. of the value of logs is labor, so that in the lumber industry in my State the sum of about eleven millions is annually expended for labor alone.

I do not plead here for the owners of pine lands or for the proprietors of mills. Capital can usually take care of itself. But I do plead most earnestly for the laboring people employed in this business, and for the farmers who sell their oats, their oxen, their horses, their butter, their hay, their eggs, their potatoes, and other produce to these people—for the many farmers and farmers' sons who every winter earn good wages in the lumber camps.

Before 1861, under free trade, farmers received from 10 to 25 cents for oats; now from 35 to 40 cents. For hay, about $6 to $8 per ton; now from $10 to $15. Butter, 10 to 12 cents per pound; now 18 to 25 cents. Extra horses, $100; now the same grade is $200. And so on throughout the whole list of what the farmer has for sale.

My friend says that the wages of the men, and he puts the number no far from thirty thousand, did not vary materially from $1 per day during all this time, whether under free lumber or under protection.

I will tell him, and he can verify it by anybody familiar with the facts, that before the protective policy was inaugurated the highest wages paid were on the average about $15 per month; now the average is $26.

Mr. BUCHANAN. You mean those are the wages exclusive of board and lodging?

Mr. GUENTHER. Yes, sir; they get board and lodging besides.

My colleague says that almost the entire valuable pine lands are owned or controlled by less than forty men or corporations.

Mr. Chairman, in my own city of Oshkosh alone are nearly, if not quite, that number of men who own valuable tracts of pine land.

And then what has that to do with manufactured lumber, as logs are already on the free-list? He says:

Those forty men have all grown rich, but the twenty thousand laborers are still workingmen, just as poor as when they swung the first ax.

Mr. Chairman, I personally know hundreds, and I know there are thousands—ay, tens of thousands—who now have a competency, own their own homes and farms, who formerly worked in the woods.

Most of the men who own pine lands and mills to-day came to Wisconsin twenty, thirty, forty years ago and were wage-workers.

It is no reproach but the highest praise for them that by hard work by steady industry, by frugality, economy, pluck, perseverance, and intelligence they have become wealthy in a legitimate way.

There is no better, no more liberal, no more free and kinder hearted, no more intelligent set of men on God's green earth than the lumbermen of my State, whether rich or poor. [Applause.] They have been the pioneers of Northern Wisconsin, and have done more for the development of her bountiful resources than any other agency.

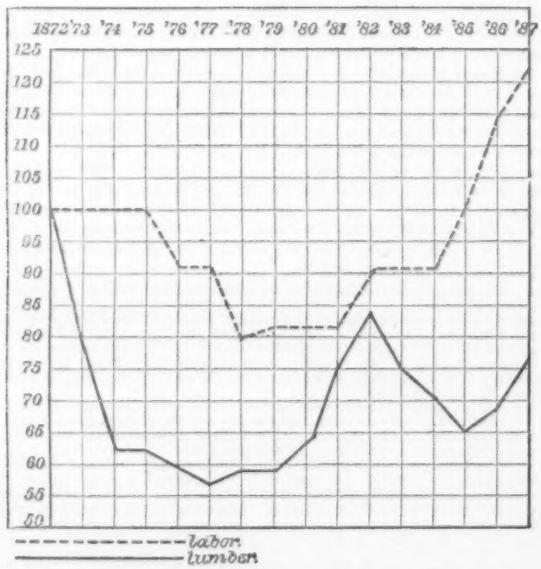
If my friend is desirous of informing himself about the lumber industry, about the effect of the tariff upon it, and upon the general prosperity of the people of the State of Wisconsin, I advise him to interview our colleague from the Ninth district [Mr. STEPHENSON], or the senior Senator from our State [Mr. SAWYER], (who now does me the honor to listen to me), both of whom commenced their successful, honorable, and unblemished career working by the day in the woods of Northern Wisconsin. [Great applause.] For further information I refer him to the following article from the Northwestern Lumberman of March 24, 1888, which throws a good deal of light upon the question of wages and the prices of lumber:

A majority of the arguments in favor of free trade or against it are neither solid nor convincing.

Something approaching sound sense on the tariff question might be looked for in the columns of a paper of the standing of the New York Evening Post. Such a paper should let alone the tricks of the pot-house politicians and confine itself to facts, or, if facts can not be obtained, then certainly to good, logical arguments; but that paper, in an endeavor to make a point, discards both facts and logic. It recently said:

"The price of lumber has been rising in the United States as the forests have fallen beneath the woodman's ax. Have the wages of loggers and raftsmen risen in proportion? Of course not. Lumbermen's wages have been governed by the supply and demand of labor. The supply is as large as the working population of the country plus the immigration from Europe. The supply of white-pine lumber is restricted to a narrow belt fringing the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes, and the profits of the owners are secured to them by a tariff of $2 per thousand, which we must not disturb, forsooth, because Canadians are not taxed."

As bearing on what the New York paper calls the advance in the price of lumber, we have gathered the cargo prices of No. 2 common boards and strips, and joists and scantlings in the Chicago market for a term of sixteen years. The price of each for every year was obtained for May, soon after the opening of navigation; for August, when the season was about half over; and for December, immediately preceding the close of navigation. In the table following the range of prices is given. The New York "free lumber" editorial writer is at liberty to understand that Chicago is the leading white-pine market of the Northwest; that it receives about a quarter of the output of the mills of the three white-pine producing States, and that therefore a similar range of prices would apply to other markets in this section.



Years.	No. 2 common boards and strips.	Joist and scantling.
1872	$16.00 to $17.00	$11.75 to $13.00
1873	13.00	9.50 to 10.00
1874	10.00 to 10.50	8.25 to 9.25
1875	9.50 to 11.00	8.25 to 8.50
1876	9.00 to 11.00	7.25 to 8.00
1877	9.00 to 9.50	7.00 to 7.37½
1878	9.00 to 10.12½	7.00 to 8.37½
1879	8.00 to 11.00	6.37½ to 9.00
1880	11.00 to 12.00	8.50 to 9.00
1881	11.00 to 14.00	10.25 to 12.00
1882	13.00 to 15.00	10.75 to 13.50
1883	11.50 to 12.75	9.50 to 9.75
1884	10.25 to 12.00	8.63¾ to 9.25
1885	10.00 to 11.25	8.50 to 9.50
1886	11.00 to 11.50	9.25 to 10.00
1887	12.50 to 13.00	10.00 to 10 12½

If the editor who writes such absurd stuff as is quoted from the Evening Post can gain any consolation from the figures herewith printed nobody will begrudge it. If he had been to the pains to have talked five minutes with any New York lumberman of experience he would have learned that lumber has not been "rising." That, however, we fear, would not have answered the purpose. It is reasonable to suppose that but comparatively few of the readers of the Evening Post are lumbermen or acquainted with the history of the lumber market. The great majority of its readers are ignorant on the subject; therefore the false statement is given to them with the expectation that it will be swallowed whole.

"Have the wages of loggers and raftsmen risen in proportion? Of course not." Well, of course they have, and in greater proportion. The figures composing the table below are taken from the books of one of the largest manufacturing companies in Michigan—a company that for nearly ten years has cut from 50,000,000 to 75,000,000 feet of lumber yearly, and may therefore be considered representative:

Years.	Sawyers and teamsters.	Foremen.
1872	$20.00 to $26.00	$45.00 to $50.00
1873	20.00 to 26.00	45.00 to 50.00
1874	20.00 to 26.00	45.00 to 50.00
1875	20.00 to 26.00	45.00 to 50.00
1876	18.00 to 24.00	45.00
1877	18.00 to 24.00	45.00
1878	14.00 to 20.00	35.00 to 40.00
1879	16.00 to 22.00	40.00
1880	16.00 to 22.00	40.00
1881	16.00 to 22.00	40.00 to 45.00
1882	18.00 to 24.00	40.00 to 45.00
1883	18.00 to 24.00	40.00 to 45.00
1884	18.00 to 24.00	40.00 to 45.00
1885	20.00 to 26.00	45.00 to 50.00
1886	22.00 to 30.00	50.00 to 60.00
1887	20.00 to 32.50	52.00 to 65.00

In order to make the matter perfectly plain, the following diagram has been prepared from the above figures, which will show at a glance the relative rate in the decline and advance in the price of lumber and labor for sixteen years.

This diagram will be of interest to others than those discussing the tariff question. With 100 as a starting point for each, it will be seen that for two years, 1872 and 1873, the price of lumber was uninterruptedly downward, having declined during that period 35 per cent., while the price of labor did not change. In 1874 lumber held its own, and then both it and labor became cheaper, lumber reaching the lowest point in 1877 and labor the year following. From this time on the price of labor was onward and upward without a break. From 1879 to 1882 lumber advanced 25 per cent., during the next three years fell back 18 per cent., and in 1885 started up again, in which direction, in common with labor, it is still pointing. The price of labor during the sixteen years dropped but 21 per cent. below the point at which it started in 1872, and the price of lumber dropped about 43 per cent. Wages in the woods are now 23 per cent. higher than they were in 1872, while the price of lumber has never reached that of 1872 within 16 per cent.

There are many other industries in Wisconsin that would be seriously crippled should the bill which my friend so unreservedly advocates become law.

The State of Wisconsin is now the third State in the manufacture of paper. Were it not for this tariff agitation we would now have one or more large mills in progress of construction.

The manufacture of wood pulp has been a great boon for our farmers. Spruce, poplar, and small-pine lands, heretofore almost, if not wholly, worthless, have become valuable.

A great and prosperous future is before us in the manufacture of wood pulp, provided you retain that small tariff of 10 per cent. which this bill strikes out. The member from the Sixth district [Mr. CLARK], whose constituent I have the honor to be, pays $25,000 per month in wages alone in his paper-mills. He is another example of the possibilities of the wage-workers in our glorious country, where every man by industry and intelligence has a chance to climb to the top of the ladder. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, my colleague refers to the coming election in language eloquent and poetical. He speaks of "the policy that shall rule the land and guide and guard its citizens for weal or woe." Mr. Chairman, I say amen. [Applause.]

I have no fear of the result.

I am glad that the issue is squarely made. I will contentedly leave it to the jury of American voters to bring in a verdict in the case of "Protection vs. Free Trade or its synonyms." [Applause.]

I am going to stand, as I always did, by the party whose beneficent policy of protection has dignified and exalted free American labor; a policy that has kindled the fires of thousands of furnaces, mills, and factories; a policy that has opened the mines and brought to light the treasures hidden in the earth; a policy that has converted the wilds of the primeval forest into laughing fields; a policy that has changed the importer into a manufacturer; a policy that has made us independent in war and peace; a policy that has raised the wages of labor above those of any other country; a policy that has made us the most prosperous, the most envied of all the nations on earth. I am going to follow the party upon whose starry banner the golden words "Protection to American Industries" shine resplendent like the midday sun. [Applause.]

I welcome the issue forced upon us by a Democratic President. The party in favor of a protective policy will address itself to the practical sense, the high intelligence, the sound judgment of the American people. We will point out to them the glorious industrial achievements, the wonderful progress in every field of American enterprise and labor within the last twenty-seven years. We will show them the still greater possibilities yet in store for them under a continuance of that policy.

And while you will appeal to them with all the outbursts of your burning eloquence, wasted in a mistaken cause; while you will address yourselves, my free-trade friends, to their prejudices and to impractical theories, I feel confident that the patriotism of the American people, the people of the Northern States at least, that has always asserted itself in the gloomy days of threatened danger, will dictate a just verdict. That verdict will consign you to your proper place—among the stragglers—in our grand national procession of American industries. [Long-continued applause.]

[Mr. WHEELER withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. KERR. I move that the time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour fixed by order of the House for the recess has arrived.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. In view of that fact, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the tariff bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House, in accordance with its standing order in reference to Friday evening, takes a recess until 8 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House at 8 o'clock p. m. was called to order by Mr. MCMILLIN, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.
Washington, D. C., May 4, 1888.

I hereby designate Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session of the House this evening.

JNO. G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills under the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the title of the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5961) to increase the pension now paid to Mrs. D. P. Woodbury.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of ths session the committee, so far as we control the matter, agreed that bills on the Calendar should be considered in the order in which they stood, but by some means that agreement has been more honored in the breach than in the observance. Members who have been present urin g these evening sessions have asked that bills shall be considered as they called them up. It is hard to resist the argument that those who come here shall be served first.

I now propose that bills on the Calendar shall be called in the order in which they appear on it, and unless some one is present to ask for the consideration of the bill it shall be passed over informally, not to lose its place on the Calendar.

Mr. McRAE. I object to that proposition, although I do not object to the bills being considered in their order if finally disposed of. Bills that are passed over to-night will, under the proposition made, come up the next night to be considered, and I do not get any nearer to my bill. I have only one bill, and that is for a worthy, brave, poor old soldier of the Indian war. He can not live long, is in needy circumstances, and I want his bill reached as soon as possible.

Mr. MATSON. I suggest for the benefit of the gentleman from Arkansas—a matter I have already suggested to him—that by unanimous consent we proceed with the Calendar to-night where we left off last Friday evening.

Mr. McRAE. That does not meet the case. Bills passed over to-night will still remain upon the Calendar and come up to be considered next Friday evening.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the request of the gentleman from Indiana; it is this: That bills on the Calendar be proceeded with, beginning where it was left off on last Friday night, and that bills be taken up in their regular order; and unless some members present ask for the consideration of the bill when called it shall be passed over informally, not to lose its place on the Calendar.

Mr. McRAE. I object. I have no objection to disposing of bills when they are called up so we may get rid of them as early as possible, but I do not want every Friday night to have the bills which are laid aside taken up and gone all over again.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have been here night after night. Last Friday evening just as my bill was reached a gentleman was permitted by unanimous consent to take up a bill and I was prevented from getting my bill before the House. It is a meritorious bill (H. R. 6552) to increase the pension of James R. Porter, late colonel of the One hundred and thirty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry. That bill has now just been reached.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless some arrangement be reached the Calendar will be called in its regular order.

Mr. WADE. Let the agreement be that we shall proceed in order until half-past 9 o'clock, and that then the members present shall be permitted to call up bills.

Several members objected.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill (H. R. 5961) to increase the pension now paid to Mrs. D. P. Woodbury is before the committee, and will be read.

Mr. CHEADLE. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It can not be objected to.

Mr. CHEADLE. I announce my purpose to demand a constitutional quorum if these bills are attempted to be forced through.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman gives notice that he will raise the point of no quorum on bills of that class.

Mr. CHEADLE. I have stated my position more than once on this question, and it is not necessary to repeat it. Where a bill is called up granting a pension in the case of a soldier or the widow of a soldier I shall not raise the point of no quorum, because the rate of pension in such cases is fixed by law and we know exactly what it is. Nor shall I object to the case of pension of a widow of an officer where the rate is fixed in accordance with existing law. But where bills are called up proposing to fix a rate beyond the law I shall demand the presence of a quorum.

Mr. BRYCE. Why so?

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the bill will be passed over informally, not to lose its place on the Calendar.

Mr. BRYCE. May I ask why?

The CHAIRMAN. For the reason the gentleman proposes to demand a quorum.

A MEMBER. And there is no quorum present.

Mr. BRYCE. I should like to know why this bill when called up should not be considered? Why should it be passed over?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman says he proposes to demand the presence of a quorum, and no quorum is present.

Mr. BRYCE. I did not hear that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman that the bill be laid aside informally, not to lose its place on the Calendar?

Mr. BRYCE objected, but afterward withdrew his objection.

There was no objection, and the bill was passed over informally, not to lose its place on the Calendar.

EDWARD DURANT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 765) granting an increase of pension to Edward Durant, reported adversely from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, this is an adverse report, and I suggest that it be laid aside and reported to the House with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed. I submit that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

HANNAH H. GRANT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7466) granting a pension to Hannah H. Grant.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Hannah H. Grant, mother of John Jordan, late of Company D, Second Regiment United States Sharpshooters.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The fact that soldier contributed to the support of his mother before enlistment and during the war is undisputed. A special examination was made of the case and a favorable report submitted, but the Department was not fully satisfied as to dependence, and rejected the claim after a long period from the time it was filed. The Commissioner of Pensions, however, regarded the case as sufficiently meritorious to warrant the following communication:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
"Washington, D. C., January 12, 1888.

"SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith the papers in the pension claim above indicated, for transmittal through your office to the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, House of Representatives, that the attention of Congress may be invited to the facts in the case for such action in the premises, under the provisions of joint resolution approved May 29, 1830, as that honorable body may deem just and proper.

"This claim for dependent pension has been rejected by this bureau upon the ground that there did not exist at soldier's death that dependence contemplated by law for the allowance of pension to a dependent relative.

"It is proved in the claim that although the mother was not in a dependent condition at the date of the death of the son, yet such a condition did arise within a few years thereafter.

"The claimant lost two sons, killed in service, is now seventy-five years of age, and has been for many years quite destitute and an object of charity.

"The attention of Congress is also invited to this claim as illustrating the proposition in my annual report for 1887, that the law should be amended to grant pension to dependent parents whether the condition of dependence existed at the death of soldier or arose thereafter.

"Very respectfully,
"JOHN C. BLACK, Commissioner.

"The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR."

As the facts that claimant lost two sons in battle and is now in a condition of utter dependence are fully established, your committee report the bill back favorably with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALPHEUS DYER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4891) granting a pension to Alpheus Dyer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Alpheus Dyer, of Belfast, Me., late a private in the One hundredth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

Alpheus Dyer was a private in the One hundredth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers, and became so completely broken down in the military service that he was discharged, the army surgeon certifying that he was suffering from phthisis pulmonalis (consumption). Evidently this was a mistake in diagnosis, as this so-called consumptive has continued to live for about a quarter of a century; but the fact that he was a complete physical wreck at the time of his discharge is fully established by numerous reliable witnesses, and he has continued so up to the present time. He applied for pension, alleging an injury to knee and spinal irritation incurred while in the service.

Four special examinations were had in this case, and for a long time the claimant had the best of it, every witness swearing to soundness of soldier at time of enlistment, and several testifying that they had personal knowledge of soldier's injury. Eventually, however, one witness was found who declined to give a sworn statement, but who said that the injury to claimant's knee resulted from a street quarrel a short time before soldier was mustered into service. It is significant that this witness declined to give a statement under oath, and the conclusion is irresistible that if he was not the party with whom soldier quarreled, if a quarrel actually took place, he was certainly a prejudiced witness. Upon the testimony of this one man the decision seemed to turn against the soldier and the case was rejected.

It is an indisputable fact that when soldier returned from the Army he was utterly broken in health. On this point the testimony is overwhelming, and among the witnesses is found the name of Hon. SETH L. MILLIKEN, of Maine, a member of this House. Putting aside all technicalities, it is impossible to otherwise conclude than that soldier received his injury in the service and in the line of duty.

Your committee report the bill favorably and recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EPHRAIM REYNOLDS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 809) granting a pension to Ephraim Reynolds.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ephraim Reynolds, of Monroe, Me., late a private in Company F, Twenty-sixth Regiment of Maine Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The sole question in this case is as to whether soldier was in line of duty when injured. The Pension Department was in so much doubt that the papers have been sent to Congress under the provisions of the joint resolution of May 29, 1830, which is as follows:

"That the heads of Departments who may severally be charged with the administration of the pension laws of the United States be, and they hereby are, respectively directed and required, as soon as may be after the opening of each session of Congress, to present to the Senate and House of Representatives a several list of such persons, whether revolutionary, invalid, or otherwise, as shall have made application for pension or an increase of pension, and as in their opinion respectively ought to be placed on the pension-roll, or otherwise provided for, and for doing which they have no power or authority, with the names and residences of such persons, the capacity in which they served, the degree of relief proposed, and a brief statement of the grounds thereof, to the end that Congress may consider the same."

The statement from the Pension Office shows that this is a claim for pension on account of double inguinal hernia, alleged to have been received at Arlington Heights, Va., in November, 1862. It was rejected because the Pension Department was not satisfied that the injury was received in strict line of duty, but the fact that the Department sends it to Congress shows that there is a reasonable doubt on that point.

The Department found some slight conflicting testimony in the case, but the weight of evidence is so strongly in favor of the claimant that it is a matter of surprise that the claim was not adjudicated in his favor. The incurrence of the injury, caused by a log rolling on soldier, is fully proved, the facts being that while employed at Arlington Heights, assisting in building fortifications, he voluntarily assisted certain negroes in loading logs, and while doing so received the injury. His own positive statement is supported by his captain and other witnesses; his captain saying that he can recall that claimant was injured while on work at the fortifications at Arlington, but witness was not present, and can not remember the particulars. He further says, "I am of opinion that soldier was acting under my orders when he received the injury."

Certain comrades who were with him swear positively to the injury, one of them making an entry in his diary at the time as to the accident, and they also swear that he was on detail at the time. A special examination was had of this case, the witnesses are certified to as men of high character, and the special examiner reported in favor of the claim. As before remarked, this claim seems to have been rejected upon the most trifling discrepancies of statement. It seems conclusive (1) that soldier was in the service, (2) that he received an injury, and (3) that he was working for the Government at the time the injury was received. Under these circumstances it seems hardly dignified to split hairs in determining the question as to whether or not he was actually detailed to perform the particular work that he was doing for the Government when the accident happened.

The special examiner uses this language:

"I believe that in any event he was in the line of duty, whether the men he assisted were soldiers or teamsters, or whether claimant was on detail or happened by there. They were doing work for the Government, and he was justified in taking hold and assisting them as much as if he had been one of them. He was not foraging or exercising, or doing any act for pleasure or selfish ends, but acting in the interests and for the benefit of the Government.

"This claimant," the special examiner continues, "is a very poor, ignorant man, but said to be truthful. He couldn't invent a consistent lie if he tried to. He has been at the Soldiers' Home at Togus, and assisted by the town. I recommend admission in this case; I believe it too strong a case to be rejected, the probabilities being entirely in favor of its being a just claim."

This case illustrates the necessity for a legal tribunal of some kind to which such claims could be sent, and where arrears would be granted if claimant was successful. Your committee report the bill back favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCCREARY. I ask unanimous consent that each member present be permitted to call up a bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

I would amend that by moving that bills be called up in their regular order on the Calendar, and unless some member asks the consideration of a bill that it be passed over.

The CHAIRMAN. That has been already objected to.

Mr. WARNER. I suggest, in order to remove any difficulty, that the gentleman from Ohio be permitted to call up the first bill.

Mr. SAWYER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again submit the request of the gentleman from Kentucky. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I withdraw the objection.

MRS. THERESE GUELICH.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 152) granting a pension to Mrs. Therese Guelich.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, instructed and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Therese Guelich, a volunteer nurse in the late war, and pay her a pension of $12 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. SPOONER) was read, as follows:

At the breaking out of the war in 1861 Mrs. Therese Guelich was a teacher of music and languages in Chicago. She immediately volunteered as an army nurse, being commissioned by Miss D. L. Dix. She served faithfully and efficiently in Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee, without pay, until the spring of 1862, when she was compelled by reason of severe sickness and resulting disability to relinquish her praiseworthy work and return to her home. Her disease was bronchitis, which became chronic, and from which she is still suffering. She is now sixty-five years of age, disqualified by age and disability from earning her livelihood, without means of support or relatives or friends from whom she can seek means for her maintenance.

These facts are established by testimony on file with your committee, which it is deemed unnecessary to recite in detail in this report, and present a case fully justifying the action proposed by said bill.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several members addressed the Chair.

Mr. SAWYER. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that members will be notified in advance by a page when they are to be recognized; there is, therefore, no necessity for a number of members rising at the same time and addressing the Chair for recognition.

Mr. CARUTH. I wish the Chair would send that page in this direction now. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAWYER. I would like to ask if a list of names for recognition has been prepared?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at this time.

Mr. SAWYER. Is it necessary for a man to get on the list before he can be recognized?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that every member present can be reached to-night.

The Chair will request all members who desire to call up bills to secure the bills they propose to call up and send them to the desk when they are recognized, which will save considerable time.

CARTER W. TILLER.

Mr. CARUTH. I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 3681) granting a pension to Carter W. Tiller.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Carter W. Tiller, dependent father of G. W. Tiller, late a private in Company A, Twenty-eighth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. CARUTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the report be dispensed with, and that it be printed in the RECORD. It is quite lengthy.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that the report is lengthy. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3681) granting a pension to Carter W. Tiller, have carefully considered the same, and respectfully report:

A similar bill passed the Forty-ninth Congress, but was vetoed. Since then proof has accumulated which in the opinion of your committee removes the objections urged by the President.

Your committee do not doubt that Carter W. Tiller was greatly dependent upon his son, George W. Tiller, who was a Union soldier, contracted disease whilst in the service of his country, and died whilst a prisoner of war. Your committee report the bill favorably and recommend its passage.

For the information of the House your committee append hereto the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the Forty-ninth Congress on the veto message of the President:

"[House Report No. 3200, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the veto message of the President of the United States on the bill (H. R. 4002) granting a pension to Carter W. Tiller, having considered the same, submit the following report, accompanied by said bill, and House report thereon (No. 682), and said message:

"There are but two points of objection to the bill raised by the veto message of the President, namely: (1) That of capture and subsequent death of soldier being due to and resulting from his military service in line of duty, and (2) that of dependence of the claimant, Carter W. Tiller, on the soldier for support.

"The first objection is based on the charge of desertion in the military history of the soldier; the second objection is based on the ability of claimant to provide a competent support, and contributions of soldier to support of his father prior to enlistment or during his military service.

"On the first ground of objection the committee find the following state of facts:

"On the muster-rolls of Company A, Twenty-eighth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers, for the months of September and October, 1863, dated October 31, 1863, and signed by William E. Benson as captain of said company, the following entry, namely, 'Deserted September 20, 1863.'

"The report of Adjutant-General shows company and regiment stationed at Stevenson, Ala., during September, October, and November, 1863.

"Report of Adjutant-General, United States Army, copy of which is hereto attached, shows that soldier died at Andersonville, Ga., while a prisoner of war, on 21st of July, 1864.

"Affidavits of William E. Benson, late captain of Company A, Twenty-eighth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers; J. A. Weatherford, late second lieutenant of same company and regiment; John Martin, late captain Company D, Twenty-eighth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers, and B. H. Bottger, late civil employé of same regiment, copies of which are hereto attached, show the fact and circumstances of capture of soldier.

"Whilst the date of the capture is not given the detail and fact are clearly set forth in such a manner as to leave in the mind of the committee no shadow of doubt that the soldier was captured while in line of duty on the 20th day of September, 1863, or soon thereafter, and that he was held as a prisoner of war until July 21, 1864, when he was committed to the hospital at Andersonville, Ga., where he died, as shown by the records of the prison hospital.

"The charge of desertion was doubtless entered on the muster-roll of the company because the captain at the time of making the roll had no official information as to the capture of the said soldier. He subsequently testifies that he had 'not a personal knowledge of the capture, but was so informed at the time by reliable persons, and has no doubt of the capture and death of said soldier;' and 'that said Tiller was sent out on some duty, when he was captured, but he does not now know what duty.'

"The Commissioner of Pensions seems to have arrived at this conclusion, as the application of the claimant for pension was rejected solely on the ground that claimant was not dependent on the soldier for support. The decision is here given, and is as follows:

"'Rejected on the ground that claimant was not dependent upon the soldier, as he has supported himself by the income from his occupation since prior to the soldier's death.'

"On the question of dependence of claimant upon soldier, attention is called to affidavits of Capt. William E. Benson, Lieut. J. A. Weatherford, Capt. John Martin, affidavits of claimant, Dr. J. C. Metcalfe, the official certificate of J. A. Krack, city assessor of Louisville, Ky., and the written statement of Hon. A. S. Willis, a member of the Forty-ninth Congress from Kentucky, copies of which are hereto attached.

"Your committee also submit herewith letters from Acting Adjutant-General United States Army, dated June 28, 1886, and July 1, 1886, respectively. Latter is addressed to Hon. W. P. TAULBEE, a member of the committee.

"Your committee recommend the passage of the bill, the President's veto to the contrary notwithstanding."

"[House Ex. Doc. No. 288, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

"Message from the President of the United States, returning, without his approval, House bill No. 4002, entitled 'An act to grant a pension to Carter W. Tiller.'

"To the House of Representatives:

"I return without my approval House bill No. 4002, entitled 'An act granting a pension to Carter W. Tiller.'

"The records of the War Department show that George W. Tiller, the son of the claimant, enlisted in a Kentucky regiment on the 8th day of October, 1861, and that he deserted on the 20th day of September, 1863; that he was captured by the Confederates afterwards, but the time and circumstances are not given. On the 21st day of July, 1864, he was admitted to the Andersonville hospital, and died the same day of scorbutus.

"The father filed his claim for a pension in 1887, alleging his dependence upon the deceased soldier. It is probably true that the son while in the Army sent money to the claimant, though he appears to have been employed as a policeman in the city of Louisville ever since his son's death, at a fair salary.

"The claim thus made was rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that the claimant was not dependent upon his son.

"I am entirely satisfied of the correctness of this determination, and if the records presented to me are reliable, I think the fact which appears therefrom, that the death of the soldier occurred ten months after desertion, and had no apparent relation to any service in the Union Army, is conclusive against the claim now made.

"[House Report No. 682, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4002) granting a pension to Carter W. Tiller, having carefully considered the same, submit the following report:

"George W. Tiller enlisted as a private in Company A, Twenty-eighth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, October 8, 1861; was captured while in line of duty near Bridgeport, Ala.; was confined at Andersonville, Ga., where he died July 21, 1864. He was sound at enlistment and capture, and is shown by records of War Department to have died of diarrhea. He never was married. His mother died in February, 1864. The claimant and beneficiary of this bill is his father, who filed claim for pension as dependent father December 31, 1877, which was rejected August 19, 1879, 'on the ground that claimant was not dependent on the soldier, as he has supported himself by the income from his occupation since prior to the soldier's death.'

"Claimant is shown by the record to have been a very poor man ever since prior to the enlistment of his son, and never at any time since his son's enlistment to have owned more than $250 in property or other things; that he was dependent on his son for support at enlistment, and that his said son did contribute to his father's support prior to enlistment and during his service in the Army. The father is also shown to have been a cripple and unable to perform manual labor since 1864, and is now more than sixty-five years old and in very destitute circumstances, and would doubtless have been driven to seeking aid from charity but for the fact that on account of his high character as a man and the esteem in which he was held by the city authorities of Louisville, Ky., he was given a position on the police force of that city, by which he has been able to make for himself a bare support. He is now old and badly afflicted, and your committee think it is the duty of Congress to place his name on the pension-roll.

"Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill."

"SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt from your office of application for pension No. 234784, and to return it herewith, with such information as is furnished by the files of this office. It appears from the rolls on file in this office that George W. Tiller was enrolled on the 8th day of October, 1861, at Louisville, Ky., in Company A, Twenty-eighth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteers, to serve three years, or during the war, and mustered into service as a private on the 10th day of October, 1861, at Louisville, Ky., in Company A, Twenty-eighth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers, to serve three years or during the war. On the muster-roll of Company A of that regiment, to August 31, 1863. He is reported present September and October, 1863. Private deserted September 20, 1863. Name not borne on subsequent rolls to April 30, 1865; May and June, 1865. Dropped as a deserter on muster and pay-rolls of October, 1863. Received official notice of his dying in prison at Andersonville, Ga., July 21, 1864. Muster-out roll of company makes similar report.

"Prisoner of war records show George W. Tillar, or Tiller, said company and regiment, admitted to hospital at Andersonville, Ga., July 21, 1864, and died same day of 'diarrhea;' capture not given. "William E. Benson, a resident of the county and State aforesaid, being duly sworn according to law, upon his oath declares that he is the identical W. E. Benson who was a captain of Company A, Twenty-eighth Regiment Kentucky Infantry Volunteers, and that George W. Tiller was a private of the aforesaid organization, and that on or about the 1st day of December, 1863, the said George W. Tiller, while in the line and discharge of duty, was captured by Wheeler's rebel cavalry, at Whiteside Station, Tennessee, and died in prison at Andersonville, Ga. Affiant has not a personal knowledge of the capture, but was so informed at the time by reliable persons, and has no doubt of the fact of the capture and death of said soldier. There is no commissioned officer who can testify from personal knowledge of the capture of said George W. Tiller, as no commissioned officer was with him at the time.

"Affiant was sent with his company to guard a wagon-train from Stevenson, Ala., to Point Rock, near Huntsville, Ala., and it was during his absence that George W. Tiller was captured. Said Tiller was left in camp and did not accompany him to Point Rock. He was legally excused from going, but he can not now remember the cause of his remaining behind. Affiant has a knowledge that George W. Tiller sent money to his father twice by Lieut. John A. Weatherford, of said Company A, Twenty-eighth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers, and he was a dutiful son to his father and a good soldier. Affiant learned when he came back from Point Rock that said Tiller was sent out on some duty when he was captured, but he does not now know what duty.

Weatherford, aged forty-eight years, a resident of the city of Louisville, in the State of Kentucky, who, being by me duly sworn according to law, on oath declares that he was formerly second lieutenant of Company A, Twenty-eighth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, that he was well and intimately acquainted with Carter W. Tiller, father of George W. Tiller, deceased, late private Company A, Twenty-eighth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry. Said George W. Tiller was captured near Stevenson, Ala., and died while a prisoner of war at Andersonville prison, Georgia, on or about July 21, 1864. That said George W. Tiller was in the habit of sending most of his pay home to his father, Carter W. Tiller, while he was in service. He sent twice by this affiant, $50 each time, and probably oftener, but he sent home to his father by this affiant as much as $100. Said George W. "DEAR SIR: Responding to your inquiry of this day in regard to Carter W. Tiller, whose bill for pension has recently passed the House, I desire to say that I have been personally acquainted with Mr. Tiller for twenty years. He is recognized by our citizens generally as a man of probity, good demeanor, industrious, and worthy in every respect. He was for may years on the police force of Louisville, Ky., acting as a detective, and although quite aged, was retained there because of his valuable services in the past.

"As far as I know, and I think I am competent to speak advisedly of the fact, his reputation is beyond reproach both as a man and an officer. The municipal administration at Louisville was changed on January 1, 1885, and immediately thereafter Mr. Tiller's services were dispensed with. Since that time my information (which I deem perfectly reliable) is that he has had no occupation whatever, but has been supported by benevolent organizations of the city.

"I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"THOMAS WARD,
"Assistant Adjutant-General.

"Hon. W. P. TAULBEE,
"House of Representatives, Washington, D. C."

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, this bill has had its day before in this House. It was passed in the last Congress and vetoed by the President, and it was attempted to be passed over the veto, but failed. I believed then that it was right and believe yet that it is right, but at the same time I want to say that I have opposed the passage of the bill in this Congress because I think it is calculated to impede the passage of other bills; not that I have changed my opinion about it, but perhaps because the opinion of one whose opinion is of much more importance than mine may not have been changed. For that reason I opposed the bill in committee, and for the same reason I oppose it now; not, I repeat, that I believe it is not a meritorious bill, but that possibly its passage is calculated to impede other pension legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. What request does the gentleman from Indiana make?

Mr. MATSON. I have no request to make. I only desired to state what I have said.

Mr. CARUTH. Mr. Chairman—— [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Well, if this is all right I do not want to make any remarks.

Mr. WALKER. I shall demand a quorum on that bill, and I am not willing that it should go over until to-morrow even.

Mr. CARUTH. I trust the gentleman will not make that demand. It is known to every member of the House of Representatives that this night is set apart for the consideration of pension bills, and it is as much the duty of a Representative to be present on Friday nights and attend to the business of his constituents as to be here at any other time. They have full notice from these calendars that these measures are to be taken up for consideration. Here is the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions who has on three several occasions investigated the claim and says he knows it is just, and the only objection urged against it is that there is an apprehension somewhere that there may be a Presidential veto.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CARUTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. As I understand it, additional and new evidence was furnished?

Mr. CARUTH. Yes, sir; there was additional and new evidence.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. That ought to be satisfactory.

Mr. WALKER. I did not see any such evidence in the committee.

Mr. CARUTH. If the gentleman did not see that evidence it was because he did not examine the papers in that particular case. I know there are very many claims before that committee, and if the gentleman, who is a member of the committee, takes care of Missouri it is as much as he can do. Kentucky can take care of her own interests by her Representative there.

I trust the gentleman from Missouri, after this claim has been thrice considered by the Committee on Invalid Pensions and thrice favorably reported, will not throw any obstacle in the way of the passage of the bill, which only carries $8 a month.

A MEMBER. How much back pay?

Mr. CARUTH. Not a dollar.

Mr. WALKER. I desire to state——

Mr. SHERMAN. I rise to a question of order. This bill, as I understand, has already been ordered to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order of the gentleman from New York must be overruled, because it is not in harmony with the facts.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understood the Chairman so to state.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WALKER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. If the gentleman from Missouri will yield to me for a moment I wish to say that I understood from the report that some additional proof was presented to the committee. I would like the chairman of the committee to state whether the additional proof confirms the judgment he formed in the last Congress.

Mr. MATSON. I will state for the information of the House and the gentleman from Vermont that the proof furnished, so far as I recollect—and I am pretty clear about it—was proof that was filed here and considered in the House after the President vetoed that bill. But this proof was before the House when the attempt was made to pass the bill over the veto.

Mr. CARUTH. And there was a majority by a yea-and-nay vote in passing the bill over the veto.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Was that proof submitted to the President?

Mr. MATSON. I believe not. I am familiar with the facts in this case, which occupied more of the time of the House than any other vetoed bill. It was at the President's instance that the Commissioner of Pensions sent a special commissioner to hunt up all the witnesses to determine the two questions, first, of the dependence of the father, and, second, whether the son was in the line of duty when taken prisoner and carried to Andersonville prison where he died. The judgment of the commissioner was against the claimant on the latter point. His finding of facts after a thorough investigation was that the son was not in the line of duty, but was absent at a station in Alabama without orders or permission, and that he was taken prisoner when not in the line of duty.

Mr. CARUTH. The record in the case shows that the man was captured, and his whereabouts being unknown, he was marked on the rolls as a deserter for some time; the fact being that he was made a prisoner, taken to Andersonville prison, and died of small-pox there some little time afterwards. It was under those circumstances that his name was entered on the rolls as a deserter; but that entry was removed when it was found that he had been captured.

Mr. WALKER. I believe I have the floor. I will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that I do not desire to defeat the will of the majority of this House. I simply want a quorum to vote on this case. If a majority of a quorum shall vote to pass the bill I will be satisfied. I also want a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. CARUTH. The gentleman from Missouri, as I have said, is a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. This report is made by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and the gentleman has never filed a minority report.

Mr. MATSON. He is not obliged to do so.

Mr. PERKINS. As I understand the gentleman from Missouri, he is willing the case shall go over to be voted on in a full House.

Mr. WALKER. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. Then let it take that course.

Mr. CARUTH. I do not see why this case should be treated differently from any other case.

Mr. PERKINS. We have done this repeatedly when a member desired it.

Mr. CARUTH. If we do this in one case why not in all?

Mr. MATSON. There is a good reason why this case should not be insisted on. It has had its day in court.

Mr. CARUTH. Yet you say it is a good claim.

Mr. MATSON. It has had a trial and the jury has decided against it.

Mr. CARUTH. The jury has not so decided; because when the case came up in the House on the question of passing the bill over the President's veto it received a majority of votes in its favor, although not the necessary two-thirds.

Mr. WARNER. As I understand it the verdict of the jury was in favor of the claim, but the judge set aside the verdict.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Is it not true that a new trial has been ordered and we have got a new jury? Try the case again and give the man a chance.

Mr. CARUTH. And we have additional testimony to put before the jury.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I think it is a scandal to the American people that a case of this kind should not be disposed of promptly, and disposed of in favor of the soldier, or rather of his heirs.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARUTH]?

Mr. CARUTH. I want to pass the bill. That is my proposition. [Laughter.] I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. CARUTH, and the Chairman declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WALKER. I call for a division.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 32, noes 4.

Mr. WALKER. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint to act as tellers the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. WALKER, and the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. CARUTH.

Several MEMBERS (to Mr. CARUTH). Withdraw the bill.

Mr. CARUTH. I do not want to withdraw it. I want to have a vote upon this man's bill.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a suggestion.

A MEMBER. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is called for. The Chair has appointed to act as tellers the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. WALKER, and the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. CARUTH.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a suggestion. There is evidently no quorum here this evening, and therefore why waste time that ought to be devoted to business? If gentlemen are determined to persist in their opposition to this bill, I respectfully suggest to my friend from Kentucky [Mr. CARUTH] that the most prudent and the wisest and the fairest thing for him to do for the benefit of this claimant and of the members who are here this evening is to let the bill be laid aside for the present.

Mr. CARUTH. I am willing to have it laid aside to be reported favorably to the full House at any particular time that may be fixed, the previous question being ordered and fifteen minutes being allowed for discussion on each side.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky? What time does he propose?

Mr. WALKER. Monday or Friday next would suit me.

Mr. CARUTH. I do not know when it can come up, with this tariff discussion occupying the whole time of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to hear some suggestion. This debate is out of order.

Mr. WALKER. I suggest Monday next.

Mr. CARUTH. For what date was the case of the gentleman from New York fixed?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will accept a suggestion, two other cases have been laid over until May 28, and the Chair would suggest that this one also might go over to that day.

Mr. CARUTH. I am willing to have the bill go over until that time upon the conditions I have named.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARUTH] asks unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered on this bill, and that its further consideration be postponed until May 28, immediately after the other two cases the consideration of which has been fixed for that day, fifteen minutes to be allowed on each side for debate.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

JAMES R. PORTER.

Mr. WILLIAMS, by unanimous consent, called up the bill (H. R. 6552) to increase the pension of James R. Porter.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James R. Porter, late colonel of the One hundred and thirty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. YODER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6552) granting an increased pension to Col. James R. Porter, respectfully report:

That the committee have carefully considered this case and the evidence. It appears that the petitioner served in the late war of 1861–'65 as lieutenant-colonel of the Eleventh Pennsylvania Reserve Corps, as colonel of the Fifty-seventh and as colonel of the One hundred and thirty-fifth Regiments of Pennsylvania Volunteers, and also commanded for awhile the First Brigade, Third Division, First Army Corps.

While in command of the One hundred and thirty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, on the 6th day of May, 1863, on the return of the Army from Chancellorsville, Va., he received injuries by the fall of his horse, while in the line of duty, which now affect his whole system internally, so as to create permanent soreness requiring artificial means to cause a discharge from his bowels, which has resulted successively in piles, fistula, and a painful, incurable hernia.

Colonel Porter is in poor circumstances, about sixty-three years of age, and has a wife and one child, and on account of his indigent circumstances and increasing disability has been compelled to ask admittance into the National Military Asylum near Dayton, Ohio; and from the testimony of James Hamilton, who has been detailed to wait upon him, and from other witnesses who are in the same ward with him, and from medical examination in 1884 by the examining surgeon, we find that Colonel Porter can neither dress nor undress without assistance, and that he can not arise from his bed without assistance.

From the report of the examining surgeon we learn that he is afflicted with "right scrotal hernia, only partially controlled by truss," and for which he receives a pension of $30 per month. He is deaf in his right ear, complains of pain in head, right side, shoulder, body, and leg, and that he is evidently suffering from disease of the spine, which, combined with hernia, render him totally disabled for mental and manual labor.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM LEMONS.

Mr. GLASS, by unanimous consent, called up the bill (H. R. 2928) granting a pension to William Lemons.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Lemons, late a drummer in the war of 1812, in Captain Owen's company, Colonel Lauderdale's regiment, of Tennessee.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. BAKER, of New York (before the conclusion of the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the report in this case be dispensed with.

Mr. BYNUM. I object.

The report was read in full, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2928) granting a pension to William Lemons, having examined the same, submit the following report:

William Lemons, a colored man, now nearly ninety years of age, formerly a slave, removed with his master, John Lemons, from North Carolina to Williamson County, Tennessee, early in the present century. When about sixteen years old he was hired to Capt. Glen Owens, who carried him as a servant on a six months' campaign against the Indians, with the troops under General Andrew Jackson, and was present at the battles of Talladega, Horse Shoe, and Hickory Flats. On returning home he was made a drummer and returned to the Army with Captain Owens. William Lemons was then valued at $475, at Clover Bottom, Tenn., to be paid to his master, in the event the former should be killed. He then marched with his company to Fayetteville, Ala., where he joined the regiment of which James Lauderdale was lieutenant-colonel. The drum-major of the regiment having been killed at Fort Mimms, William Lemons was made drum-major and served in that capacity to the end of the campaign.

He marched with the regiment to Pensacola, and thence to Mobile, and thence to New Orleans. He participated in the engagement with the British near New Orleans on the 23d day of December, 1814, where he was shot through the right leg and was slightly wounded in the left temple. He saw Colonel Lauderdale killed. He was then sent to the hospital in New Orleans, and in a short time became convalescent and was an eye-witness to the battle of New Orleans, January 8, 1815. These facts are based upon the sworn testimony of the claimant, who bears an irreproachable character. He is now very old and dependent, and only asks for the small amount of $8 per month.

Your committee is satisfied that William Lemons has made a truthful statement, and recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment: Strike out all of said bill after the word "twelve," in line 7.

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Pensions was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to enter my protest against cases being taken up out of their order, and I want to state my reasons. There are on this Calendar cases which could be reached to-night in the regular order, among them bills introduced by Senators from the State of Wisconsin. There are ten cases upon which I have made reports, and there is not a single member present to-night from Wisconsin to take any interest in those cases or to call them up.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SAWYER] is a member of the committee, and is stating his reasons for the suggestion which he desires to make.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is nothing before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will indulge the gentleman.

Mr. SAWYER. I move to strike out the last word, or the first word, or some word, in order that I may have a chance to state my reasons. I am anxious that those cases shall be taken up in order, so that the Senators may not have an opportunity of doing what I know some members of that body are doing, objecting to the manner in which we do this business here, neglecting the bills which come from the Senate and failing to take them up in their regular order.

Members of the House, when bills have passed here, ask favors of members of the Senate in regard to having their bills taken up in that body; but we can not very well go to Senators and ask them to have our bills taken up if we refuse to consider their bills here in regular order.

Again, I have on this calendar a case which would have been reached to-night if we had proceeded in regular order; but if I must start on the run from that door to reach the Speaker's desk, in order to get ahead of other members and get my name placed on some list, I shall never be able to get a bill through this House. All I ask is that my bills shall come up in their order and be considered on their merits; but I am not willing to enter into a scramble——

Mr. CARUTH. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to call up his bill.

Mr. SAWYER. No, sir; I do not ask any favor.

Mr. CARUTH. But I want to give it to you.

Mr. SAWYER. I place myself on my right as a member of the House to have my bills considered in their order upon the Calendar. I know of more members than one who, by reason of superior agility in getting their names on the list, are enabled to have two of their bills put through where other members, depending upon the regular order, can not secure the passage of one. For this reason I object to the present proceeding.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that in no instance has the Chair deviated a hair's breadth from his list——

Mr. SAWYER. I want to be understood as not impugning in the least degree the fairness and good feeling of the Chair; no one has a higher opinion of the present occupant of the chair than I have. But my point is that a member, in order to get his name on the list, has to join in a rush or scramble; and the man who gets his name first on the list to-night can be the first on the list next Friday night; and so night after night may secure the consideration of his bills, while another member who has introduced his bills in good season, has secured early reports upon them, and had them upon the Calendar, may be compelled to see them remain there for months. Unless he has the agility to secure the placing of his name on the Chairman's list, he stands no chance of getting his bills passed.

SMITH V. CAMPBELL.

Mr. WARNER. I call up the bill (H. R. 5429) to place the name of Smith V. Campbell on the pension-roll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, instructed to place the name of Smith V. Campbell, late assistant surgeon of Twenty-third Iowa Volunteer Infantry, on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws of the United States.

The report (by Mr. WALKER) was read, as follows:

Smith V. Campbell was mustered into the service as assistant surgeon Twenty-third Regiment Iowa Volunteers, and discharged upon tender of resignation, based upon disability, July 26, 1863.

He applied for pension on account of varicocele of both sides, caused by being thrown against the pommel of the saddle while traveling under orders, near Arcadia, Mo. The claim has been rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that there is no record and no reliable medical or other evidence showing the existence of the alleged disability while in service. This action was had after an exhaustive special examination.

The medical certificate for discharge mentions chronic diarrhea of three months' standing only.

The testimony obtained by special examiners is very voluminous, and, as is usually the case, somewhat conflicting as to time and place of the incurrence of the disability. It is claimed, and the testimony obtained sustains the allegation, that Campbell received two injuries to that part of the body, the first while he was en route from Patterson to Arcadia, Mo.; the second, and more serious one, some days later, while on the march near Current River, Missouri.

William Merrill, late a lieutenant in claimant's regiment, and who is reported by the special examiner as of excellent reputation, testifies that—

"While the regiment was stationed at Patterson, Mo., during the early part of the service, claimant and Colonel Kinsman went to Arcadia to inspect the hospital at that place. The colonel came back alone and said that claimant had injured his privates and staid at Arcadia. Several days after that, while on the march in the neighborhood of Current River, deponent heard that claimant had again been injured, and such was the general talk in the regiment."

Colonel Glasgow, of good repute, testifies that while in the vicinity of Current River it was reported to him that claimant had been injured by a fall from his horse. Claimant complained after that some, and during the Vicksburg campaign became unserviceable because of the injury received as above stated.

Dr. Henry Owens, of good repute, late hospital steward of the regiment, and who from his admission was not on the most friendly terms with claimant during their service, testifies in the most positive terms to claimant's alleged injury; and while he is not altogether positive as to the exact place, states that he was present and attended claimant for two or three days, when he went to St. Louis and remained absent from the command for some time. The record confirms the latter statement, as he is shown absent with leave from January 12 to February 15, 1863.

Surgeon Edwin May, upon whose certificate claimant based his resignation, admits that he did not strip him at the time of the examination. Found him suffering from chronic diarrhea, which required a change of climate, and was sufficient ground for resignation.

There is no question as to prior soundness, and again it is shown beyond a doubt that upon return home and resumption of his profession he was compelled to use a buggy instead of going horseback, as was his custom before entering the service.

It is a well-known fact that injuries of this character are not susceptible of such positive proof as is the case in gunshot wounds, in particular if the subject is a surgeon or physician, who can administer to himself instead of calling upon others for relief. But, notwithstanding the apparent discrepancies in the testimony and the negative statements of others, who, in the opinion of the special examiners, should have been in position to know positively whether claimant was injured or not in the service, your committee are of opinion that the evidence in the case points too strongly to the incurrence of the alleged disability in service and line of duty to ignore the claimant's request for relief, and therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill, and ask that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LINNÆUS W. RISLEY.

Mr. NEAL. I call up the bill (H. R. 1074) granting a pension to Linnæus W. Risley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Linnæus W. Risley, late of Company D, Eighteenth Indiana Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

A bill for the relief of Linnæus W. Risley was before the Forty-ninth Congress, and a very full report made by Mr. TAULBEE, which was adopted by the committee. (See Report No. 2975, first session Forty-ninth Congress.) The report is as follows, which the committee adopt as its own, and recommend the passage of the bill:

"Claimant enlisted June 14, 1861, and was discharged January 21, 1863.

"Claimant alleges that August 19, 1862, he fell from the third story of hospital No. 1, at New Albany, Ind., where he had been confined sick. Said fall caused concussion, which resulted in vertigo and insanity. Also, while drilling State militia at Lawrenceburgh, Ind., August 28, 1862, he accidentally discharged a shotgun which he had in his hand, wounding himself in left foot. He was serving under orders of Colonel Spooner.

"Claim was rejected on the ground that said wound was not received in line of duty, and of no record in the War Department of alleged injury resulting in vertigo, and his inability to furnish satisfactory testimony showing origin of said injury in the service and line of duty.

"The records of the War Department do not show cause of detail.

"Certificate of disability shows him wounded in right foot while handling a shotgun.

"Surgeon Carpenter, of the United States medical director's office, Cincinnati, Ohio, who signed the certificate of disability, states in said certificate that claimant did not receive said wound in line of duty. Upon what grounds he bases this statement is not shown. It is fair to presume that it was not from personal knowledge, as he was a hospital surgeon at Cincinnati, Ohio, when claimant was brought to him.

"Martha M. Soper testifies that claimant shot himself in left foot while under an attack of hallucination, and she and Dr. Harding took claimant to hospital in Cincinnati, Ohio.

"Dr. Harding testifies that he treated claimant for vertigo in January, 1863, when claimant told him it was caused by a fall from a window of a hospital at New Albany, Ind.

"The report of the Surgeon-General, United States Army, shows him sick in hospital No. 1, New Albany, Ind., from August 18, 1862, to September 4, 1862.

"Captain Hutchison, late of Company D, Eighteenth Indiana Volunteers, in his affidavit of claimant's disability, says that claimant fell from the third story of hospital No. 1, at New Albany, Ind., the concussion of the fall causing insanity, which affected him until he was discharged. He further states that claimant was a brave soldier, and often led the skirmish, and that said fall was the cause of his affliction. Claimant states he was ordered to drill the State militia when he was wounded. If he was he ought to be considered in line of duty. He was not with his company any more after he was sent to the hospital at New Albany, Ind.

"There is nothing adverse to the merits of the claim except the statement of Surgeon Carpenter, and he locates the wound as being on right foot, while the hospital record testimony and medical examination show that it was the left foot. There may be a doubt as whether the wound was received in line of duty, but taking into consideration the circumstances of the case, your committee are of the opinion that the doubt should be given in favor of claimant, and therefore recommend the bill do pass."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES W. POAG.

Mr. HUNTER. I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 9170) granting a pension to James W. Poag.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James W. Poag, late private Company M, Seventeenth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

It appears from the records of the War Department that claimant was enrolled and mustered into the United States service at Louisville, Ky., on the 14th day of February, 1865, as a sergeant of Company M, Seventeenth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, to serve one year, and was mustered out of the service at Louisville, Ky., with his command on the 29th day of September, 1865.

He filed an application for pension on the 4th day of September, 1866, and alleged in his declaration that on or about May 2, 1865, at Russellville, Ky., he was ordered by Lieut. William H. Roark, who had command of the post, to take a detachment of soldiers and disperse a crowd of drunken men who were threatening to destroy Government property, and that while executing this order he was shot in the right thigh by the accidental discharge of his own revolver.

In support of this allegation, claimant filed an affidavit from Lieut. William H. Roark, of Livermore, Ky., the officer referred to, who testified as follows:

"That on May 2, 1865, he was in command of the post at Russellville, Ky., and ordered claimant to take a detachment of soldiers and disperse a band of drunken rioters who were threatening the Government property in said post; and that while executing this order claimant was shot in the right thigh by the accidental discharge of a pistol. He was placed in the Gray Hotel, at Russellville, Ky., where affiant often visited him. Affiant knows that he was there treated for several weeks for pistol-shot wound in right thigh by Dr. William Randolph, regimental surgeon."

The Pension Office addressed an official letter of inquiry to Lieut. William H. Roark, and received the following reply:

"I was an eye-witness to the receipt of claimant's wound, on May 2, 1865, at Russellville, Ky. At that time Russellville was considered headquarters of our regiment, and Col. Samuel F. Johnson was usually present and in command, but frequently absent for a few days at a time. My recollection is that Colonel Johnson was absent at Louisville at the time of Poag's being accidentally shot in the thigh. The principal part of the regiment was absent on scouts and at different posts in the State, and that I was applied to for assistance in dispersing some drunken and rioting citizens who seemed beyond the control of the civil authorities. Hence the reason for the order to Sergeant Poag. I was, at the time of the accidental shot, standing at the window of the hotel, then known as Gray's Hotel, about 100 paces from Poag and the rioters, and saw Poag when the pistol fired."

Noah Vincent and William Hart, of Greenville, Ky., late comrades of claimant, testify as follows:

"That they were ordered by Lieutenant Roark to go with claimant on May 2, 1865, and help arrest and disperse the drunken men referred to, and while executing the order claimant was wounded by the accidental discharge of a pistol."

John Lee, of Greenville, Ky., late comrade of claimant, testifies as follows:

"That on May 2, 1865, claimant was accidentally shot by a pistol in his own hand while executing an order of Lieutenant Roark. Affiant was in regimental hospital at the time, and was standing in the door of the hospital, within 10 feet of the claimant, and saw him fall to the ground when shot. Furnished a handkerchief to tie up the wound, and saw it dressed. It was in right thigh."

David M. Martin, of Paradise, Ky., late comrade of claimant, testifies:

"That he was present at the date and place above set forth, when claimant was trying to arrest the drunken men heretofore mentioned, as ordered by Lieutenant Roark, and saw him wounded in the right thigh by the accidental discharge of a pistol in his own hands; also saw him taken from the street when the accident occurred, and carried to a hotel, where he was treated by Dr. Randolph."

Dr. T. H. Moore, United States examining surgeon at Madisonville, Hopkins County, Kentucky, made an official examination of claimant on the 2d day of December, 1880, and states:

"Applicant has a pistol-shot wound of the right thigh. The ball entered in front of middle of thigh, the direction being downward. The ball still remains in the limb, having gravitated to a position just below the inner side of knee-joint, in which position it can be felt, etc."

Dr. James A. Young, United States examining surgeon at Hopkinsville, Christian County, Kentucky, made an official examination of claimant on the 16th day of May, 1881, and states:

"The wound is located on upper third of thigh. The cicatrix is located 2 inches below apex of Scarpa's triangle. The ball lies in popliteal space, behind inner tuberosity of femur."

Dr. Ree Mann, of Greenville, Ky., testifies:

"That ever since his discharge claimant has been in feeble health, on account of wound in right thigh and rheumatism. Affiant has treated him for rheumatism of the knee, caused by said wound. He was in good health when he enlisted."

Notwithstanding the strong proof above cited, and which is a very small portion of the evidence on file in support of the case, the claim was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that claimant did not receive the wound in line of duty.

Your committee is decidedly of the opinion that this is a meritorious claim. They therefore make this favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DAVID GIBBONS.

Mr. MATSON. I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 5756) granting a pension to David Gibbons.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of David Gibbons, late a private in Company D, One hundred and forty-seventh Regiment Illinois Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

Claimant was a private in Company D, One hundred and forty-seventh Regiment Illinois Volunteers, enlisting February 9, 1865, and was discharged January 20, 1866, by reason of expiration of service.

He filed his claim for pension May 10, 1882, alleging left inguinal hernia incurred in the service and line of duty at Savannah, Ga., January 1, 1866, from falling into a ditch while carrying tent-poles. The claim was rejected on the ground that there is no record and claimant having failed to establish incurrence of alleged disability while in service and line of duty.

Your committee having sifted the great amount of evidence in this case can not help but reach the conclusion that a great injustice has been done this soldier in the rejection of his claim at the Pension Office. The only question involved is whether he received the injury he alleges in the service and in the line of his duty. The papers on file disclose that several witnesses, near neighbors of claimant, testify to his prior soundness; that he was a healthy, able-bodied man when he enlisted, and his family physician, Dr. James C. Wells, who attended the family from 1859 to 1867, testifies he was sound and free from hernia when he entered the Army. There is no question as to prior soundness.

In support of the claimant's allegation as to the incurrence of hernia in service, David H. Lawrence testifies that he was present when claimant was ruptured at Savannah, Ga. Said claimant was out getting timber or poles to stretch his tent, and while jumping a ditch then and there was ruptured from getting a fall. He heard claimant complain of said rupture immediately, and he continued to complain of it at all times when they were in the Army together.

John Nagle and Benjamin Alberson testify that when claimant was on his way with his regiment to Springfield, Ill., to be mustered out, they saw him and he then showed them his rupture at the city of Indianapolis. Other testimony corroborates the above statement as to the existence of hernia immediately after discharge, and shows its continuance up to the present time. The medical board on October 18, 1882, examined the claimant and gave him a rating of one-half total for hernia.

The claim was referred to the special examination division to determine origin in service and line of duty. The witnesses, all of whom were certified to as of good reputation, testify to his soundness prior to his service. Eight of his comrades, who were present at the time and place where the injury was supposed to have occurred, testify they have no recollection of claimant's receiving any rupture at that time. Other witnesses, who knew claimant subsequent to the war, testify that they had no knowledge of the existence of the disability, and the claim was recommended for rejection on the ground that the claimant had failed to establish origin of hernia as due to his army service.

Your committee must dissent from the conclusions of the Pension Office. The proof is conclusive as to claimant's prior soundness, and the testimony of the claimant and David H. Lawrence establishes the incurrence of the hernia while in the service and in the line of duty. The proof shows it existed at the time of his discharge and continues to the present, while several of his comrades testify they have no recollection of claimant's having incurred the disability as he alleges, yet there is no testimony that the injury might not have occurred as he testifies that it did.

Your committee are clearly of the opinion that the claim is a just and meritorious one, and therefore report favorably and recommend the passage of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this bill will be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BELDEN. On that question I call for a division.

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 35, noes none.

So the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALBERT E. MAGOFFIN.

Mr. PETERS. I call up the bill (H. R. 9486) to increase the pension of Albert E. Magoffin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to increase the pension of Albert E. Magoffin, late a member of the Eighty-ninth Ohio Veteran Volunteer Infantry, on the pension-roll, to $36 per month, the same to be in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

That said applicant a number of years ago made application for a pension, setting forth as his disabilities chronic diarrhea and an injury to his ankle. He was granted a pension of $2 per month on the former disability, but the application was rejected as to the latter because the injury to the ankle existed at the time of his enlistment. The applicant himself stated to the Department that prior to his enlistment he strained his ankle while playing a game of ball. The evidence, however, shows that he enlisted on the 31st of July, 1862, in Company H, Eighty-ninth Ohio Volunteer Infantry; that he was thoroughly examined and found sound at date of enlistment; that he served with his company from the date of his enlistment until October, 1863, when he was discharged on account of general disability; that in April, 1863, on a forced march in Tennessee his ankle was severely sprained; that within a year after the injury it broke into a running sore and has been in that condition ever since, many times covering a surface of the leg equal to 4 inches in length; that he is compelled to go upon crutches part of the time.

The evidence further shows that from the time of enlistment until April, 1863, when the injury was received, his regiment was almost constantly on the march and that the applicant was with it on these marches. The fact of this long service during that period of the war, and that his regiment did a great deal of marching, is borne out by the history of the regiment, as well as by evidence in the case, and this is, in the minds of the committee, a conclusive proof that at the time of enlistment and up to the date of receiving the injury complained of the applicant's ankle must have been in good condition or else he could not have performed the service which the records of the company show him to have performed. If the ankle was seriously weakened by the sprain it received prior to enlistment it is hardly reasonable to suppose that the applicant would have been able to march at least 1,500 miles before it gave way. But even conceding that the ankle was weakened by the sprain received prior to enlistment, yet your committee think, as the hard marching necessarily tended to increase that weakness and did finally produce a running sore, which, in all probability, would not have been the result of the sprain had it not been for the severe army service, it is but right that applicant should receive a pension for this disability.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment: Strike out all after the words "pension-roll," in line 6, and insert the words "so as to include injury to leg as set forth in original application."

The amendment of the committee to strike out all after the word "pension-roll," in line 6, and insert the words "so as to include injury to leg as set forth in original application," was agreed to.

Mr. MATSON. It is questionable whether that bill in its present terms would not carry arrears. My impression is that, fairly interpreted, it would give this man arrears of pension, contrary to the well-fixed and thoroughly-determined policy of Congress.

Mr. PETERS. That was not the intention.

Mr. MATSON. I move to amend the bill by adding the words "said increase of pension to begin from and after the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DOUGLAS CHAPMAN.

Mr. McRAE. I call up the bill (H. R. 4735) for the relief of Douglas Chapman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Douglas Chapman, of Hot Springs County, Arkansas, and late a private in Captain Wheeler's company (H) of the Third Regiment Infantry, United States Army, in the Seminole war of 1837, and that he be rated and receive such pension as is provided by the laws of the United States for persons engaged in the military service of the United States in the war of 1812.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4735) for the relief of Douglas Chapman, would report as follows:

The records show that Douglas Chapman was enlisted as a private in Capt. Otis Wheeler's company (H), Third United States Infantry, February 24, 1837, for three years; was promoted corporal July 26, 1839, and was discharged the service February 24, 1840, at Fort Smith, Ark., by reason of expiration of term of service. He is now aged seventy-two years, and is in needy circumstances.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There was no objection, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELLEN ST. CYR.

Mr. NELSON. I call up the bill (H. R. 2535) granting a pension to Ellen St. Cyr.

The bill was read, as follows

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension law, the name of Ellen St. Cyr, widow of Abner St. Cyr, late a first lieutenant in Company H of the Fourth Regiment of Maine Volunteers, and to pay her a pension from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2535) granting a pension to Ellen St. Cyr, submit the following report:

The claimant in this case is the widow of Lieut. Abner St. Cyr, of Company G, Fourth Regiment of Minnesota Volunteers. Lieutenant St. Cyr was seriously crippled and lamed by a gunshot wound received in the leg while in the service in the late war for which at the time of his death he was receiving a pension of $17 per month.

On the 14th of April, 1886, St. Cyr was keeping a billiard hall near the center of the little village of Sauk Rapids, Minn., while his residence was a quarter of a mile away therefrom in the suburbs of the village. On this day a cyclone of an extraordinary character passed over and through the center of the village, leveling and destroying everything in its wake. The billiard hall of St. Cyr was completely wrecked, while his residence in the suburbs was unharmed. The approach of the cyclone was observed by St. Cyr and one Waltman, who was then with him. Both at once started in the direction of St. Cyr's residence to escape. Waltman being a sound man and in good health was able to and did effect his escape uninjured from the storm center, but St. Cyr, owing to the lame and crippled condition of his wounded leg, was able to make but slow progress, and in consequence was overtaken by the cyclone and so severely injured thereby that he died from his injuries the next day.

From the experience of Waltman it is evident that had St. Cyr not been crippled and lame, he could have effected his escape as Waltman did. While the cyclone was the immediate cause of death, that cause could have in this instance evidently been avoided had St. Cyr been in a sound condition.

These facts are all matters of common and well-known repute at Sauk Rapids, and are duly and fully verified by the affidavits of said Waltman and C. T. Carpenter, clerk of the district court, laid before your committee.

St. Cyr left a widow and six minor children in very destitute circumstances.

The bill should be amended in line 7 of the printed copy by striking out the letter "H" and inserting the letter "G," and by striking out the word "Maine" and inserting the word "Minnesota," and your committee recommend that when so amended the bill do pass.

The amendments of the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SAMUEL M'CLURE.

Mr. McCREARY. I call up the bill (H. R. 354) granting a pension to Samuel McClure.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of Samuel McClure, late a private in Company B, Twelfth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry.

Mr. MATSON. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 354) granting a pension to Samuel McClure, respectfully report:

Samuel McClure, private in Company B, Twelfth Regiment Kentucky Infantry Volunteers, was enrolled on the 12th day of October, 1861, in Pulaski County, Kentucky.

In January, 1862, he contracted fever, and after remaining in the hospital for about three weeks was taken home to Pulaski County, Kentucky, where he remained nearly four months, and on his return to his regiment was unable to perform duty—went on crutches for a long time, and was finally discharged.

After remaining at home for some months he re-enlisted as a veteran on the 1st day of January, 1864, and was made a corporal.

On February 20, 1865, at or near Wilmington, N. C., while the regiment was in action at Town Creek, N. C., he was wounded by a shell in the left hip, and was unable to perform service as a soldier up to July 11, 1865, when he was mustered out of the service.

His neighbors and comrades attest his good health and soundness prior to his enlistment. They also prove that he had a severe case of fever, which resulted in his discharge from the Army, and that he subsequently re-enlisted, and was wounded by a piece of a shell when the regiment was in action at Town Creek, near Wilmington, N. C.

Two physicians, Dr. J. J. Brown and Dr. W. H. Bentley, attest his suffering from lumbago and spinal irritation, and a number of witnesses state that he is not able now to perform half as much labor as when he enlisted.

The Adjutant-General's report on the military record of Samuel McClure corroborates the statements herein made.

Your committee believe that a continuous disability from the attack of fever and the shell wound is shown by the testimony and supported by the Adjutant-General's report, and they believe this is a meritorious case and recommend that the bill do pass, with the following amendment: After the word "Infantry," in seventh line, add "and grant him a pension of $8 per month."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SALLY B. WILSON.

Mr. WADE. I call up the bill (H. R. 6583) granting a pension to Sally B. Wilson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sally B. Wilson, wife of Franklin Wilson, late a private in Company B, Seventy-second Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia.

The report (by Mr. WALKER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6583) granting a pension to Sally B. Wilson, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

Sally B. Wilson is the widow of Franklin Wilson, who was mortally wounded while engaged in a battle with rebel guerrillas about November 17, 1863, and died from the effects of said wounds March 25, 1864, as shown by the affidavit of Thomas Frazier, who says:

"On the night of November 17, 1863, he went with his wagon and hauled Franklin Wilson from the battle-field to his home, where he lingered till March, 1864, when he died from the wounds received November 17, 1863. He was badly wounded in the thigh and shoulder."

The certificate of the adjutant-general of Missouri shows that the said Franklin Wilson was duly enrolled as a private in Company B, Seventy-second Enrolled Missouri Militia, July 30, 1862, and served two hundred and twelve days.

Special Order No. 240, issued by Brigadier-General Sanborn, gives substantially the facts as related by Dr. Frazier. It is clear from the evidence before the committee that the soldier was in the service of the United States and in the line of duty when he received the injuries which resulted in his death, and that the relief asked for in the bill ought to be granted.

Your committee therefore submit a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WARREN OHAVER.

Mr. BYNUM. I call up the bill (H. R. 2156) granting a pension to Warren Ohaver.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Warren Ohaver, late of Company A, Fifty-third Regiment Indiana Infantry.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2150) granting a pension to Warren Ohaver, have examined the papers in the case, and submit the following report:

The claimant enlisted July 22, 1861, in Company H, Twentieth Indiana Volunteers, and was discharged November 15, 1861, for disability incurred in service. Re-enlisted February 24, 1862, in Company A, Fifty-third Indiana Volunteers, and was discharged December 13, 1862, by reason of shell wound received at Hatchie, October 5, 1862. Certificate of disability for discharge shows hemi-plegia of right side, the result of a severe concussion by a ball or shell received at battle of Hatchie, October 5, 1862; disability total. Claimant afterward served as a member of Company B, One hundred and seventeenth Indiana Volunteers, and was honorably discharged February 24, 1864. He filed declaration for pension December 7, 1870, alleging shell wound in right hip and knee at battle of Hatchie, October 5, 1862; claim was rejected on the ground that claimant is not disabled from causes originating in the service and that disability found was the result of a condition which existed prior to enlistment, and not of wounds.

An examination of the papers on file in the Pension Office discloses this fact, that the only question involved in this claim is whether this claimant was a sound, healthy man at the time of his enlistment, and whether he is now suffering from wounds received in the service and line of duty. It is admitted that two years prior to his enlistment he had the typhoid fever, but the testimony is somewhat conflicting as to whether he entirely recovered from the same. In the opinion of your committee a preponderance of the evidence sustains the fact that the claimant was physically a sound man prior to his entering the service.

Dr. Henry Cox, a regular practicing physician of thirty years' standing, testifies:

"He was well acquainted with Warren Ohaver, who is an applicant for an invalid pension, at the time of his enlistment, and further declares that the said Warren Ohaver at the time of his enlistment was a sound and able-bodied man. I was the family physician prior to his enlistment in the service of the United States."

A subsequent examination of Dr. Cox, by a special examiner, developed the fact that the claimant had a fever sore as the result of typhoid fever, but which in no way affected his soundness.

Col. Lawrence S. Shuler testifies that—

"In 1861 he raised a company for the twelve-months service by order of the adjutant-general of the State of Indiana. He states: I had those twelve-months men examined by Dr. Babbs, the examining surgeon, and I am pretty certain that every member was examined. Warren Ohaver was one of them. These men were stripped naked and a thorough examination given. If there had been anything the matter with Ohaver he would not have passed."

Other testimony equally as positive corroborates the above as to his condition prior to enlistment.

Hospital records show that the claimant was admitted to hospital steamer D. A. Jormory October 24, 1862, with gunshot wound, and to general hospital, Keokuk, Iowa, November 3, 1862, and was discharged from the service November 23, 1862, because of hemiplegia of right side, results of severe concussion from ball or shell; degree of disability total.

Claimant subsequently enlisted in Company B, One hundred and seventeenth Indiana Volunteers, and was honorably discharged February 23, 1864. In his application for pension he states that when he enlisted in the One hundred and seventeenth Indiana Volunteers it was with the expectation that he would have nothing to do but guard prisoners at Indianapolis; that he was not examined before enlisting, and was never able to march or do any kind of hard duty.

Medical examinations disclose that claimant is suffering with disabilities that disable him to the extent of second-grade rating. The examining surgeon, August 14, 1876, states that the most important cicatrix would seem likely to have resulted from the explosion of a shell, and rates him at one-half total. Medical examination December 1, 1880, finds that fragment of shell entered 3 inches to right of ensiform cartilage, passing downward, making exit through gluti muscles of right side; cicatrices nominal. Subsequent examination April 21, 1887, find him entitled to rating for disability second grade, but for varicose veins only.

In view of all the facts in this case your committee are inclined to believe this claim to be a meritorious one. Claimant was a brave and gallant soldier, and his hospital record shows that he bears the scars of honorable service. There are doubts as to his prior soundness at enlistment and the causes of his present disability, but your committee are of the opinion that his condition can safely be attributed to his army service, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HARRIET L. VAUGHAN.

Mr. SPOONER. I call up the bill (S. 1877) granting a pension to Harriet L. Vaughan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Harriet L. Vaughan, widow of Orsemus S. Vaughan, late sergeant of Company F, Fourth Regiment of Rhode Island Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SPOONER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1877) granting a pension to Harriet L. Vaughan, respectfully report:

That they adopt the following Senate report upon said bill as their own, and recommend the passage of the bill.

"[Senate Report No. 823, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

"Harriet L. Vaughan is widow of a deceased pensioner, Orsemus S. Vaughan, late of Company F, Fourth Rhode Island Volunteers. His disability arose from a gunshot wound in the groin, and his death from a malignant tumor near such wound. The application of the widow for pension was rejected 'because the testimony was considered incompetent,' in the language of the Commissioner of Pensions, 'to prove that the malignant tumor that caused the soldier's death was due to the wound of his right groin, as claimed.'

"All the medical evidence on file in this case is to the effect that the tumor was the result of the wound. Dr. E. H. Perry, the attending physician, testifies, April 22, 1887:

"'I attended Orsemus S. Vaughan during his last sickness. He died August 11, 1886. Cause of death, malignant tumor on thigh, below the scar of what had had evidently been a severe gunshot wound.'"

"In response to a request for a more definite statement of the case, Dr. Perry writes, June 15, 1887:

"'In explanation of my statement made and sworn to, I would say that, while I can not positively assert that any cause can be assigned for any malignant tumor, yet, in the case of Orsemus S. Vaughan, the fact that a tumor (malignant in nature and recurring after three careful operations for extirpation) formed a short distance below the scar of what had evidently been a very severe wound, naturally leads us to look to that wound as a probable cause, or at least an irritant to the parts adjacent, and thus might make a malignant tumor of what would otherwise be a harmless one, for this was originally a lipoma or fatty tumor.'"

"In response to a further request from the Pension Office, Dr. Perry states on the 15th of September, 1887:

"'In the case of Orsemus S. Vaughan, the tumor was first observed about one year prior to the first operation, which was performed May, 1885, and judging from its location and progress, Dr. Palmer (acting police surgeon of Providence, R. I.), who examined it carefully, pronounced it to be the result of the former wound. Vaughan was sergeant of police and Dr. Palmer, who is considered an expert, has charge of police examinations.'"

"These statements, covering the opinions of civil surgeons, not appearing satisfactory, recourse was had to an official pension examiner, who replied to a letter of the Commissioner of Patents of October 22, 1887, as follows:

"'PROVIDENCE, R. I., November 10, 1887.

"'SIR: I have the honor to report, in the case of pension claim 349206, of Harriet L. Vaughan, widow of Orsemus S. Vaughan, late Company F, Fourth Rhode Island Volunteers, that said Vaughan died of fungus hermatodes, of anterior aspect, upper third right thigh. In my opinion the disease was the result of wound of thigh, which said soldier received in the service, and for which he had been pensioned. I have personal knowledge of the above facts.

"'Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"'GEORGE W. CARR,

"'U. S. Examining Surgeon of Pensions.

"'Hon. JOHN C. BLACK,

"'Commissioner of Pensions, Washington, D. C.'"

"A memorandum in the case by a medical referee shows that the pensioner, while drawing his pension, failed to receive that to which his disability entitled him. The referee states, September 23, 1887:

"'I find, looking through the papers, that the pensioner was inadequately rated. Not knowing whether anything should or can be done in the premises, yet it seems so plain that I can not help making a note of it.'"

"The above comprises the substance of the medical evidence in the case, and it appears to be conclusive of the fact that the pensioner's death was due to a disease resulting from the wound incurred in service, though why such was not the decision of the Pension Office is one of those mysterious problems which the lay mind is incompetent to solve, unless, indeed, attention having been called to an injustice visited upon the pensioner during his life time, consistency required that it should be continued to his posterity.

"The further facts in the case are, that the widow claimant is indigent, and that she has five children depending on her for support.

"The committee report the bill favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass."

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM WINANS.

Mr. TRACEY. I call up the bill (H. R. 4788) granting an increase of pension to William Winans.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Winans, late corporal of Company B, First Regiment of New York Cavalry, at the rate of $30 per month, and such pension shall be in lieu of the $16 per month heretofore allowed him, and which he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. 4788) to increase the pension of William Winans, late private Company B, First New York Cavalry, have considered the same, and report the bill favorably.

It is shown in this case that the pensioner is receiving a pension of $16 per month for a gunshot wound of left shoulder and injury to right index finger, and the testimony of Drs. Florence Donohue and D. W. Bliss, filed in the case, shows that he is wholly disabled for manual labor by reason of the wounds aforesaid.

It also appears that the claimant was employed in one of the Departments as a clerk, and was forced to resign his position by reason of inability to perform the duties of his office, such as handling books, by reason of his wound of shoulder.

For some reason, inexplicable to the committee, an increase has been denied to him by the Pension Office.

His personal appearance is that of a man greatly enfeebled. Dr. D. W. Bliss, who has had charge of him during the last eight years, explains his condition by the presence in the wound of pieces of the sabot of a shell made of mixed metal (some of which he has extracted), which produces a septic condition, inducing recurring abscesses.

There is no doubt that the present rating at the Pension Office is sufficient if the mere usual disability resulting from the wound in the shoulder and the injury to right index finger are alone considered, but that there is greater disability is abundantly proved, first, by the removal of pieces of the poisonous metal; and, second, by the septic condition evidenced by the frequent abscesses to which the claimant is subject.

Dr. Bliss's letter to the committee is annexed to this report. Besides this, his, Dr. Dougherty's, and other surgeons' affidavits are on file in the Pension Office.

We recommend that the bill do pass.

"WASHINGTON, D. C., March 19, 1888.

"DEAR SIR: Referring to our recent conversation relative to the case of William Winans, who is asking a special act of Congress increasing his pension, I have to state that I have had professional care of said Winans for some eight years past, and during that time he has been an invalid from a disability readily traceable to the shell wound in his left shoulder and its sequel; also from chronic constipation, quite frequent attacks of myalgia, and general malaise. The latter disabilities I believe to be largely due to exposure and the diet to which he was confined while a prisoner of war at Belle Isle, Virginia.

"During the past eight years, while he has been under my care, he has suffered with recurring abscesses in the region of the injured shoulder and furunculi or boils on different parts of the body, evidencing a general septic condition, entirely due, in my opinion, to the presence of fragments of the sabot of the shell, which was composed of mixed metal, and are deeply imbedded in the soft parts around the shoulder, and are beyond judicious surgical interference, unless they may be accidentally included in the field of an acute abscess.

"Something more than six years ago a similar condition obtained, and I removed two pieces of mixed metal, portions of sabot which had remained imbedded in the tissues about seventeen years.

"This man is entirely unable to perform any manual labor.

"Very respectfully,

"D. W. BLISS, M. D.

"Hon. J. LOGAN CHIPMAN."

Mr. MATSON. This bill, in my opinion, is establishing a very bad precedent. The question in the case is purely one of disability. It seems this soldier is receiving a pension of $16 a month. The proposition of the bill is to give him $30 a month. The pension he now draws has been fixed by a board of surgeons, sworn to do their duty, and accustomed to rate for disability of this kind. The proposition of the bill is to take the testimony of a private physician and override the judgment and opinion and sworn statement of officers of the Government.

I have no recollection of this bill; probably it was passed in my absence; but I am sure the precedent is wrong. It opens the door for bringing in a very large number of cases of men suffering from disability who believe the pensions they now receive are not adequate to the disability they labor under. That is almost the universal opinion of soldiers and is a natural one, and if this bill is passed those who now draw pensions which they consider inadequate will apply for increase of those pensions.

The rule has been in such cases to apply for remedy to the Pension Office. If the soldier has a disability entitling him to $30 a month, he can get it under the law at the Pension Office; or $18 more than this soldier is getting.

I believe this bill ought not to pass, as it is establishing a bad precedent, and that Congress can not afford to enter on this kind of legislation.

Mr. TRACEY. I would like to have the Clerk read the letter which accompanies the report again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again read that portion of the report.

The latter part of the report was again read.

Mr. MATSON. Now, the plain proposition here is to take the letter, not an affidavit even, but the letter, evidently of the employed physician of this party, to override the sworn officers of the Government who fix the rate of all these pensions; and I think the bill ought not to pass. I feel so much impressed with the gravity of the matter that I shall insist upon having a quorum to vote upon the bill if it is proposed to pass it to-night.

Mr. TRACEY. Well, I do not desire to obstruct the business of the committee. If the bill can be laid aside and go over with the other bills to be considered on the 28th of May, I shall be satisfied. The bill, I will state, was handed to me by Mr. BACON to-day, who was obliged to leave this evening——

Mr. DOCKERY. In view of the statement the gentleman makes, would it not be better to ask that the bill be laid aside and retain its place on the Calendar until the return of the gentleman to whom he refers?

Mr. TRACEY. I would prefer its consideration now.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BYNUM in the chair). The question is on laying the bill aside, and report it to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken, and the Chair stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. TRACEY. I rise to ask information of the Chair. What action was taken? My attention was called away temporarily.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the motion to lay the bill aside with a favorable recommendation was lost, and the bill will retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. TRACEY. I ask unanimous consent that it be laid aside, retaining its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection.

MARTHA LINTEN.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Connecticut. I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill (H. R. 7721) granting a pension to Martha Linten.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, with arrears from her husband's death, the name of Martha Linten, widow of Benjamin Linten, late private in Company I, Eighteenth Regiment Connecticut Volunteers, at the rate of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. FRENCH) was read, as follows:

Martha Linten is the widow of Benjamin Linten, late private of Company I, Eighteenth Connecticut Volunteers, who died of paralysis October 6, 1876. The claim of the widow has been rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that the fatal disease is not shown to be due to the soldier's military service.

It is shown by the records of the War Department that soldier enlisted August 2, 1862, and was discharged December 26, 1862, by reason of old age, which, according to the certificate, was forty years.

Capt. Samuel R. Knapp, of soldier's company, testifies that the latter was, to all appearances, a sound and healthy man at enlistment. In October or November, 1862, while the company was stationed at Black River, Maryland, in a low, marshy place, the soldier, and nearly half of the company, were taken sick with malaria and fevers.

A number of other reliable witnesses testify to the soldier's soundness at enlistment, including Charles M. Carleton, the surgeon of the regiment, who states that he examined the soldier at the time of his enlistment, and was at that time a sound and able-bodied man.

Dr. William Soule, formerly surgeon Twenty-first Regiment Connecticut Volunteers, testifies that—

"Soldier was under his medical care from March, 1863, until May, 1867, during which period he suffered very seriously from the effects of malarial poisoning, resulting in impaired use of the lower limbs. Every repeated attack of chills crippled him more and more, and finally resulted in total paralysis."

Dr. Elijah Dyer, a practitioner of fifty years' standing, came also in the case in December, 1867, and continued to treat soldier until death.

"Is unable to state just how the disease terminated in paralysis. The liver became diseased, and attacks of chills followed one upon another, until softening of the brain ensued. The soldier was correct in all his habits. Has no doubt that the fatal disease was directly connected with the service."

Dr. W. S. Perkins testifies that from the history of the case it is his opinion that the fatal paralysis was due to the malarial poisoning contracted in the service.

A number of lay witnesses also testify to the soldier's gradual decline from the effects of malaria, and the violence of the attacks of the same from discharge to death.

The cause of paralysis in any case must necessarily remain a matter of conjecture. In the absence of any other known cause your committee believe that the serious malarial troubles from which soldier is shown to have suffered from date of discharge until death can be accepted as the inciting cause, and therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill and ask that it do pass, amended, however, by striking out all between the words "pension-roll," in line 4, and "the," in line 5, and also by striking out all after the word "Volunteers," in line 7, and insert therein instead the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendments were agreed to.

The question recurred on laying the bill aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I think the same objection is applicable to this bill as was made to the last bill which was passed over by the committee a few moments since. It appears to be identical in some respects. It is evident that this case has been before the examining surgeons, and was rejected by them, and here we are asked to pass the bill on the same character of testimony which the committee declined a few moments ago to consider in opposition to the surgeon's testimony—that is, the testimony of the private physician.

I shall object to laying the bill aside, and ask a direct vote upon the question because I do not believe it to be a meritorious case.

The question was taken, and was decided in the affirmative.

So the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN GLENNING.

Mr. SHIVELY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7688) granting a pension to John Glenning.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of John Glenning, late private Company B, Tenth Regiment Tennessee Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

John Glenning was enrolled on the 19th day of April, 1862, and served in Company B, Tenth Regiment Tennessee Volunteers, and was honorably discharged at Nashville, Tenn., May 25, 1865. In his application for pension, filed September 14, 1882, he alleges that—

"He was kicked in the abdomen by a drunken, disorderly soldier whom he was disarming by order of his lieutenant, Sullivan, which produced a rupture. Also, while at Turn Bull Creek about the month of January, 1863, from severe exposure contracted, he became affected with rheumatism, which subsequently became chronic."

The application was rejected on the ground that there is no record of alleged rupture and rheumatism.

The examining surgeons, in their report, say:

"There is total deafness in the right ear. The membrana tympani is very opaque and retracted, showing evidence of chronic catarrhal disease. There is scrotal hernia of both sides, also evidence of chronic rheumatism. The left elbow is about one-tenth anchylosed, and also the left shoulder, and some of the fingers slightly deformed. Rated at three-fourths for double hernia, one-fourth for rheumatism. The hernial tumor on right side is about the size of the fist, descending into the scrotum. On this side he wears no truss, and says the tumor does not inconvenience him; it is reducible. On the left side is about half the size of the right one. He wears a truss on this side, which retains it perfectly."

James Diamond testifies as follows:

"I was a sentry on street duty in the city of Nashville, in the month of October, 1863 (but can not remember the exact date of the night of the occurrence); that I was called upon by Sergeant Joyce of our regiment to disarm and arrest a disorderly and drunken soldier, and that he resisted arrest by drawing his revolver upon me; that the sergeant then ordered me to go to the reserve for assistance, and that John Glenning, a private of Company B, Tenth Tennessee Infantry, was detailed with me; that when we reached the disorderly soldier Glenning gave me his gun to hold while he proceeded to disarm him; that a scuffle ensued in which both went to the ground, and that while the pistol was being wrenched from him, he fought and kicked in a furious manner. After securing his arms we placed him in the guard-house. The next I heard of Glenning he was laid up in the hospital."

Dr. L. I. Ham, of South Bend, testifies that he treated the soldier Glenning between 1866 and 1878 for rupture and rheumatism.

Dr. Cassiday testifies that he has treated the soldier since March 9, 1878, to the present time for chronic lumbar rheumatism, for deafness of one ear, for hernia and pain in chest, etc. During all this time he has never been able to perform the labor of a man in ordinary health, and much of the time he has been unable to perform any. To the best of his judgment this condition of the soldier would preclude the performance of more than one-fourth that of an ordinary man and only of the lighter kinds of work.

It is shown by competent testimony that the four leading officers who had personal knowledge of the infliction of the injury, and also Drs. Knapp, senior and junior, surgeons, are dead, and that it is impossible for him to secure the evidence within their knowledge.

Robert Allen, steward for the University of Notre Dame, testifies as follows:

"I am steward for the University of Notre Dame, Indiana. I took the aforesaid John Glenning into our employ in the year 1865, on his return from the Army, and kept him up to the present time; that owing to internal disabilities which he said he was afflicted with, but not being visible (rheumatism and rupture), he was incompetent to perform ordinary manual labor; that he was kept jobbing in the vegetable garden, such as weeding, etc.; that we never agreed to pay him, nor have we ever paid him, any stated wages, such as we pay ordinary laborers, only whatever it was our option to allow him for the services he rendered ever since he came here, he being part of the time entirely disabled to do any work; and that, to the best of my judgment and knowledge, he is totally disabled and unfit to perform an average man's work one day with another."

The regimental hospital records are not on file in the office of the Adjutant-General, and, owing to the death of the surgeon and assistant surgeon, it is impossible for the soldier to furnish the medical evidence required by the Pension Department. It is in evidence that the soldier was sound and healthy when he entered the service. In the opinion of the committee there is no reasonable doubt as to the soldier having incurred the disabilities for which he asks a pension in the Army and in line of duty, and that said disabilities have been continuous since the date of his discharge up to the present time, and have been of such a nature as to unfit him for manual labor only of the lighter kinds. He has almost ever since his discharge been taken care of and provided with a comfortable home by the charitable people of Notre Dame without the hope of reward. He was a good and faithful soldier, and is a man whose character is without spot or blemish. He is now seventy-three years old, and it seems to the committee that the pension which has been refused should be granted.

We therefore submit a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

During the reading of the report,

Mr. SHERMAN said: I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the report.

Mr. MATSON. I object.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report as above.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CATHARINE TIERNEY.

Mr. MOFFITT. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5812) granting a pension to Catharine Tierney, which, with the accompanying report, I send to the desk.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place the name of Catharine Tierney, widow of Mark Tierney, late of Company I, First Regiment of United States Infantry, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5812) granting a pension to Catharine Tierney, have considered the same, and report as follows:

The facts of the case are correctly shown in a letter from the Pension Bureau to W. C. Watson, esq., Plattsburgh, N. Y., filed before your committee, which is as follows:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
"Washington, D. C., January 13, 1888.

"SIR: In the claim of Catharine Tierney the records show that soldier served in the regular Army from June, 1837, to March, 1839, and had his left hand frozen January 5, 1839, while serving on the frontier of New York. The soldier was allowed a pension for the injury to his hand in 1858 and he died April 2, 1886.

"The claim of the widow was rejected April 19, 1887, for the reason that injury to the hand and resulting paralysis, of which it is shown that soldier died, was incurred prior to March 4, 1861, during a time of peace and not while actually engaged in war.

"There is no law and never has been one allowing a pension to the widow of a regular Army soldier when the cause of death originated prior to March 4, 1861, otherwise than during a period of actual war.

"The former laws embodied in the Revised Statutes, section 4732, provide a pension for the widows of soldiers whose death occurred as a result of service during the various Indian wars that have occurred since 1790.

"The rejection of Mrs. Tierney's claim is not based on any section of a law, but in the absence of all law.

"The soldiers of the regular Army are pensioned without regard to service in time of peace or war for disabilities incurred in the line of duty.

"Very respectfully,

"JOS. J. BARTLETT,
"Deputy Commissioner.

"W. C. WATSON, Esq.,
"Plattsburgh, N. Y."

Your committee are of the opinion, inasmuch as the death of the claimant's husband was due to his service in line of duty, and as the general law does not embrace the case, that this bill should pass, and they therefore recommend such action.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MISS CARRIE A. LUEY.

Mr. MCKINNEY. I ask the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6770) granting a pension to Miss Carrie A. Luey.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Miss Carrie A. Luey, sister of William B. Luey, late of Company H, Thirteenth New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6770) granting a pension to Miss Carrie A. Luey, having given the same consideration, report as follows:

William B. Lucy was a private in Company H, Thirteenth New Hampshire Volunteers. He was a good soldier, and received a gunshot wound in the right arm, for which he was pensioned, originally at $6 per month, but which was increased until it reached $14 per month. Soldier's health gradually gave way as a result of the wound, and after a painful and protracted illness he died in February, 1887.

Soldier was never married, and his sister, Carrie A. Luey, devoted her entire time to caring for him during his illness. Numerous affidavits are filed with the committee testifying to her devotion and unselfish efforts in her brother's behalf, which greatly impaired her own health. It appears also that the soldier and his sister had always lived together, mutually caring for each other; that they had a little home worth seven or eight hundred dollars, on which there was an incumbrance of $400, and that the soldier's pension money was used toward their joint support. It also appears that they were industrious, economical, and highly respected people.

The claimant remains unmarried. She is in delicate health, and is partly supported by the charity of the Grand Army of the Republic Post. She applies to Congress for pension, and her application is strongly indorsed by the best people of the town in which she lives.

Your committee are of the opinion that the case is a proper one for Congressional relief, and accordingly report the bill back with a recommendation that it be amended by inserting the word "dependent" before the word "sister" in the sixth line, and by adding to the bill the words "and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month," and as thus amended recommend its passage.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM IRVING.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I ask the present consideration of the bill (S. 1912) granting an increase of pension to William Irving.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Irving, late lieutenant-colonel of the Thirty-eighth Ohio Veteran Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, the claimant in this case is one of the doorkeepers of this House, and is known to all the members. I ask, therefore, that the further reading of the report be dispensed with, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. TRACEY. I object.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Perhaps I can make a statement, with the consent of the gentlemen from New York, that will obviate any objections to the request of the gentleman from Kansas.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from New York as insisting upon his objection to dispensing with the reading.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I will inquire of the gentleman who makes the objection whether a statement concerning the facts in the case will not be sufficient, in order to save the time consumed in the reading of the report?

Mr. TRACEY. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I am personally acquainted with this case. Colonel Irving was colonel of the regiment to which I belonged. I stood within ten feet of him when he received the wound on account of which one of his legs was amputated.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Was it there that you lost your leg?

Mr. BOOTHMAN. No; I lost mine subsequently. Before that he had received a kick from a mule when in charge of a wagon train which got fast. As usual in such a case they took hold to help it out and he received a kick on the right leg. From that disability he has been suffering for several years, and it is now getting so as to make it probable that he will lose that leg also.

Mr. TRACEY. It seems to me this is a case similar to the one which I called up this evening, and to which the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions objected on the ground that it was a case which could be again brought up in the Pension Office.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. This is an entirely different case. It is the case of a double disability, one leg lost and gone and the other injured by a kick.

Mr. MATSON. I think the bill is very similar to the one I objected to if it is to be passed for $50, because that rate of pension can be obtained in the Pension Office if it appears he has a disability which requires the regular aid and attendance of another person. That is what others get for that degree of disability.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. The committee recommend a pension of $50.

Mr. MATSON. The gentleman might move to amend by making the pension $45, or $48.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. We have a favorable report from the committee.

Mr. MATSON. I do not remember particularly the action of the committee. Without regard to that action I may say that I believe I have some acquaintance with the gentleman to whom it is sought to give this pension; but it is important that in such matters the House should be consistent with itself.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I will agree to an amendment making the pension $49.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I wish to ask the gentleman why this claimant can not get a pension now at the Pension Office?

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Because there is no law granting a pension for a double disability.

Mr. MATSON. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. There is no law that reaches this case. He has been reported frequently by examining boards as having this double disability.

Mr. MATSON. The reason why he can not get the pension at the Pension Office is because his rate of pension now is fixed by special act.

Mr. PERKINS. I move to amend the bill so as to make the pension $49.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the bill as amended will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I think I must object, unless it is agreed that it shall go over with the others until the 28th of May.

Mr. MCCREARY. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw his objection. This seems to me a very meritorious case. It is the case of a man who has lost one leg in battle and been seriously injured in the other.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I withdraw the objection.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) in full is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1912) granting an increase of pension to William Irving, submit the following report:

The Senate Committee on Pensions submit the following report, which your committee adopt, and recommend the passage of the bill.

"[Senate Report No. 895, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1912) granting an increase of pension to William Irving, have examined the same, and report:

"Your committee find that Lieut. Col. William Irving is a pensioner by special act of Congress, approved July 5, 1884, at the rate of $40 per month. That he was pensioned originally at the rate of $25 per month, commencing July 12, 1865, for loss of left leg. That he also in his original declaration claimed pension 'for injury to right lower leg.' The incurrence of this disability in the service and line of duty is fully shown, as is also its continuance to the present time.

"We append herewith former report of the committee in this case:

"The committee find that claimant enlisted September 1, 1861, as captain of Company G, Thirty-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteers. August 5, 1864, he was mustered as major, to date from June 1 of that year. July, 1865, he was mustered out, with rank of lieutenant-colonel. On the 10th of September, 1863, while in command of a wagon-train crossing the Cumberland Mountains, he was severely kicked in his right leg by a mule. Dr. James Haller, surgeon of the regiment, testifies:

"'That he treated claimant for the kick of a mule; same occurred in line of duty; location of injury, right tibia, lower third, anteriorly and slightly to outer side; injured September 10, 1867. Ulceration with necrosis of pericardium still continues (February 14, 1880). Claimant was almost constantly on his feet for next four months; was continuously on duty; was wounded at Eutaw Creek August 5, 1864, through lower part of upper third of left leg, fracturing both bones; affiant amputated his leg same day. Because of the debility and improper nourishment necrosis of the tibia, resulting from the kick, commenced, small sequestra being occasionally discharged ever since. Present condition such that it is impossible for him to be on his feet for any length of time without suffering intolerable pain, requiring him to sit down and elevate his leg.'

"The examining boards before whom he appeared April 7, 1880, and March 28, 1882, describe the wound of the right leg as an open ulcer, inflamed and discharging, and say the left leg has been amputated about 4 inches below the knee. Both boards decide that he is entitled to a pension of $37.50 per month. The Pension Office declines to allow for more than one disability, which has heretofore been $25 per month, and which he is now receiving.

"Your committee believe that he is entitled to a greater pension than the soldier simply suffering from the amputation of a leg below the knee, and, as he is now entitled for that disability to $30 per month, your committee recommend that the bill be amended by striking out 'forty-five,' in the eighth line, and inserting 'forty,' and that it be passed as amended."

The claimant in this case presented himself to the committee and stated:

"That he was suffering great pain from the wound in his right leg; that it had to be dressed twice daily; that it required almost constant attention from his wife, and that recently he has been obliged to have attention from his family physician, Dr. J. W. Bayne, of this city."

In answer to an inquiry from Senator PLUMB regarding the increased injury to the right leg, Dr. Bayne states as follows, namely:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., April 7, 1888.

"SIR: I have the honor to address you a few lines in behalf of Col. William Irving, late of the Thirty-eighth Ohio Volunteers, in hopes that a proper consideration may be given his case. As his medical adviser I have become cognizant of his condition. He lost his left leg in the war, and received a severe injury of the right, which at times causes him great suffering and completely disables him; this limb has discharged several pieces of bone, is inflamed and irritable, and has several large ulcers upon it.

"At times the leg becomes very much swollen, and the question of amputation becomes a serious one, and will probably have to be done in the future. The colonel is a very large man, and having lost one leg, the greater amount of his weight and pressure is brought to bear upon the right, thus all the while increasing his troubles. His sufferings are great, his condition serious, and his case is one that ought to appeal to the heart of every patriotic citizen.

"Respectfully,

"J. W. BAYNE, M. D.,
"Late Acting Assistant Surgeon, United States Army.

"Hon. P. B. PLUMB,
"United States Senator."

Every examination made in this case, from date of application originally to the present time, the claimant has received always and uniformly a rating by the several boards of medical examiners "of one-half total for the disability to right leg." Taking into consideration the fact that the disability to right leg was claimed in his original declaration, its incurrence in the line of duty fully established, its continuance to the present time clearly shown, and that its amputation "becomes a serious question, and will probably have to be done in the future," your committee are of the opinion that the pension to Colonel Irving should be increased to $50 per month.

They therefore recommend that the bill be amended in line 8 by striking out the word "sixty" and inserting the word "fifty," and that after the word "month," in line 8, the words "in lieu of the pension he is now receiving" be inserted, and that all of section 2 be stricken out.

Thus amended they recommend the passage of the bill.

LEAH ROARK.

Mr. WALKER. I call up the bill (H. R. 6531) to pension Leah Roark.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, pension claim numbered 244005.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendments:

In line 4 strike out the word "required" and insert "directed."

In lines 6 and 7 strike out the words "pension claim numbered 244005" and insert as follows: "The name of Leah Roork, widow of Yancy Roork, late a private of T. J. Babcock's company of Missouri Independent Militia."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to pension Leah Roark."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report.

Mr. HOLMES. As the time is limited, I suggest that the gentleman who calls up the bill shall make an explanation.

Mr. WALKER. I desire to state to the committee that this is a bill where the claimant can not, under the general law, obtain a pension, because she is the widow of a soldier who lost his life in battle when a member of the Missouri Enrolled Militia. There is no general law granting the soldiers of that organization a pension.

Mr. MATSON. With the statement of the gentleman from Missouri I ask that the report be printed in the RECORD, and that its reading be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. CARUTH. If I desired to indulge personal spite I might call a constitutional quorum on this bill, but as that would be at the expense of the widow of a soldier I will not.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman has the right, and if he desires to do so he may.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6531) granting a pension to Leah Roark, widow of Yancy Roark, late a private in Capt. T. J. Babcock's company of Missouri Independent Militia, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

Claimant is the widow of Yancy Roark, who enlisted as a private in Capt. T. J. Babcock's company of Missouri Independent Militia, and who was killed by guerrillas on or about August 30, 1864.

Claimant filed an application for a pension, on account of the death of her husband, which was rejected on the ground that the soldier was not in the United States service.

The Adjutant-General, under date of January 21, 1885, states as follows:

"Yancy Roark was a member of Capt. T. J. Babcock's Provisional Company Enrolled Missouri Militia, organized under General Orders No. 107, June 25, 1864, Department of Missouri. The militia called out under the provisions of that order were not mustered into the United States service, and there are no rolls of said militia on file in this office.

"The records of the district of Central Missouri show that the capture and killing of Yancy Roark and others were officially investigated September 5, 1865, at Jefferson City, Mo., by Col. John S. Wolfe, One hundred and thirty-fifth Illinois Volunteers, commanding first sub-district of Central Missouri.

"That investigation shows that Captain Babcock's company was stationed at Mount Pleasant, Miller County, Missouri, on August 29, 1864, and that on said date he sent 1 lieutenant and 16 men on a scout to the Big Bend on the Osage River. On August 30, 1874, this detail crossed over to Fair Play Islands, where they were captured by guerrillas, who on the same date shot and killed seven of the detail, including Yancy Roark.

"From the foregoing it appears that Captain Babcock's company had been called into active service, and was co-operating in connection with United States troops on August 30, 1864."

Boyd S. Miller and Joseph N. Hicks testify that they were also members of said company and detail of scouts, and were taken prisoners on or about August 29, 1864, and that Yancy Roark was shot and killed by the enemy in their presence.

This case could not be allowed in the Pension Office because this soldier was in the militia service, and under the provisions of section 4693 cases of this kind must be proven before July 4, 1874.
